Action by Christina Stultz against C. M. Thomas and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged negligent injury to plaintiff by falling over a rope barricade which the defendants had erected around a newly laid concrete sidewalk in the city of Winston-Salem.

The defendants were engaged, under a contract with the city, in replacing an old sidewalk with a new concrete one in front of the premises occupied by the plaintiff's sister. The plaintiff, a woman of about 50 years of age, a seamstress by occupation, had rooms on the opposite side of the street, and took her meals at her sister's home.

The defendants' servants at about 6 o'clock in the evening of November 19, 1919, had completed the laying of the new concrete sidewalk in front of the residence of the plaintiff's sister, and erected barricades and placed red lanterns in the vicinity immediately before stopping work. They placed a plank about 12 inches wide from the gate to the curb across the new concrete for the protection of the new concrete in case persons should desire to enter or leave the premises. They erected a number of posts, three or four feet high, along the curb between the street and sidewalk, and tied a rope to the top of these posts to act as a barrier for the protection of the new concrete. A post was placed at each side of the plank at the curb so close together as only to leave room for a person to pass between, and the rope, according to the contentions of defendants, was permitted to hang down alongside the post, to pass under the plank, and ascend alongside the other post to its top; the rope hanging loosely under the plank, and the plank projecting several inches beyond the rope and the edge of the curb. According to the plaintiff's contentions, the rope was placed above the plank and was carelessly permitted to sag down to within a few inches of the plank, thus rendering it dangerous for pedestrians to pass over.

About 6 or 6:15 p. m., the plaintiff came to supper from the opposite side of the street and went into her sister's home, walking along this plank to do so. Twenty-five or thirty minutes later, the plaintiff, returning to her room, came out of the gate, walked across the plank, and tripped against some obstacle—she did not know what at the time —which, on arising, she discovered to be the rope.

Upon issues submitted, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Were the defendants independent contractors in doing the work referred to in the complaint, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendants, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(3) Did the plaintiff of her own negligence contribute to her injury, as alleged in the answer? Answer: No.

"(4) What damage, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $1,500."

From the judgment rendered on the verdict in favor of plaintiff, the defendants appealed.

Fred M. Parrish, Ray L. Deal, and Moser Shapiro, all of Winston-Salem, for appellants.

O. O. Efrid and Swink & Hutchins, all of Winston-Salem, and N. O. Petree, of Danbury, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] Considering the evidence in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, the accepted position on a motion to nonsuit, we think his honor was correct in submitting the case to the jury.

Upon trial in the superior court, the defendants proposed to show, by several witnesses, the custom prevailing in Winston among other contractors, with respect to the precautions used by them in doing work of the same character in which the defendants were engaged. This evidence was excluded, upon objection by plaintiff, and defendants assign such ruling as error. The purpose in offering this evidence, as stated by counsel, was as follows:

"We propose to show by the witness that the custom and approved method of placing warnings and guards around newly laid sidewalks is to place ropes next to the street and place the same under the plank that leads from the street to the abutting landowners and place red lights at each end of the work, beginning and ending of the work on the streets, and it is further the custom to put the rope from a post under the plank as testified by these witnesses was done in this case, that that method was approved and in general use."

Section 106 of the Ordinances of the City of Winston-Salem provides:

"It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, to make any excavation or do any work which may create or cause a dangerous condition in or on or near any street, alley, sidewalk or public place of the city, without placing and maintaining proper guard rails and signal lights or other warnings, at, in or around the same, sufficient to warn the public of such excavation or work, and to protect all persons using reasonable care from injuries on account of same."

[2, 3] A failure to discharge an affirmative duty imposed by law has been held by us, in a number of cases, to constitute an act of negligence per se (Taylor v. Stewart, 172 N. C. 203, 90 S. E. 134); and where such conduct, on the part of the defendant, has been shown or established, it is a question for the jury to say whether or not such negligence is the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Ridge v. High Point, 176 N. C. 421, 97 S. E. 369; Paul v. R. R., 170 N. C. 231, 87 S. E. 66, L. R. A. 1916B, 1079; Fox v. Texas Co., 180 N. C. 543, 105 S. E. 437; Stone v. Texas Co., 180 N. C. 546, 105 S. E. 425, 12 A. L. R. 1297, and cases there cited.

[4] We do not think that an established use or custom among men engaged in the same line of work can avail as against the positive requirements of the ordinance, or statute. In fact, a breach of a legal duty, or a duty imposed by law, comes within the very definition of negligence; and, if such be the proximate cause of an injury, it constitutes actionable negligence. Drum v. Miller, 135 N. C. 215, 47 S. E. 421, 65 L. R. A. 890, 102 Am. St. Rep. 528; Larson v. Ring, 43 Minn. 88, 44 N. W. 1078; Malloy v. Walker, 77 Mich. 448, 43 N. W. 1012, 6 L. R. A. 695.

In the Malloy Case, just cited, the Michigan statute imposed a penalty upon municipalities for failing to make their highways safe for travel. The defendant neglected to provide proper and safe barriers at a dangerous place. The court held that a general usage or custom as to placing rails or barriers along a highway embankment is of no importance in determining the liability of the municipality for failing to provide such barriers at a dangerous place. This is in perfect analogy with the case at bar.

We have found no sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict and judgment.

No error.

GAITHER v. CHARLOTTE MOTOR CAR CO. (No. 410.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Contracts \S 127(4) — Courts disregard contract designating county for action thereon.

It is the general policy of the courts to disregard contractual provisions requiring actions thereon to be brought in a designated county, since such stipulations concern the remedy which is created and regulated by law, even though a party can waive the objection that the suit was not brought in the county designated by C. S. \S 463 et seq.

2. Contracts \S 127(4) — Contract fixing place of action thereon affects jurisdiction of other courts.

A contract providing that an action thereon can be brought only in designated county, even though such county is the residence of one of the parties where the action might be brought under C. S. § 463 et seq., affects the jurisdiction of the courts of other counties under the statute and will not be enforced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Richmond County; Ray, Judge.

Action by W. W. Gaither against the Charlotte Motor Car Company. From a judgment denying defendant's motion to remove the cause to the county of its residence, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff is a resident of Richmond county, and the defendant a corporation engaged in business in Mecklenburg. The plaintiff and the defendant on January 26, 1920, entered into a written contract, by the terms of which the plaintiff, called the "dealer," was to sell Hupmobiles for the defendant, called the "distributor." The plaintiff deposited with the defendant $250 which was to be returned upon plaintiff's giving up the agency. The contract was terminated January 1, 1921, and the plaintiff demanded the return of his money. In February, 1920, the plaintiff went to Chicago to assist the defendant in shipping cars, and remained there until the 1st day of April. The plaintiff alleged that the reasonable value of his services was $343. He brought suit to recover these two sums from the defendant. When the cause came on for hearing, the defendant made a motion for the removal of the cause to Mecklenburg. The motion was denied, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

The basis of the defendant's motion is the following stipulation in the contract:

"In case of any disagreement between the distributor and the dealer any action that may be taken against the distributor shall be brought in the city of Charlotte."

C. H. Gover, of Charlotte, for appellant.

Fred W. Bynum, of Rockingham, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. The single question is whether this agreement is enforceable at the election of one party against the will of the other. The argument of the defendant's counsel rests upon the contention that venue, unlike jurisdiction, is in the nature of a personal privilege which may be waived by the parties, and that an antecedent agreement designating the place of trial is no more obnoxious to the provisions of the statute than is a waiver of the proper venue resulting from failure to object before the time of answering expires. The counsel insists that this proposition is particularly sound where the agreement, as in this case, designates as the place of trial a county in which one of the parties resides.

[1] At the outset we may say that the general policy of the courts is to disregard contractual provisions to the effect that an action shall be brought either in a designated court or in a designated county to the exclusion of another court or another county in which the action by virtue of a statute might properly be maintained. Several reasons may be assigned in support of this policy. In the first place, stipulations of this kind concern the remedy, and the remedy is created and regulated by law. The regulation of venue is a matter within the discretion of the Legislature. At common law the place of trial was determined, not so much by the residence of the parties as by the nature of the action; but the common-law regulation has been modified by statute. Accordingly the counties in which actions of the various classes may be brought are distinctly defined. C. S. § 463 et seq. To permit parties to a contract to enforce a stipulation which purports definitely to fix the forum long before there is a cause of action would be to nullify the law and to substitute the will of the parties in its stead. It is true that an action may be tried in a county not designated by the statute unless the defendant, before the time of answering expires, demands in writing that the trial be conducted in the proper county; but the failure of the defendant to object, after the summons has been served and the complaint filed, bears faint resemblance to an agreement made. It may be, months or years before, and induced perhaps by necessity.

"Any citizen may no doubt waive the rights to which he may be entitled. He cannot, however, bind himself in advance by an agreement, which may be specifically enforced, thus to forfeit his rights at all times and on all occasions, whenever the case may be presented." Paper Co. v. Paper Co., 223 Mass. 8, 111 N. E. 678, L. R. A. 1916D, 691.

[2] There is another objection. Certainly there is a difference between venue and jurisdiction. If venue signifies the place of trial, and jurisdiction the power, right, or authority of the court to hear and determine a cause, it is somewhat difficult to understand why the practical effect of the agreement in question, if enforced, would not be to deprive the superior court of Richmond of its jurisdiction—not its jurisdiction of other actions of similar character, but its jurisdiction of this particular action, its jurisdiction of a cause which it has the legal right to determine. The purpose of this agreement is to limit jurisdiction of the action to the courts of Mecklenburg county. But if jurisdiction can be limited to one county, it may be limited to any other county. Parties cannot, by contract made in advance, oust the jurisdiction of the courts.

We refer to some of the decisions. A leading case on the subject under discussion is Nute v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 174. Suit had been brought to recover on a policy of insurance, in which it was stipulated that the assured might, within four months after the determination of the loss, institute his action "at a proper court in the county of Essex," where the defendant conducted its business. The assured within the four months prescribed brought suit in the county of Suffolk, and the court of common pleas held that the action could not be maintained. In granting a new trial, Chief Justice Shaw said:

"In cases recently determined, it has been held that a stipulation in a policy of insurance, or in a by-law constituting in legal effect a part of such policy, by way of condition to their liability, that no recovery shall be had unless a suit is commenced within a certain time limited, was a valid condition, and that, unless complied with, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. Cray v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 1 Blatchf. C. C. 280. Wilson v. Aetna Ins. Co., 27 Verm. 99. In this case it is strenuously insisted that a stipulation, that an action shall be brought in a particular county, where by law it may be brought, is strictly analogous, and ought to be enforced as a condition precedent by a court which, without such stipulation and condition, would clearly have jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties. * * * Upon the particular questions here presented, the court are of opinion that there is an obvious distinction between a stipulation by contract as to the time when a right of action shall accrue and when it shall cease, on the one hand; and as to the forum before which, and the proceedings by which an action shall be commenced and prosecuted. The one is a condition annexed to the acquisition and continuance of a legal right, and depends on contract and the acts of the parties; the other is a stipulation concerning the remedy, which is created and regulated by law. Perhaps it would not be easy or practicable to draw a line of distinction, precise and accurate enough to govern all these classes of cases, because the cases run so nearly into each other; but we think the general distinction is obvious.

"The time within which money shall be paid, land conveyed, a debt released, and the like, are all matters of contract, and depend on the will and act of the parties; but, in case of breach, the tribunal before which a remedy is to be sought, the means and processes by which it is to be conducted, affect the remedy, and are created and regulated by law. The stipulation, that a contracting party shall not be liable to pay money, or perform any other collateral act, before a certain time, is a regulation of the right, too familiar to require illustration; a stipulation, that his obligation shall cease if payment or other performance is not demanded before a certain time, seems equally a matter affecting the right. A stipulation, that an action shall not be brought after a certain day or the happening of a certain event, although, in words, it may seem to be a contract respecting the remedy, yet it is so in words only; in legal effect, it is a stipulation that a right shall cease and determine if not pursued in a particular way within a limited time, and then it is a fit subject for contract, affecting the right created by it.

"But the remedy does not depend on contract, but upon law, generally the lex fori, regardless of the lex loci contractus, which regulates the construction and legal effect of the contract."

Hall v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 185; Amesbury v. Ins. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 596.

In Matt v. Aid Association, 81 Iowa, 135, 46 N. W. 857, 25 Am. St. Rep. 483, where action was brought in another county of the same state in which the county specified was situated, the court held that "a condition in the contract limiting the venue or place where the action shall be brought is invalid."

We have said that the agreement, if enforced, would empower the defendant, contrary to the will of the Legislature, to choose the courts in which its case should be tried, and thereby deprive of jurisdiction one of the courts authorized to hear the cause. The overwhelming weight of authority is against the exercise of such right. Paper Co. v. Paper Co., supra; Life Ass'n v. Woolen Mills, 82 Fed. 508, 27 C. C. A. 212; Bartlett v. Ins. Co., 46 Me. 500; Shipping Co. v. Lehman (D. C.) 39 Fed. 704, 5 L. R. A. 464. In Rea's Appeal, 13 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 546, it was held that a clause in a trust agreement restricting the jurisdiction to the court of a certain county was entirely without effect, that jurisdiction was not thereby conferred upon the court of the county named, and that the jurisdiction of courts designated by law was not thereby ousted. We are not inadvertent to the fact there are cases apparently maintaining the contrary doctrine. Some of them are cited in the brief of the defendant's counsel; but upon examination it will be seen that the apparent lack of uniformity may generally be found in the difference between provisions that are statutory and those that are contractual. For the reasons given we hold that there is no error in the ruling of his honor. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

In re ROSS' WILL. (No. 419.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1026—New trial not granted for technical error.

Verdicts and judgments will not be set aside and new trial granted for a technical or formal error, but to accomplish this result it must appear, not only that the ruling was erroneous, but that it amounted to a denial of some substantial right, and this rule applies especially where the trial was a long drawn out and vigorous contest.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 901—Error must be affirmatively established.

The presumption on appeal is against error, and the appellant is required to make error appear plainly.

3. Wills \Leftrightarrow 53(2)—Capacity determined as of time of execution.

The mental capacity of testatrix to make a will is to be determined as of the date of its execution, or of its republication, as by a codicil, and not as of the date when the instructions for the preparation of the will were given, though, of course, the conduct of testatrix at the time such instructions were given is competent and relevant on the issue of capacity.

4. Wills \Leftrightarrow 330(1)—Instruction making competency at time of instructions for preparation test held erroneous.

A charge predicated the validity of the will on the condition of testatrix when she gave instructions for its preparation was erroneous as making capacity at that time, rather than at the date of execution, the test, where the evidence showed that several days elapsed between the giving of such instructions and the execution of the will and that testatrix was subject to intermittent spells of melancholia.

5. Trial \Leftrightarrow 253(3)—Instruction held erroneous as withdrawing issue of due execution.

Where the issue of due execution of a will was raised by caveators so that the propounders had the burden of affirmatively showing it, a portion of the charge, asserting that the paper was the will of testatrix if the jury found certain facts as to her mental capacity, was erroneous as taking from the jury the issue of due execution.

6. Wills \Leftrightarrow 330(1)—Instruction as to capacity of feeble-minded person held erroneous.

An instruction that, though the jury should find that testatrix was feeble-minded and alone unable to furnish details concerning her property and the persons to whom she wished to will it, but should further find that testatrix and her sister conferred together, and that the sister gave the necessary details in the presence of testatrix who assented thereto, they should find the writing to be the will of testatrix, was erroneous as to the quantum of mental capacity necessary to the making of a valid will, since testatrix had not the capacity to assent if she had not the capacity to instruct and to construe the term "assent" as implying sufficient capacity would make the charge self-contradictory.

7. Wills \Leftrightarrow 50—Feeble-minded person incapable of furnishing names of beneficiary is incompetent.

A feebleness of mind to such an extent that testatrix was unable to furnish details concerning her property and the persons or institutions to whom she wished to will it renders her incapable of making a will.

Walker, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Union County; Ray, Judge.

Caveat to contest the will of Maggie A. Ross, deceased. From a judgment admitting the will to probate, the caveators appeal. New trial granted.

Alleged mental incapacity, undue influence, and want of due execution are the grounds upon which the caveat is based.

The jury returned the following verdict:

"Is the paper writing propounded, and every part thereof, and the codicil attached thereto, the last will and testament of Maggie Ross, deceased? Ans. Yes."

From the judgment rendered, the caveators appealed.

Walter Clark, Jr., of Charlotte, and Stack, Parker & Craig, of Monroe, for appellants.

Cansler & Cansler, of Charlotte, Vann & Milliken, of Monroe, Frank Armfield, of Concord, and John C. Sikes, W. O. Lemmond and W. B. Love, all of Monroe, for propounders.

STACY, J. [1, 2] The trial of this cause in the superior court was a long drawn out and vigorous contest. It required 15 days to try the case. Nearly 100 witnesses were examined, the record is voluminous, and we would not be disposed to grant a new trial for any technical or formal error. In fact, it is now the settled rule of appellate courts that verdicts and judgments will not be set aside for harmless error, or for mere error and no more. To accomplish this result, it must be made to appear, not only that the ruling complained of was erroneous, but that it was material and prejudicial, amounting to a denial of some substantial right. Our system of appeals, providing for a review of the trial court on questions of law, is founded upon sound public policy, and appellate courts will not encourage litigation by reversing judgments for slight error, or for stated objections, which could not have prejudiced the rights of appellant in any material way. Burris v. Litaker, 181 N. C. 376, 107 S. E. 129; In re Edens' Will, 109 S. E. 269, at the present term, and cases there cited. Again, error will not be presumed; it must be affirmatively established. The appellant is required to show error and he must make it appear plainly, as the presumption is against him. In re Smith's Will, 163 N. C. 464, 79 S. E. 977; Lumber Co. v. Buhmann, 160 N. C. 385, 75 S. E. 1008; Albertson v. Terry, 108 N. C. 75, 12 S. E. 892. (See, also, 1 Michie, Digest, 695, and cases there cited under title "Burden of Showing Error.")

After carefully examining the record, with a full appreciation and observation of the above rules of procedure, we are unable to sustain the following portion of his honor's charge, which was given at the request of the propounders and to which the caveators have specifically excepted:

"Though the jury should find from the evidence that Miss Maggie Ross was feeble-minded and that alone and unassisted she could not have furnished her attorney, H. B. Adams, details concerning her property, nor the persons or institutions to whom she wished to will same, nor directions as to the disposition of said property, but should further find that Maggie Ross and Sallie Ross conferred together with their attorney concerning the execution of their wills, that Sallie Ross gave to said attorneys such details concerning the property of Maggie Ross and the persons or institutions to whom same was to be willed and directions as to the dispositions of said property, Maggie Ross being present hearing such details and directions given, and by words or acts assenting to said details, directions and dispositions, and should further find that Maggie Ross' attorney, H. B. Adams, deceased, faithfully embodied the information, directions and details so given him concerning said property, persons and institutions to whom it should be willed and said disposition of said property, then the court charges you that said paper writing would be the last will and testament of Maggie Ross and that said paper writing offered here for probate was formally executed by her according to the rules given you by the court."

There are several objections to this charge. In the first place, it fails to observe the difference in time between the giving of the instructions to the attorney and the execution of the will. It does not appear upon what date the Misses Ross conferred together with their attorney concerning the execution of their wills; but, in a letter written by said attorney on November 15, 1907, he uses the following sentence:

"It has required a little longer time to write your wills than I anticipated, however, I inclose them to you this evening by registered mail, so as to insure their safe delivery."

The wills were executed five days later, on November 20, 1907. It evidently required some time for their preparation, as the two are rather lengthy and bear evidence of careful drawing with each containing more than 40 separate items.

Ordinarily, the question of a few days might not be capitally important, but this would depend entirely upon the circumstances of the given case. It appears from the instant record that the testatrix was 68 years of age at the time of the execution of her will; she was feeble-minded, in ill health, given to fits of weeping or crying, and was subject to spells of melancholia. Mrs. Harriett Taylor, one of her neighbors, testified:

"She would have these melancholy spells sometimes as often as three times a week, sometimes once a week, sometimes once every two or three weeks, and sometimes twice a week. She would sit for hours and not speak a word. * * * These spells would last a day or two sometimes. She would sit and twirl her thumbs, stroke her chin, and stare out of the window into space. * * * Her memory was not very good. * * * She could not carry on a connected conversation."

There was further evidence tending to show that the testatrix was crying at the time she signed the will. One of the subscribing witnesses gave the following testimony:

"I do not remember anything that Miss Maggie Ross said while we were there outside of her kind of boohoo that I positively recollect. She never said anything about the papers, nor asked me to witness them, to my recollection. At the time Miss Sallie said, 'These are our wills and we want you to witness them,' Miss Maggie was in the room, but I can't be positive as to just what position, but I know we were all in there together. I can't say I know what she heard."

[3, 4] The competency of the testatrix to make the will in question is to be determined as of the date of its execution, or of its republication, as by a codicil (In re Journeay, 162 N. Y. 611, 57 N. E. 1113), and not when instructions for its preparation were given (Memorial Home v. Haeg, 204 Ill. 422, 68 N. E. 568; Mitchell v. Corpening, 124 N. C. 472, 32 S. E. 798; 40 Cyc. 998; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. 493, 2 L. R. A. 668). Of course, the conduct of the testatrix at the time of this conference is competent and relevant, as bearing upon the question of her testamentary capacity; but, notwithstanding her mental condition at that time, this would not necessarily establish her competency to execute the will at the subsequent date. 28 R. C. L. 93. The above special instruction, however, takes no note of this difference in time and really makes her capacity at the time of the conference, and not at the date of signing, the test of her ability to execute the will. This is not in keeping with the law as heretofore declared. Claffey v. Ledwith, 56 N. J. Eq. 333, 38 Atl. 433.

[5] Again, the giving of this special prayer was erroneous because it takes from the jury the question as to the due execution of the will. This was one of the grounds of the caveat, and the burden was on the propounders to establish the formal execution of the paper writing alleged to be the last will and testament of the said Maggie A. Ross. Mayo v. Jones, 78 N. C. 402.

[8] But the overshadowing objection to this instruction is to the substance of the charge bearing upon the quantum of mind, or mental capacity, necessary to the making of a valid will. It will be observed that the basis of this prayer is not only that the testatrix could not alone and unassisted give her attorney details concerning her property, but that she could not inform him of the persons or institutions, to whom she wished to will the same. The practical effect of this instruction was to say that although Maggie Ross was incapable of making a will, yet, if she assented to what her sister did, such conduct on her part would meet the requirements of the law and amount to a valid testamentary disposition of her property. We do not think she could understandingly and competently assent to her sister's act when, at the time, she was wanting in the requisite mental capacity to act for herself. We are not advertent to any authority holding that one person may make a will for another, when the person for whom the will is to be made is wanting in testamentary capacity. In fact, the very statement of the proposition would seem to refute itself.

If the word "assent," appearing in its present context, is to be construed as giving such assent as the law requires, with sufficient capacity so to do, then the charge is self-contradictory; because the instruction starts with the assumption that the testatrix is without sufficient testamentary capacity. If she be without the necessary capacity of mind, then she could not legally assent to the act of another in disposing of her property by will. But in all events the instruction was prejudicial to the rights of caveators, and we must hold it for reversible error.

[7] If a woman who is so feeble-minded that, alone and unassisted, she cannot furnish her attorney "details concerning her property, nor the persons or institutions to whom she wished to will same, nor directions as to the disposition of said property," then it can hardly be said that she is capable of making a will, disposing of a large estate, under the test as laid down in this and other jurisdictions. Bond v. Mfg. Co., 140 N. C. 381, 52 S. E. 929; Sprinkle v. Wellborn, 140 N. C. 181, 52 S. E. 666, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, 111 Am. St. Rep. 827; Cameron v. Power Co., 138 N. C. 365, 50 S. E. 695, 107 Am. St. Rep. 532; Bost v. Bost, 87 N. C. 477; Slaughter v. Heath, 127 Ga. 747, 57 S. E. 69, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1 and note.

In Barnhardt v. Smith, 86 N. C. 473, Smith, C. J., gives the following terse and plain statement of the law, which has been cited with approval in many subsequent decisions:

"The rule laid down by Lord Coke, 'that the person must be able to understand what he is about,' approved in Moffitt v. Witherspoon, 32 N. C. 185, Horne v. Horne, 31 N. C. 99, and more recently in Paine v. Roberts, 82 N. C. 451, as a general and practical rule for the guidance of juries, approximates an accurate statement of the law as to the degree of mental capacity required to make a valid disposition of property as the subject will admit."

See, also, Lawrence v. Steel, 66 N. C. 584, and In re Broach's Will, 172 N. C. 520, 90 S. E. 681, and cases there cited.

Finally, in the recent case of In re Craven's Will, 169 N. C. 561, 86 S. E. 587, Mr. Justice Walker, speaking for a unanimous court, clearly states the law, with citation of authorities, bearing upon the question of testamentary capacity, and the following quotation from the well-considered opinion delivered in that case would seem to be decisive of the question now before us:

"It follows that one who is incapable at the moment of comprehending the nature and extent of his property, the disposition to be made of it by testament, and the persons who are or should be provided for, is not of a sound, disposing mind. And if this mental condition be really shown to exist, the will must fail, even though he may have a glimmering knowledge that he is endeavoring to make a testamentary disposition of his property. It is here to be observed that some of the earlier cases have laid down the rule of testamentary capacity with much more subservience to and consideration for the purported expression of one's last wishes. They seem to have assumed that there must be a total want of understanding in order to render one intestate; that a court ought to refrain from measuring the capacity of a testator, if he have any at all; and that unless totally deprived of reason and non compos mentis, he is the lawful disposer of his own property, so that his will stands as a reason for his actions, harsh as may be its provisions. This ascribes altogether too great sanctity to the testamentary act of an individual as opposed to the law's own will set forth by the statutes and founded in common sense; and it is well that the best considered of our latest cases recede from so extreme and false a standard. Notwithstanding the modern rule to be favored, we should still, however, bear in mind that incapacity is more than weak capacity; and, as already intimated, mere feebleness of mind does not suffice to invalidate a will, if the testator acted freely and had sufficient mind to comprehend intelligently the nature and effect of the act he was performing, the estate he was undertaking to dispose of, and the relations he held to the various persons who might naturally expect to become the objects of his bounty.

"While it is true that it is not the duty of the court to strain after probate, nor in any case to grant it where grave doubts remain unremoved and great difficulties oppose themselves to so doing, neither is it the duty of the court to lean against probate, and impeach the will merely because it is made in old age or upon the sick bed, after the mind has lost a portion of its former vigor and has become weakened by age or disease. Weakness of memory, vacillation of purpose, credulity, vagueness of thought, may all consist with adequate testamentary capacity, under favorable circumstances. And a comprehensive grasp of all the requisites of testamentary knowledge in one review appears unnecessary, provided the enfeebled testator understands in detail all that he is about, and chooses rationally between one disposition and another. Schouler on Wills (2d Ed.) 68 to 72, and notes. In the important case of Delafield v. Parish, 25 N. Y. 9, the court, after announcing the fairer rule of testamentary capacity above set forth, spoke of the testator's mind as acting without external pressure wherever it acted properly. 'The testator must,' said the court, 'have sufficient active memory to collect in his mind, without (insidious) prompting, the particulars or elements of the business to be transacted, and to hold them in his mind a sufficient length of time to perceive at least their obvious relations to each other, and be able to form some rational judgment in regard to them'; and we may add, long enough to have been able to dictate or write out his wishes, and to execute the will with all due formalities."

There are other exceptions appearing on the record, worthy of consideration; but, as they are not likely to arise again, we deem it unnecessary to consider them now.

New trial.

WALKER, J. (concurring in the result). We have a well-established rule in appellate courts that, in reviewing a charge of the court, we should read it as one connected whole, and not distributively, allowing one part to correct any seeming error in another part of it, provided the two are not in deadly conflict. If we follow this rule, not more clearly stated than in State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283, where human life was the issue, and examine the extract from the charge in this case in the light of other portions of it, we will find most assuredly that the law as to the mental capacity required to make a will was fully and accurately stated by the learned presiding judge, and the jury were especially instructed to consider the other parts of the charge to which we have referred in connection with what was to follow, and told that if, within the definition and explanation given to them by the court, the testator did not have sufficient mental capacity, at the time she executed the script, they should find against its validity. It is my opinion that there was no error in the selected instruction, when properly construed, but surely there was none if we read it in connection with those that preceded it. But, even if there was any error in the instruction of the presiding judge selected by the court as the ground for a new trial, there was a codicil to the will which, in law, amounted to a republication of it (Watson v. Hinson, 162 N. C. 72, 77 S. E. 1089, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 870; Gulland v. Gulland, 81 W. Va. 487, 94 S. E. 943; Lawrence v. Burnett, 109 S. C. 416, 96 S. E. 144), and there was no such objection to the charge, as to the execution and validity of the codicil. For all that appears, she executed the same without any help or suggestion from others, and this cured any error in regard to the will, if there was any.

But I think there was an error otherwise in the charge, which was prejudicial to the caveators; that is, if we are to follow a decision of this court of recent date, on competency of evidence as to mental capacity, and especially with reference to declarations and conduct of the testator. While I question the correctness of that decision, and of others which may have followed it, it has the weight of authority, and precedent, until it is reversed or modified, and should have been heeded by the court below.

Therefore, I concur in the result, but dissent from the opinion so long as the new trial is based upon the error alleged in it.

WOOSLEY v. COMMISSIONERS OF DAVIDSON COUNTY et al. (No. 400A.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 16 1921.)

1. Schools and school districts ~~§~~42(2) — Board of education without power to superimpose high school district on existing districts.

Under C. S. §§ 5460, 5473, authorizing the county board of education to divide the county or any part into school districts, etc., the board, prior to Pub. Laws 1921, c. 179, was without authority to superimpose a high school district on existing districts not consolidated or abolished, but still functioning for other than high school purposes, as the statute refers to the establishment, etc., of districts in the sense of territorial divisions or geographical regions.

2. Statutes ~~§~~96(1)—Special law incorporating school districts and authorizing issuance of bonds ineffectual when district not lawfully created.

As the action of the board of education of Davidson county in establishing the Lexington high school district was beyond its power, the special acts of 1921 incorporating such district and authorizing it to issue bonds are inoperative, in view of Const. art. 2, § 29, forbidding the Legislature to pass any local, private, or special acts establishing or changing the line of school districts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Webb, Judge.

Controversy submitted without action on an agreed statement of facts between O. V. Woosley and the Commissioners of Davidson County and others. From a judgment granting an injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Controversy without action, heard upon an agreed statement of facts, the material and controlling parts of which are as follows:

"(1) That the board of education of Davidson county in meeting duly assembled on the 16th day of February, 1921, created or attempted to create a school district, to be known as the Lexington high school district, by adopting the following resolution by unanimous vote; all the commissioners present and voting:

"Be it resolved, by the board of education of Davidson county, that it is in the opinion of the said board for the best interest and for the educational advantage of the residents of the following named school districts, to wit, Dacotah district, Fowler district, Hargrove district, Greenwood district, Pilgrim district, Nakomis district, Southside district and Lexington district, that a high school district be created to comprise the said districts.

"Therefore, be it further resolved, that a high school district, to be known as the Lexington high school district, comprising the districts above set forth, be, and the same is hereby, created."

"That prior to February 16, 1921, no school district was in existence containing as a whole the territory now embraced in the alleged school district known as the Lexington high school district, and no other or further action than that set forth above has been taken by the county board of education in relation to the creation of said school district.

"(2) That the General Assembly of North Carolina, at its regular session of 1921, passed an act (not yet published in book form), entitled 'An act to authorize the Lexington high school district of Davidson county to issue bonds and to provide a tax levy for the payment thereof and a tax levy for maintenance,' which act was ratified on the 2d day of March, 1921.

"(3) That the General Assembly of North Carolina, at its regular session of 1921, passed an act (not yet published in book form), entitled 'An act incorporating the Lexington high school district,' which act was ratified on the 7th day of March, 1921. That said act created a governing body for the proper and more efficient management of the Lexington high school district, which governing body was known and designated as the Lexington high school commissioners and was constituted a body politic and corporate with the power to exercise the rights and privileges incident to corporations, and the said act made other provisions for the conduct of the high school in said district.

"(4) That pursuant to the first act above mentioned, ratified the 2d day of March, 1921, and as provided therein, the board of education of Davidson county on the 7th day of March, 1921, petitioned the board of county commissioners of Davidson county to call an election in the Lexington high school district for the purpose of submitting to the qualified voters of said district the question of the issuance of $225,000 of bonds, to be used in erecting and equipping a school building in said district and the purchase of a site therefor, and the levy of an annual tax for the payment of principal and interest, and also for the purpose of submitting to the voters the question of the levy of an annual tax for the maintenance of the high school so erected.

"(5) That pursuant to the said petition, and under the authority conferred upon them by the said special act, the board of commissioners of Davidson county, at their regular meeting on the 7th day of March, 1921, granted the prayer of the board of education as set forth in said petition, and ordered a new registration of voters, and ordered the said special election to be held in the Lexington high school district on the 19th day of April, 1921, which said election was duly carried.

"(6) That of the eight school districts mentioned and set forth in the resolution of the county board of education, passed February 16, 1921, as the districts which are to be comprised in the Lexington high school district, six are school districts created by the county board of education under the general law, and without any vote of the electors for such creation, and no tax is levied therein. In each of the said districts a school committee is in charge of the school properties therein. That one of said districts, to wit, Nakomis district, is a special tax school district and by vote of the electors thereof a local tax is levied for the maintenance of the school. That the Lexington district referred to in said resolution is not a school district in any sense save that the boundaries thereof are coterminous with the boundaries of the town of Lexington, the charter of which town vests the management of the schools therein in a special board of school trustees, and the town levies a tax therein for school purposes and for the payment of school bonds issued by the town for the school buildings.

"(7) That the board of education of Davidson county, in the resolution adopted February 16, 1921, did not attempt to consolidate the eight districts mentioned in the said resolution into one district and thereby wipe out and abolish the several then existing school districts, and no action has been taken by the county board of education or any other board to annul or repeal the creation of said constituent districts or to abolish the said committees having charge of the school property in said districts, and all of the same are continuing to function as if the Lexington high school district had not been created, and the school taxes have continued to be levied and collected in the said Nakomis district and in the town of Lexington, for the said county board of education attempted to create the Lexington high school district by overlapping or superimposing the said district on the eight districts comprised therein, and pursuant to the authority contained in the second act above mentioned, ratified March 7, 1921, has elected a board of commissioners for the said Lexington high school district, the members of which having qualified."

"(9) That is the declared intention of the board of education of Davidson county and the board of commissioners of Lexington high school district to erect a high school building and to maintain therein a high school for the attendance of pupils residing within the so-called Lexington high school district, who are being taught those subjects commonly called 'high school subjects' or studies, and pursuant to said declared purpose the board of commissioners of Davidson county, pursuant to the vote cast at said election, have authorized the issuance of the said $225,000 of bonds, and are preparing to issue same, and are preparing to levy the tax for the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds, and are preparing to levy a tax for the maintenance of the said schools; and the said board of education of Davidson county, in accordance with the provisions of the said special act, are preparing to sell said bonds."

The plaintiff is a resident and taxpayer of Davidson county, living within and having property located in that section of the county which, for the purposes of this action, is designated as the Lexington high school district.

From a judgment continuing and making permanent the temporary restraining order, and holding that the board of education of Davidson county was without authority to create the Lexington high school district in the manner proposed and that the issuance of the bonds in question was without warrant of law, the defendants appealed.

J. L. Morehead, of Durham, for appellants.
Raper & Raper, of Lexington, for appellee.

STACY, J. It is conceded at the outset that the board of education and the commissioners of Davidson county have not proceeded under C. S. § 5511, for the establishment of a central high school, or high schools in a township, as provided by said section. It should also be noted that the resolution of the board of education, purporting to create the Lexington high school district, and the two special acts of the Legislature, relating thereto, were all passed prior to the enactment, on March 8, 1921, of chapter 179, Public Laws 1921, amending the public school law of the state. Hence the validity of the resolution and the special acts in question must be determined by the law as it existed at the time of their passage, there being no suggestion of a ratification by any subsequent legislation.

[1] The sections of the school law, chiefly relevant and bearing upon the questions now before us, are:

C. S. § 5469, which provides:

"The county board of education shall divide the townships, or the entire county or any part of the county, into convenient school districts, as compact in form as practicable. It shall consult the convenience and necessities of each race in settling the boundaries of the school district for each race."

And C. S. § 5473, which is in terms as follows:

"The county board of education is hereby authorized and empowered to redistrict the entire county or any part thereof and to consolidate school districts wherever and whenever in its judgment the redistricting or the consolidation of districts will better serve the educational interests of the township, or the county, or any part of the county."

It will be observed that these statutes, which were passed in obedience to article 9, § 3, of the Constitution, confer upon the several county boards of education authority (1) to divide the townships, or the entire county, or any part thereof, into convenient school districts (not to exceed the limit fixed by C. S. § 5472); and (2) to redistrict the entire county, or any part thereof, and to consolidate school districts whenever and wherever such, in their judgment, will better serve the educational interest of the townships or of the county.

This grant of power from the Legislature, we apprehend, refers to the establishment, consolidation, etc., of districts in the sense of territorial divisions or geographical regions (Howell v. Howell, 151 N. C. 575, 66 S. E. 571; 18 C. J. 1292), and not in the sense of dividing or segregating pupils as distinguished from the land on which they live. "In its ordinary meaning the word 'district' is commonly and properly used to designate any one of the various divisions or subdivisions into which the state is divided for political or other purposes, and may refer either to a congressional, judicial, senatorial, representative, school or road district, depending always upon the connection in which it is used." Olive v. State, 11 Neb. 1, 13, 7 N. W. 444, 446.

Giving to the words of the statute their usual and customary meaning, we have found no authority for the establishment by the county board of education of such a district as the "Lexington high school district" (No. 7 agreed facts), which, to be more exact, might properly be termed a superdistrict, in that it is sought to be created by superimposing the same upon the eight districts comprised therein. An arrangement of this kind may be very desirable and helpful in the building up of an educational system for the state; but, as now advised, we do not think the Legislature had so declared its purpose and policy at the time of the attempted establishment of the district in question. Nor do we wish to be understood, by what is said here, as suggesting that probably such a district might be created under chapter 179, Public Laws 1921. This latter question is not before us, and any expression presently made would be obiter, and we make none.

[2] Holding, as we do, that the resolution of the board of education of Davidson county, passed on the 16th day of February, 1921, was insufficient to accomplish the desired purpose, and that the establishment of the proposed district was therefore ineffectual, it follows that the special acts of the Legislature, incorporating and authorizing said district to issue bonds, must be declared inoperative. Ex nihilo nihil fit.

There being no valid district in existence, the Legislature now is without authority itself to pass any local, private, or special act establishing or changing the lines of school districts. Const. art. 2, § 29; Sechrist v. Com'rs, 181 N. C. 511, 107 S. E. 508; Trustees v. Trust Co., 181 N. C. 306, 107 S. E. 130.

The judgment of his honor permanently enjoining and perpetually restraining the defendant from issuing the bonds in question must be upheld upon the facts now appearing on the instant record.

SELWYN HOTEL CO. v. GRIFFIN et al.

Appeal and error — 1126—Judgment affirmed on motion on ground that appeal was frivolous and for purposes of delay.

Where, defendants not having docketed a transcript on their appeal in a proceeding in summary ejectment, plaintiff filed a certified statement from the clerk, and affidavits showing that the case on appeal had not been settled and served within the time allowed, that defendants had no bona fide defense and had appealed for purposes of delay, and defendants in their answer simply asserted that they were not bound to bring up the appeal to that term and did not show that they had any bona fide defense, the judgment will be affirmed and the opinion certified down instanter on the ground that the appeal was frivolous and for delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Ray, Judge.

Proceeding in summary ejectment by the Selwyn Hotel Company against James P. Griffin and others, commenced before a justice of the peace and appealed to the superior court. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed on motion.

This was a proceeding in summary ejectment, begun before a justice of the peace and tried at September term, 1921. On November 11, 1921, the defendants not having docketed a transcript, the plaintiff filed a certified statement from the clerk, from which it appears that at the trial the jury, upon issues submitted, found that the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the premises; that the market rental value since 1921 was $125 per month; that the judge rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for possession of the premises and $125 per month rental from the 1st of January, 1921; that the defendant Charles H. Garmon appealed; that he had been allowed 15 days in which to serve case on appeal; that the term of court adjourned September 17, 1921; that the defendant did not serve his case on appeal within said 15 days, and thereafter on application to the judge he was allowed another 15 days to make up and serve case on appeal; and that at the expiration of said time he had not done so, and upon said record the plaintiff moved to docket and dismiss under Rule 17 (81 S. E. ix), and also because upon its face the appeal was frivolous.

Jake F. Newell, of Charlotte, for appellants.

H. C. Dockery and John M. Robinson, both of Charlotte, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. In addition to the facts above set out, W. T. Wilson, an officer of the plaintiff, the Selwyn Hotel Company, files an affidavit that the defendant C. H. Garmon and associates were occupying the barber shop in the Selwyn Hotel in Charlotte, N. C., under a three-year lease which expired December 31, 1920; that the said Selwyn Hotel Company duly leased said premises for the year 1921 to other parties for a monthly rental of $150 per month; that the defendant C. H. Garmon led the plaintiff and the said lessees to believe that he would vacate the premises at the termination of the lease, but at the end of his lease he wrongfully and illegally refused to give up possession of said premises, and has wrongfully withheld the same to the serious damage and inconvenience to the plaintiff and the lessees since January 1, 1921; that the only defense which the said defendant has ever asserted was the failure of the plaintiff to give him notice of the termination of the lease, but that he has wrongfully and illegally held possession of said premises without any just cause or excuse, and that the appeal which he took from the justice of the peace to the superior court and the appeal which he took from the superior court to the Supreme Court were taken solely for purposes of delay, and that this delay is resulting in serious loss and inconvenience to the plaintiff.

This motion with affidavits and certificate was served on the attorney of the defendant November 9, 1921. The defendant answering the appeal simply asserts that he was not bound to bring up the appeal to this term of the court, and that he has been unable to get a stenographer to make a copy of the transcript; she being very busy.

It is apparent that this is purely an attempt to use the process of the court, which is intended to correct errors, for the purposes of delay, and that the appeal is entirely frivolous. It does not appear that there was any assertion of a bona fide defense either before the justice or in the superior court, nor is there any allegation of any defense in the answer to this motion.

In Barnes v. Saleeby, 177 N. C. 260, 98 S. E. 708, upon somewhat similar circumstances this court held:

"The plaintiff's motion to dismiss in this court should be allowed wherever it appears upon the record, as in this case, that no serious assignment of error is made. * * * Blount v. Jones, 175 N. C. 708; Ludwick v. Mining Co., 171 N. C. 61."

In Blount v. Jones, 175 N. C. 708, 95 S. E. 541, a case exactly in point, this court held:

"Appeals from the superior court as a matter of right must be taken bona fide for the purpose of reviewing alleged error, and when no serious assignment of error is made and it appears that the appeal is frivolous and for the purpose of delay, it will be dismissed on appellee's motion"

—citing Ludwick v. Mining Co., 171 N. C. 61, 87 S. E. 949, in which this court held, Brown, J., delivering the opinion, that—

"While ordinarily an appeal lies to the Supreme from the superior court, as a matter of right, it is required that it must be bona fide for the purpose of reviewing some alleged error; and when from the record it appears that the appeal is frivolous and made solely for delay, it will, upon due notice to the appellant, be dismissed upon appellee's motion."

It not only appears upon the record sent up and by the affidavit in support of the motion to dismiss to be a frivolous appeal and from the answer that there is no bona fide defense, but it is not even alleged that the defense has given bond for payment of the judgment of the rent. But even if this had been done, though not alleged, still there is no allegation of a bona fide defense even suggested in the answer, and as the defendant has lost the right to have the case settled on appeal by not having done so within the prescribed time, to carry the case over to the spring term could only result in the appeal being dismissed at that time and the plaintiff would be wronged by being kept out of possession for several months more. The courts cannot allow their process to be thus abused.

Final judgment will be entered here affirming the judgment below, and this opinion will be certified down instant to the superior court of Mecklenburg (Caldwell v. Wilson, 121 N. C. 423, 424, 28 S. E. 363), and the plaintiff will be put in prompt possession of the premises. Barnhill v. Thompson, 122 N. C. 498, 29 S. E. 720, and other cases, are to the same purport.

HULIN v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (No. 475.)

Telegraphs and telephones §74(1)—Instruction and issue authorizing recovery on cause of action as to which nonsuit granted held error.

In an action for delay in delivery of two telegrams, where a nonsuit was granted as to the cause of action respecting one of the telegrams, it was error to submit the issue whether defendant negligently failed to transmit and deliver the telegrams, or either of them, and to charge that the jury should answer such issue "Yes" if plaintiff had satisfied them that defendant negligently failed to transmit the telegrams, or either of them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Randolph County; Bryson, Judge.

Action by J. W. Hulin against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged negligent failure to transmit and promptly deliver two telegrams, one announcing the serious illness and the other the death of plaintiff's mother.

The first message was sent from Star, N. C., at 1 p. m. on December 26, 1919, approximately an hour before the death of plaintiff's mother, and the second, or death, message, was sent from Troy, N. C., at 5:12 p. m. on the same day. This last message was taken "subject to delay," as the defendant had no telegraph office at Denton, N. C., the plaintiff's home. Both telegrams reached the plaintiff by mail about 5 p. m. on the following day.

The plaintiff had seen his mother on Thursday before Christmas and knew of her illness. She was about 90 years old, and her demise was not unexpected. Plaintiff lived between 20 and 25 miles from his mother's home; and, while he had no telephone in his house, nor she in hers, yet such communication was available.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, his honor granted the defendant's motion for judgment as of nonsuit on the first cause of action, or the one growing out of the defendant's alleged negligent failure to deliver the first message within a reasonable time.

On the second cause of action, or the one based upon the defendant's alleged negligent failure to deliver the death message, as required by law, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendant receive for transmission, and negligently fail to transmit and deliver, the telegrams mentioned in the complaint or either of them? A. Yes.

"(2) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? A. $1,250."

From a judgment on the verdict in favor of plaintiff, the defendant appealed.

J. A. Spence, of Ashboro, and Tillett & Guthrie, of Charlotte, for appellant.

Hammer & Moser, of Ashboro, for appellee.

STACY, J. The ruling of his honor in granting the defendant's motion for judgment as of nonsuit on the initial cause of action, or on the one growing out of the defendant's alleged negligent failure to deliver the first message within a reasonable time, is not before us for review, as the plaintiff has not appealed. But it would seem that this position is entirely correct, in so far as any substantial damages are concerned; for even if the telegram had been delivered without delay, the plaintiff could not possibly thereafter have reached the bedside of his mother prior to her death. The question of a technical breach of duty, involving only nominal damages, is not presented for consideration. Smith v. Telegraph Co., 167 N. C. 248, 83 S. E. 475, and cases there cited.

Notwithstanding the judgment of nonsuit on the initial cause of action, it will be observed that the issues submitted to the jury are not confined to the second cause of action, or to the one based upon the defendant's alleged negligent failure to transmit and deliver the death message in due time, or with reasonable dispatch. The first issue in terms refers to both of the telegrams or to either of them. Hence it does not conclusively appear, because the verdict does not necessarily mean, that the defendant was negligent with respect to the handling of the second, or death, message. The alternative wording of the issue is further intensified by the following portion of his honor's charge, to which the defendant has excepted, and the same is assigned as error:

"Has the plaintiff satisfied you from the evidence of its greater weight that the defendant received the messages spoken of, that it negligently failed to transmit them, or either of them? If the plaintiff has so satisfied you, answer the first issue 'Yes.'"

Having entered a judgment of nonsuit on the first cause of action, we think this instruction was erroneous, because it required an affirmative answer, though the jury may have found no negligence as alleged for the basis of the second cause of action. It may have been answered from the evidence bearing upon the transmission and delivery of the first message, or the one sent from Star.

For the error as indicated, the case will be remanded, to the end that there may be another trial, or a venire de novo.

New trial.

In re JOHNSON'S WILL. (No. 103.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Executors and administrators §32(1)—Wills §221—Letters testamentary may be recalled if will is spurious.

A court, vested with power and jurisdiction to admit wills to probate, may, on motion and after due notice, set aside such proof in common form and recall the letters testamentary issued thereon, when it is shown that an invalid or spurious will has been imposed upon the court by reason of perjured testimony or other fraudulent means and practices effective in procuring the judgment.

2. Jury §16(8)—Matters of fact determined by court on motion to recall letters testamentary.

In proceeding to recall letters testamentary on ground that invalid or spurious will has been imposed on the court by reason of perjured testimony or fraudulent means and practices effective in procuring the judgment, a jury trial is not allowed as of right, but the matters in dispute are considered and determined as questions of fact by the court before which the action is pending, or to which it may be properly carried by appeal.

3. Executors and administrators §32(1)—Petition to set aside letters testamentary not granted as matter of right.

Petition to set aside letters testamentary, on the ground that spurious will has been imposed upon the court by reason of perjured testimony or other fraudulent means and practices effective in procuring the judgment, is not granted as a matter of strict right, but, by analogy to the relief afforded in setting aside irregular judgments and orders, is referred to the sound legal discretion of the court, to be allowed only on full and satisfactory proof and on condition that the applicant has proceeded with proper diligence.

4. Limitation of actions §100(10)—Bill to set aside spurious will must be brought in 3 years after fraud discoverable.

A bill against devisee to set aside a will on the ground that it is spurious, and was imposed upon the court by perjured testimony, must be brought within three years from the time the fraud was known or should have been discovered in the exercise of ordinary diligence, under C. S. § 441, subd. 9.

In Caveat Proceedings.

5. Wills §111(3)—Testator may permit other person to sign.

It is not necessary to a valid written will that it be manually signed by the testator, and if his name is signed thereto by some one in his presence, and by his direction, or if such a signature is acknowledged by him as his signature to the instrument as his last will, it will suffice, under C. S. §§ 4131-4144.

6. Wills §260—Caveat 10 years after probate held not filed in time.

A caveat filed by one not under disability more than 10 years after probate of a will in common form was filed too late, under C. S. § 4158, where caveator did nothing to challenge or in any way question the validity of the will or probate thereof during such time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Kerr, Judge.

In the matter of the will of Betty V. Johnson, deceased. Petition by Dr. J. A. H. Edwards against the devisees to set aside the will, and petitioner also entered caveat to the will. From a judgment for devisees, petitioner appeals, and from a judgment establishing the will, the caveator appeals. Judgments affirmed.

From the record it appears that the last will and testament of Mrs. Betty V. Johnson, deceased, had been formally admitted to probate before the clerk of Halifax county, acting as probate judge, on May 17, 1907, said will purporting to have been made and duly witnessed on June 1, 1906; that Dr. J. A. H. Edwards, a nephew of testatrix, had heretofore, in 1920, instituted an action in the superior court in the nature of a bill in equity against the devisees in said will to set aside the same and the probate thereof, on the ground of fraud and undue influence, etc.; that said cause had been dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff's remedy, if he had one, should be sought by direct proceedings before the clerk, where the probate was had. See case, Edwards v. White, reported in 180 N. C. p. 55, 103 S. E. 901. That opinion having been certified down, the plaintiff, in November, 1920, filed this petition before said clerk, acting as probate judge, alleging that the probate of said will had been procured by fraudulent and perjured testimony; that same had not been made of its purported date, but in 1907, when the alleged Mrs. Johnson, his aunt, had been taken to the hospital, and when she was mentally and physically unable to execute this or any other instrument affecting her property, and said will had been thus fraudulently imposed upon the court, and was in fact and truth a spurious will, etc. These allegations were all denied by the propounders, whereupon the petitioner demanded and moved that a jury be allowed on the facts and the cause be transferred to the superior court in term for that purpose. This motion was overruled, and petitioner excepted. Thereupon the parties offered full affidavits in support and resistance of the petition, and the clerk, having heard and considered the same, entered judgment as follows:

"The court is of opinion, and finds as a fact, that no fraud has been perpetrated upon the undersigned clerk at the time of the probate of said will, and the issuing of letters testamentary; that said last will and testament was duly probated as provided by law, as appears from such probate, and the undersigned finds as a fact that said paper writing is the last will and testament of the said Betty V. Johnson; that the said proceedings be dismissed and petitioner taxed with the costs."

On appeal this cause was again considered by his honor John H. Kerr, Judge, presiding, and judgment entered fully confirming the action of the clerk. From which said judgment petitioner, Dr. Edwards, appealed.

It appears also that in November, 1920, the petitioner, Dr. Edwards, in a separate proceedings entered a caveat to said will and the probate thereof, and on the issues and devisavit vel non and the statute of limitations, which had been duly pleaded, the cause was tried before his honor John H. Kerr and a jury, at said January term of Halifax court, 1921, and verdict and findings made as follows:

"(1) Is the paper writing propounded and every part thereof the last will and testament of Mrs. Bettie V. Johnson, deceased. Answer: Yes (by the jury).

"(2) Is the caveat filed in this proceedings barred by the statute? Answer: Yes (by consent, the court answered the last issue)."

There was judgment establishing the will, and also to the effect that, on the admitted facts, the right of caveator to proceed was barred by the statute applicable. Caveator excepted and appealed.

R. B. Blackburn, of Atlanta, Ga., and Don Gilliam, of Tarboro, for appellant.

Travis & Travis, of Savannah, Ga., A. P. Kitchin and Stuart Smith, both of Scotland Neck, and Daniel & Durrence, of Claxton, Ga., for appellee.

On Petition to Set Aside the Probate.

HOKE, J. [1-3] It is recognized in this state that a court vested with power and jurisdiction to admit wills to probate may, on motion and after due notice, set aside such proof in common form and recall the letters testamentary issued thereon when it is shown that an invalid or spurious will has been imposed upon the court by reason of perjured testimony or other fraudulent means and practices effective in procuring the judgment. Edwards v. Edwards, 25 N. C. 82; Dickenson v. Stewart, 5 N. C. 99. And on a hearing of this character a jury trial is not allowed as of right, but the matters in dispute are considered and determined as questions of fact by the court before which the action is pending or to which it may be properly carried by appeal. In Re Battle, 158 N. C. 388, 74 S. E. 23; Taylor v. Carrow, 156 N. C. 6, 72 S. E. 76; Edwards v. Cobb, Executor, 95 N. C. 5. Under proper procedure, therefore, both the clerk and the judge on appeal from him, after fully considering the evidence offered, have found that the petitioner's allegation of perjury and fraud are not sustained, but that the will and every part thereof is the last will and testament of Betty V. Johnson, the alleged testatrix. Apart from this, a petition of this kind is not granted as a matter of strict right, but by analogy to the relief afforded in setting aside irregular judgments and orders, the same is referred to the sound legal discretion of the court, to be allowed only on full and satisfactory proof, and on condition that the applicant has proceeded with proper diligence.

[4] From a perusal of the facts in evidence it appears, and without substantial contradiction, that this petitioner was aware of this will and its contents very shortly after its probate in 1907; that for nearly 10 years he made no efforts to investigate the facts attendant on its execution, and took no steps to challenge the validity of this probate until his suit commenced in 1919 or 1920, nearly 13 years after the probate of the will in common form, which he now seeks to set aside. It is urged for petitioner that he did not know of the impeaching facts now advanced and insisted on by him till 1917, and within 3 years before his suit in the superior court, and, by analogy to the statute, allowing a suit on account of fraud or mistake to be instituted within 3 years after discovery of the facts constituting the fraud, he should now be heard. This statute applicable to an adversary proceeding between litigants is not necessarily controlling in a hearing of this character, but if it were otherwise the position would not avail the petitioner on the facts presented in the record, for the courts, in the interpretation of the statute referred to, have held that under this section a "cause of action will be deemed to have accrued * * * when the fraud was known or should have been discovered in the exercise of ordinary care" (Peacock v. Barnes, 142 N. C. 215, 55 S. E. 99); and, speaking further to the question in that case, the court said:

We do not hold, as appellant contends, "that the statute begins to run from the actual discovery of the mistake, absolutely and regardless of any negligence or laches by the party aggrieved. * * * A man should not be allowed to close his eyes to facts readily observable by ordinary attention, and maintain for his own advantage the position of ignorance. Such a principle would enable a careless man, and by reason of his carelessness, to extend his right to recover for an indefinite length of time, and thus defeat the very purpose the statute was designed and framed to accomplish. In such case, a man's failure to note facts * * * should be imputed to him for knowledge, and in the absence of any active or continued effort to conceal a fraud * * * or some essential facts embraced in the inquiry, we think the correct interpretation of the statute should be that the cause of action will be deemed to have accrued from the time the fraud * * * was known or should have been discovered in the exercise of ordinary diligence."

The condition of this testatrix when taken to the hospital in 1907, the time petitioner alleges the fraud took place, was known to him, or could have been readily discovered. Every witness that he now offers has all along been available to him. It is not shown that anything has been done by the propounders nor any one else to conceal the facts or mislead the petitioner in any way, nor that the facts could not have been readily ascertained if he had chosen to make inquiry. It is in keeping with a sound public policy that the settlement of these estates and titles and ownership under them should not be kept open indefinitely, and, in any aspect of this evidence, we are of opinion that the prayer of the petitioner has been properly denied.

Affirmed.

In the Caveat Proceedings.

As heretofore stated, the cause in the caveat proceedings was determined on two issues: (1) Whether the paper writing offered and every part thereof was the last will and testament of Betty V. Johnson, deceased. (2) Is the caveat filed in this proceedings barred by the statute?

[6] On the first issue there was evidence offered by the propounders tending to prove the formal execution of the will, which was submitted in accord with the statutes appertaining to the subject and authoritative decisions construing the same, the court instructing the jury, among other things, that it was not required that the witnesses to a last will and testament should subscribe in the presence of each other, nor was it necessary to a valid written will that it should be manually signed by the alleged testatrix; but if her name was signed thereto by some one in her presence and by her direction, or if such a signature was acknowledged by her as her signature to the instrument as her last will, it would suffice. Watson v. Hinson, 162 N. C. 72, 77 S. E. 1089, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 870; In Re Broach's Will, 172 N. C. 520, 90 S. E. 681; In Re Herring's Will, 152 N. C. 258, 67 S. E. 570; Consolidated Statutes, §§ 4131-4144.

And in reply to the impeaching evidence on the part of the caveator there was further evidence for the propounder tending to support the validity of the will. For the caveator there were facts in evidence permitting the inference that the paper writing offered was not signed or executed at the time it purported, in 1906, but was in fact written in 1907, after the alleged testatrix had been taken to the hospital, when she was entirely unfitted and incapable of making any valid disposition of her property. And, further, that the alleged will was either an outright forgery or procured by the fraud or the propounder, the executor named therein, and one of the chief beneficiaries.

In a clear and comprehensive charge, in which this opposing testimony and every position arising thereon in favor of either party was intelligently referred to, the cause was submitted. The jury on the first issue have rendered a verdict sustaining the will, and the court, trying same by consent of parties, finds on the second issue that the caveator's right is barred by the statute of limitations; and on careful examination we find nothing in the record to justify us in disturbing the results of the trial.

[8] While there seems to be no error in the determination of the first issue, we do not deem it necessary to refer specially to the objections urged to that portion of the verdict, for the reason that we concur fully in the ruling of his honor that in any aspect of the testimony the appellant's right to cater and maintain the caveat is barred by the statute controlling the matter. Prior to 1907 there was no statute making direct provision as to the time within which a caveat could be entered, but in that year the Legislature, recognizing that it was clearly contrary to sound public policy that the probate of wills and settlements of property thereunder should be left open to such uncertainties for an indefinite length of time, in chapter 862. Laws of 1907, provided that such caveats should be entered at time of application and probate of a will in common form, or at any time within seven years thereafter; that any person interested in the estate might enter a caveat to a will; and, as to all wills theretofore admitted to probate, a caveat must be entered within seven years from ratification of the act, to wit, March 11, 1907.

The statute also contained the proviso that, if any one entitled to file a caveat should be at the time within the age of 21 years, or a married woman, or insane, they should have three years to file a caveat after the removal of the disability, etc. On the facts presented, this statute, appearing in Consolidated Statutes, § 4158, in our opinion operates as a complete and conclusive bar to the maintenance of this caveat, it appearing by the admitted facts that the probate in common form was had before the clerk of the superior court of Halifax county, the proper tribunal, in 1907, and since that time the caveator, being under no disability, has done nothing to challenge or in any way question the validity of the will or probate thereof until 1919 or 1920. It is very earnestly insisted for the appellant that the statutory period should commence to run only from the time when he became aware of the essential facts; but the statute makes no such exception, and we are not allowed to make this addition to the statutory provisions. And if it were otherwise—if, as the appellant contends, we could apply to this case the statute governing adversary actions instituted on the ground of fraud, that same could be commenced within three years after fraud discovered (C. S. § 441, subsec. 9)—it would not avail the appellant on the facts presented in this record.

As shown in the appeal on caveator's motion to set aside the probate in this case, our court, in construing the statute referred to, has held that the cause of action will be deemed to have accrued at the time when the fraud was known or could have been discovered in the exercise of ordinary care. Peacock v. Barnes, 142 N. C. 215, 55 S. E. 99. And in this case it appears that the caveator was aware of this will and its contents at the time or very shortly after it was admitted to probate in common form, and for nearly 13, and certainly for 10, years thereafter, he seems to have done nothing to investigate the matter and to have made no inquiry concerning it, although the witnesses on whom he now chiefly relies, the doctor and nurses at the hospital where the deceased was in her last illness and the alleged fraud was perpetrated, have been available to him during the entire period. The jury, after a full and fair hearing, have found the issue of fraud against the appellant; and in any event, owing to his long delay and his own neglect, the law provides that a further inquiry is no longer open to him, and the judgment on the verdict must therefore be affirmed.

No error.

RHYNE v. FLINT MFG. CO. (No. 448.)

1. Waters and water courses §85—Dominant proprietor enjoined from diverting water to premises of another.

Where defendant company, owning a large cotton manufacturing plant and a village of 70 tenement houses for employees, operated a septic tank and filter through which sewerage from the plant and houses flowed, the sewerage then flowing through an open ditch located near a branch which ran through a part of plaintiff's land, and most of the water falling on defendant's land would, if not diverted by defendant, naturally flow in another direction, and the water used to flush defendant's sewerage system was diverted from its natural flow, defendant was a trespasser, and plaintiff was entitled to an injunction, aside from all question of pollution creating a nuisance.

2. Eminent domain §10(1)—Large cotton manufacturing plant not entitled to condemn property.

Where defendant company, owning a large cotton manufacturing plant and a village of 70 tenement houses for employees, operated a septic tank and filter through which sewerage from the plant and houses flowed, the sewerage then flowing through an open ditch, located near a branch which ran through a part of plaintiff's land, held that defendant, being a private corporation, did not possess the right of eminent domain by which it might acquire, against plaintiff, the right to so conduct the water and sewerage upon assessment of damages: hence neither the fact that it had constructed its septic tank in accordance with plans furnished by the state board of health, under C. S. §§ 7129-7144, nor that defendant had offered to buy from plaintiff that part of his land affected by the nuisance, would exonerate defendant from injunction or liability in damages to plaintiff.

3. Nuisance §23(1)—Injury authorizing injunction.

The rule under which restraining order is sometimes denied on the ground that the injury is only apprehended or contingent applies generally to cases where the injury is threatened by reason of some industrial enterprise promising benefits to the community, affecting rather the comfort and convenience than the health of adjoining proprietors, and where indication is given that adequate redress may be afforded by an award of damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gaston County; Ray, Judge.

Suit by John L. Rhyne against the Flint Manufacturing Company. From judgment continuing restraining order against defendant until the hearing, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Appeal from a continuance of a restraining order to the hearing in Charlotte, October 10, 1921. The defendant company owns a tract of land on which is situated a cotton manufacturing plant of 23,040 spindles and a village of 70 tenement houses occupied by its employees. The plaintiff owns a contiguous tract of land of 252 acres, and the defendant has constructed and operates a septic tank and filter through which the sewerage flows from said plant and tenement houses, and then through an open ditch located near a branch which runs through a part of plaintiff's lands.

This is an appeal in a proceeding for a perpetual injunction, in which the restraining order was continued to the hearing. The plaintiff alleges and files numerous affidavits that the defendant, since February, 1921, has discharged the sewerage and filth from its mill and tenement houses through a sewerage system constructed by it, without properly purifying the same, into a dry ditch near plaintiff's land, from which point it naturally flows upon his land and into a small branch running through his pasture and by his spring, whereby the branch and spring have been grossly polluted and rendered unsafe and unfit for use by persons or cattle, and thereby caused the abandonment of the spring, and forced the plaintiff to abandon his pasture lands and to move his cattle, used for the purposes of a public dairy, therefrom. The injunction was continued to the hearing, and the defendant appealed. Subsequently the court granted a stay of the restraining order till November 2, 1921, so as to give the defendant an opportunity to make such changes as may be necessary to protect the plaintiff.

Mason & Mason, S. J. Durham, and Mangum & Denny, all of Gastonia, for appellant.

B. Capps, of Gastonia, Tillett & Guthrie, of Charlotte, and A. L. Quickel, of Lincoln, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1, 2] The defendant seeks to assert the rights of a dominant tenant to flow the surface water and debris from its premises across the plaintiff's land. The evidence is uncontradicted that the water that falls on defendant's land would, if not diverted by the defendant, naturally flow in another direction (with a slight exception), and that the water used to flush defendant's sewerage system is diverted from its natural flow. Upon these facts, aside from all question of pollution creating a nuisance, the defendant is a trespasser, and plaintiff would be entitled to an injunction. The settled law is that, while the dominant proprietor can accelerate the flow, he cannot divert the water from his premises to that of another upon which it would not naturally flow. Roberts v. Baldwin, 151 N. C. 407, 66 S. E. 346 and cases there cited. The defendant is a private corporation, and does not possess the right of eminent domain by which he might acquire such right in a proper case upon assessment of damages. Jenkins v. Railroad, 110 N. C. 438, 15 S. E. 193, and citations in 2 Anno. Ed.

Upon the affidavits of the plaintiff and admissions of the defendant the restraining order was properly continued to the hearing. The defendant seems to rely largely upon the fact that it has constructed a septic tank in accordance with plans furnished by the state board of health (C. S. §§ 7129 to 7144), which gives the state board of health authority to require sewerage or sanitary privies. We do not think, however, that this will exonerate the defendant from injunction or liability in damages to the plaintiff, who had no day in court or hearing as to the sufficiency of the septic tank either as prescribed or as built. Besides, the board of health had no authority to pass upon this matter as against the plaintiff. To allow such a defense to protect the defendant against the nuisance which it has created would be to permit the defendant, a private corporation, to take the property of the plaintiff without his consent, and even without opportunity to be heard. Donnell v. Greensboro, 164 N. C. 330, 80 S. E. 377.

[3] There are cases in which the court has denied a restraining order and injunction. But that line of cases has been reviewed by Justice Hoke in Cherry v. Williams, 147 N. C. 452, 61 S. E. 267, 125 Am. St. Rep. 566, 15 Ann. Cas. 715, where he observes that the cases which had denied the restraining order on the ground that the injury was only apprehended or contingent obtained generally where the injury was threatened by reason of some industrial enterprise which gave promise of benefits to the community, affecting rather the comfort and convenience than the health of adjacent proprietors, and giving indication that adequate redress might in most instances be afforded by an award of damages, as in Simpson v. Justice, 43 N. C. 115; Hyatt v. Myers, 71 N. C. 271; Hickory v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 451, 55 S. E. 840, saying:

"But, so far as we have examined, whenever this principle has been apparently applied with us to cases which threaten serious injury to health, and injunctive relief was denied to claimant, it will be found, either that there was some defect in the proof offered by plaintiff or such proof was successfully controverted by defendant, or there were other conditions present which required the application of some other principle than that which defendant here invokes for his protection."

That case is cited and approved in Berger v. Smith, 160 N. C. 205, 75 S. E. 1098. But in this case: (1) The plaintiff has diverted the flow of the water which he has used in operating his sewerage plant in a direction in which it does not naturally flow, and hence the plaintiff was entitled to his injunction, irrespective of the allegations of nuisance. (2) Upon the affidavits and admissions, the defendant is committing a serious nuisance upon the plaintiff's land, and is jeopardizing the health of the community by the injury to the spring and otherwise and to the cattle used in the plaintiff's dairy. (3) The septic tank may or may not have been constructed according to the regulations of the state board of health, and the defendant admits that it has not always operated efficiently. (4) While defendant alleges that it has offered to purchase that part of the plaintiff's land affected by the nuisance, this would amount to a practical grant or license to the defendant to perpetually maintain this nuisance alongside of the plaintiff's remaining land. This the defendant cannot compel the plaintiff to accept. The defendant has no power of eminent domain, and to allow such defense would enable powerful individuals or corporations to force out undesired neighbors by maintaining a nuisance, and would enable them to repeat the Biblical example of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings, c. 21), and Nathan's ewe lamb (2 Sam. c. 12).

The defendant contends strenuously that a permanent injunction would work an inconvenience to it in the operation of its mill. It has been operated for many years without being a nuisance to the plaintiff, and has only become such since February last, when it installed its new and unsatisfactory sewerage plant, and in any event it has no right to force the plaintiff to abandon the use of his own land for pasture for his dairy cattle, and to abandon the use of his spring in order that the defendant may experiment with a disposal of sewerage in a manner that is a nuisance to the plaintiff, however satisfactory or convenient such method may be to the defendant.

In Lumber Co. v. Cedar Works, 158 N. C. 164, 73 S. E. 903, Brown, J., says:

"It would be a most extraordinary destruction of the rights of property if a private corporation, possessing no power of eminent domain, could seize the lands of another, to which it has no semblance of title, and appropriate them to its own use, simply because it was able to respond in damages. This contention of the defendants is, in our opinion, without support in reason or authority"

—and he quotes (158 N. C. at 169, 73 S. E. 905) from Connor, J., in Cozard v. Hardwood Co., 139 N. C. 284, 51 S. E. 932, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 969, 111 Am. St. Rep. 779, as follows:

"While, as found by his honor, it is reasonable and even necessary to the successful operation of defendant's enterprise that they carry their timber over the plaintiff's land to reach the markets, and while there may be no injustice to him in permitting them to do so, and while his opposition may be either sentimental or selfish, yet the courts may not violate or weaken a fundamental principle upon the strict observance and enforcement of which the security of all private property, so necessary to the safety of the citizen, is dependent. The guaranties upon which the security of private property is dependent are closely allied, and always associated with those securing life and liberty. Where one is invaded, the security of the other is weakened."

The defendant must attain its ends, advance its interests, or serve its convenience by some method, whether in improving its sewerage system or otherwise, which shall be in accordance with the age-old maxim that a man must use his own property in such a way as not to injure the rights of others—"Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non lœdas."

The judgment continuing the restraining order is affirmed.

HIGH POINT CASKET CO. v. WHEELER (STRUDWICK & BARRINGER, Interveners). (No. 397.)

1. Appeal and error \S 877(7)—Defendant cannot complain of disposition of proceeds of judgment against him.

Where attorneys for plaintiff intervened in suit, defendant cannot complain that judgment was rendered against him in favor of the interveners for one-third of the amount of the judgment to which plaintiff was entitled, not being aggrieved thereby.

2. Attorney and client \S 148(1)—Contract for compensation held to constitute equitable assignment of judgment pro tanto.

A contract for compensation to attorneys who were to receive a certain fixed portion of the judgment recovered, constituted at least an equitable assignment pro tanto of the judgment obtained.

3. Attorney and client ⚡147 — Contract for contingent fee valid.

It is neither a violation of law nor against good morals for a lawyer, if he believes a client has been wronged, and is unable to employ counsel, to bring suit upon a promise of reward contingent upon the result, but the contract must be made in good faith, without suppression or reserve of fact or of apprehended difficulties, and without undue influence, and the compensation must be just and fair, though such a contract cannot be condemned solely because proportion taken by attorney is very large.

4. Attorney and client ⚡190(2)—Intervention proper to protect interest in judgment.

Intervention is the proper method for an attorney to protect his right under an equitable assignment pro tanto of any judgment obtained by him, and to obtain judgment against the defendant therefor.

5. Action ⚡53(1)—All controversies to be settled in one action.

It is one of the cardinal rules of the Code that all controversies relating to the same matters should be settled in one action.

6. Assignments ⚡22—Choses in action assignable.

Choses in action are assignable.

7. Assignments ⚡18, 121—All ordinary business contracts assignable and actions maintainable by assignee.

Unless expressly prohibited by statute or in contravention of some principle of public policy, all ordinary business contracts are assignable, and actions for breach of the same can be maintained by the assignee in his own name.

8. Attorney and client ⚡182(4)—Plaintiff's attorney held to have lien pro tanto on land of defendant debtor.

An attorney who had a one-third interest in a judgment obtained under an equitable assignment also had a lien pro tanto on land of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Finley, Judge.

Action by the High Point Casket Company against R. A. Wheeler, in which Strudwick & Barringer intervened. From an adverse judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was originally brought by the plaintiff against R. A. Wheeler individually. He was never sued as secretary and treasurer of plaintiff corporation. The complaint alleged that R. A. Wheeler was indebted to the plaintiff in a large sum of money, both on account of unpaid subscription to capital stock and money of the company, which he had as former secretary and treasurer received and not properly accounted for. It is alleged that prior to the beginning of the action, to wit, on September 2, 1915, Wheeler had been suspended as secretary and treasurer by action of the stockholders and the board of directors, who had elected B. H. Bradener to that office, in place of the defendant. The cause was referred to S. Clay Williams, Esq., who tried the same as referee, and reported that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,687.06, and the further sum of $550, making $2,237.06, which the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant.

Messrs. R. C. Strudwick and John A. Barringer who appeared as attorneys for the plaintiff in the action, and until the judgment was rendered on the referee's report, intervened in this action to establish their right to compensation as attorneys. They were duly retained as such by the Casket Company and were paid a retainer of $50; the company further agreeing that they should have as compensation for their services "one-third of any recovery that might be effected in the action against the defendant." The said terms of employment were accepted by the attorneys, and they represented the plaintiff, and prosecuted the action, throughout the litigation for their client, and recovered judgment in the sum above indicated in the referee's report. The controversy was long continued and hotly contested, and there seems to be no reason to dispute the reasonableness of the compensation promised to the attorneys. The latter intervened in the principal action for the purpose of enforcing the allotment to them of one-third of the judgment recovered by the plaintiff with their professional assistance according to the contract, contending that they were entitled to the relief and to the lien on the defendant's land, which, under our statute, goes with the judgment. The petition of intervention was duly served, with a copy thereof, on the plaintiff, but not answered.

The defendant filed one exception to the report, and pending the confirmation of the same took action, as described in the petition, with a view of depriving interveners of their compensation by acquiring control of the plaintiff corporation. The defendant, in open court, withdrew his exception to the report of the referee, which was confirmed. The interveners then filed their petition of intervention, and the court rendered judgment as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the plaintiff do have and recover of the defendant in accordance with said report the sum of $1,687.06, and the further sum of $550, with interest on $550 from January 8, 1917, until paid. It further appears to the court that John A. Barringer and R. C. Strudwick, attorneys at law, by leave of the court have filed in this cause a verified intervening petition whereby they claim to be equitable assignees of one-third of said judgment, and that they are entitled to be paid one-third thereof, that the said petition has been duly served upon the defendant and upon C. Q.

Prince, now president of the High Point Casket Company, and that no answer thereto has been filed. The court doth find that all allegations of said petition are true. The court doth find, and thereupon, order and decree, that by virtue of the agreement made by the plaintiff said John A. Barringer and R. C. Strudwick, attorneys, are entitled to receive one-third of the amount recovered against the defendant, and that by virtue of the terms of their employment as aforesaid they are the equitable assignees of one-third of said judgment against the defendant.

"It is further ordered and adjudged by the court that John A. Barringer and R. C. Strudwick, attorneys, be paid one-third of the amount of said judgment, and judgment is hereby rendered as to the one-third of the amount thereof in favor of said John A. Barringer and R. C. Strudwick against the defendant, R. A. Wheeler.

"It is further ordered and adjudged by the court that the defendant pay the costs of this action to be taxed by the clerk, including an allowance of $250 to S. Clay Williams, Esq., referee."

Defendant appealed.

R. R. King, of Greensboro, for appellant.
John A. Barringer and R. G. Strudwick, both of Greensboro, pro se.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] What real interest the defendant has in this controversy we are unable to see. He has to pay the judgment, in any event, and whether to the plaintiff, or one-third of it to the interveners, Messrs. Barringer & Strudwick, the attorneys of the plaintiff, can make no difference to him. A case directly in point is Newsom v. Russell, 77 N. C. 277, where the plaintiff was the assignee of the note on which the action was brought, and defendant alleged that it was assigned in fraud of the assignor's creditors. The court held this to be no defense, as the assignor was bound by his assignment, though made in fraud of his creditors, and then the court inquired:

"It is not the duty of the maker of the note to see to the application of the money, and it is even less his duty to fight the battles of the creditors of the bankrupt. What interest is it to him [defendant] if he is absolved from further liability by payment of his debt upon a judgment regularly obtained against him?"

Here the parties are all before the court and will be concluded by its judgment. The petition of intervention was filed in the case, and copies of it duly served on the plaintiff and the defendant, who failed to answer it or otherwise plead to it, and the court gave judgment by default against them. This fully protects defendant in any payment he makes under the judgment of the court. And Brown v. Harding, 170 N. C. 253, 262, 86 S. E. 1010, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 548, and 171 N. C. 689, 89 S. E. 222, is to the same effect as Newsom v. Russell, supra. But see, also, Wiggin v.

Swett, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 194, 39 Am. Dec. Extra Anno. 716; Black v. Mirgan, 28 Am. Dec. Extra Anno., 894; 6 Cyc. 631. The party of record who can complain of a judgment of a court, and appeal therefrom, is one who is aggrieved thereby, in the sense that his pecuniary interest is affected by it; one whose right of property or interest, may be established or divested by the decree, as was said substantially by Chief Justice Shaw in Wiggin v. Swett, supra, citing Smith v. Bradstreet, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 264; Bryant v. Allen, 6 N. H. 116. But, however this may be, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the court was right in itself.

[2] There can be no question as to the definite terms of this contract for compensation of the attorneys nor as to how it should be ascertained and secured, nor can it be reasonably doubted that the parties intended that they should receive a certain or fixed portion of the judgment recovered. The contract, therefore, constituted at least an equitable assignment of the judgment pro tanto. It was held in Costigan v. Stewart, 76 Kan. 353, 91 Pac. 83, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 630, that an attorney who is retained to conduct or to assist in conducting the prosecution of a proceeding under a contract by which he is to receive compensation out of the fund recovered is entitled to a lien upon such fund for his fees. And so in Svea Assurance Co. v. Packham, 92 Md. 464, at pages 477 and 478, 48 Atl. 359, 52 L. R. A. 95, the court said that there was no evidence to show that the amount defendant agreed to allow the attorneys was unreasonable or excessive. Cases of that character are generally defended by all the means the law affords. They often result in several trials, and usually the receipt of the compensation is greatly delayed, when taken on a contingency. If the case is settled before it has taken its usual course, the attorney is undoubtedly benefited thereby, but the client is saved the necessity, and oftentimes hardship, of paying out cash and has no personal liability for fees in the event of failure. Under such circumstances he must expect to, and usually does, give larger compensation, if successful, than he would if he agreed to pay a fixed fee, whether successful or not. When Mr. Packham made the arrangement for fees, the insurers had not paid the insurance money, and when they did they knew what he had agreed to allow. Yet they stood by without objecting to it and permitted the attorneys thus employed by Mr. Packham to proceed, knowing the terms of their employment. The case of Davis et al. v. Gennell et al., 73 Md. 530, 21 Atl. 712, is a conclusive answer to such objection by them now. There the attorneys were employed upon a contingent fee by Mr. Brydon, who had sued in his own name and recovered a judgment which was determined to belong to the North Branch Coal Company.

Some of the stockholders objected to the allowance of the fee, but this court said:

They "stood by and saw the work done; they neither interfered nor objected; and they cannot now be heard in a court of equity to except to that work being paid for out of the fund realized by the labor of these gentlemen, especially when they themselves, these exceptants, are seeking to reap the benefit of that very work and labor."

Without citing other authorities on that subject, we are of the opinion that it would be inequitable to deprive the attorneys of the fees agreed to be allowed. See, also, note to the Costigan Case, supra. It is said in 4 Cyc. 989, 990, and notes:

"While the law will scrutinize such transactions closely, an agreement is not necessarily invalid because the payment of the fee is made contingent upon the success of the suit or upon the happening of some other event, and such an agreement is not objectionable for want of mutuality. So a contingent agreement to convey a portion of the land recovered by suit to the attorney for his fee will be specifically enforced, even though the land has greatly increased in value. * * * Where the claim is assignable, the wording of the agreement for a contingent fee must in every case be examined to determine whether the parties intended an equitable assignment in favor of the attorney."

See Fitzpatrick v. Lincoln Sav., etc., Co., 194 Pa. 544, 45 Atl. 333; Howard v. Throckmorton, 48 Cal. 482; Martin v. Platt, 5 N. Y. St. Rep. 284; Chester v. Jumel, 125 N. Y. 237, 26 N. E. 297, 5 N. Y. Supp. 809.

If the property has been converted into a fund, the attorney is entitled to his due share of the increased amount. Hand v. Savannah, etc., R. Co., 21 S. C. 162. Where the client repudiates his contract, the attorney may compel him to deliver so much of the proceeds recovered as will compensate him or may have a personal judgment for his damages sustained by reason of the client's failure to carry out his contract. Hazeltine v. Brockway, 26 Colo. 291, 57 Pac. 1077. Similar agreements were held to constitute equitable assignments in favor of the attorneys in the following cases: Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564; Sammis v. L'Engle, 19 Fla. 800; Fairbanks v. Sargent, 104 N. Y. 108, 9 N. E. 870, 6 L. R. 475, 58 Am. Rep. 490; Hagemann's Estate, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 576; The Alice Strong (D. C.) 57 Fed. 249, distinguishing Kendall v. U. S., 7 Wall. (U. S.) 113, 19 L. Ed. 85. A right of action is assignable in this state, but by assigning an aliquot part of the fund recovered, or the recovery, or judgment, as it may be denominated, the assignee gets no vested right in the cause of action, unless it is so stated or clearly to be implied. In this case the assignment is confined to the recovery or judgment itself. In 6 Corpus Juris, pp. 742, 743, it is stated that there are many cases which hold that an agreement with an attorney that he shall have as compensation a specific sum, or a stipulated percentage, to be paid out of the judgment recovered, will, on the recovery of judgment, operate as an equitable assignment pro tanto; and this has been so held even where the action in which the judgment was obtained was on a cause of action for a tort in itself unassignable. But, in order that an agreement for a contingent fee may operate as an equitable assignment, there must be in effect a constructive appropriation of so much of the amount to be recovered as will confer upon the attorney a complete and present right to receive the same without the further intervention of the client. In some jurisdictions there must be an actual appropriation of some designated proportion or percent. of the judgment. In others it is not indispensable that the portion or amount of the fund sought to be assigned should be precisely ascertained and stated in the assignment. It is enough that the transaction affords evidence as to the part of the fund on which the assignment was intended to operate. Whether in a given case the agreement constitutes an equitable assignment is dependent upon the intent of the parties, as evidenced by the terms of the agreement, in the light of all the surrounding circumstances. See, also, Bennett v. Donovan, 83 App. Div. 95, 82 N. Y. Supp. 506; Flannery v. Geiger, 46 Misc. Rep. 619, 92 N. Y. Supp. 785; Mays v. Sanders, 90 Tex. 132, 37 S. W. 595. It was held in Martinez v. Succession of Adolphe Vives, 32 La. Ann. 305, that the contract of an attorney with his client to receive a contingent fee of 10 per cent. on the amount recovered is a valid contract. An attorney who is entitled to a certain commission on the amount recovered by him, which amount is evidenced by and embraced in a judgment, has a sufficient interest in the judgment to sue for its full revival. Construing a contract between attorney and client similarly worded to this one, the court held in Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564, that it constituted the attorney the equitable owner of the undivided one-half of whatever shall result from the prosecution or compromise of the suit instituted by him to recover the land. If an attorney contracts with a party who claims land to commence a suit to recover the land and to pay the expenses, and receive for his services and expenses one undivided half of what may be recovered, and the undivided one-half of the result of a settlement or compromise of the matter, and the party compromises by having money paid to a third person, who, in consideration of the money, deeds to a fourth person land in trust for the party, such fourth person holds an undivided one-half of the land in trust for the attorney. Considering a claim of like character in Fairbanks v. Sargent, 104 N. Y. 108, 9 N. E. 870, 6 L. R.

A. 475, 58 Am. Rep. 490 (opinion by Chief Justice Ruger), the court held that an assignee of such a claim from the owner must necessarily acquire the same interest in it that any other assignee does, and that is, in the absence of other controlling equities, an interest subject to the rule that he who is prior in point of time is prior in right. Such a claim is at common law nonassignable, and its assignee takes, by virtue of an assignment thereof, an equitable interest only, which must be governed by equitable rules for its protection and enforcement. See, also, Schubert v. Herzberg, 65 Mo. App. 578, Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N. Y. 508, and Patton v. Wilson, 34 Pa. 299, in which last case it was held that an agreement by parol between attorney and client that the former should have $100 for his services "out of the verdict" in an action for unliquidated damages arising from a personal tort, operated as an equitable assignment of the judgment entered upon the verdict, and was good against an attaching creditor of the client. The court thus answers the objection that, as the claim was for unliquidated damages in an action sounding in tort, it was not capable of assignment before judgment:

"Strictly that is true. But it is true only in respect to the rights of third parties. As between Wolf and Geyer [client and lawyer], an assignment or agreement to assign the whole or part of a future verdict would be binding, and, being founded on sufficient consideration, would be enforced. Such agreements between counsel and client * * * bind the parties, and the attaching creditor of one of the parties succeeds to no higher rights than he possessed." Bell v. Lake County, 26 Colo. 192, 141 Pac. 861.

And in Canty v. Latterner, 31 Minn. 239, 17 N. W. 385, the court was of opinion that upon its face the contract is to be construed as an equitable assignment of $100 of the amount there referred to as due the respondent from the railroad company. It is expressed not merely as an obligation to pay upon the contingency named, nor merely to pay out of the money to be collected by the respondent, but that the plaintiff should receive this money from the railroad company out of the amount owing by it to the respondent. It was in effect a constructive appropriation in favor of the plaintiff of so much of the money payable to the respondent, subject only to the condition named, and was hence operative as an assignment, although not an assignment in form. There are very many cases collected in 6 Corpus Juris, at page 741 and note 7, to the same effect as those we have cited, but they are too numerous to be inserted here. The annotator of the text says that in each of them there was a contract for a contingent fee, ranging in amount from one-tenth to one-half of the sum recovered; and the court, finding upon examination that the contract was fair and the fee not excessive, gave effect to it and allowed the attorney to recover. It was held in the case of The Alice Strong (D. C.) 57 Fed. 249, that an assignment by the libelant in an admiralty case (who has reasonable assurance that he is entitled to recover a certain amount) of a definite sum to his proctor for professional services, to be paid out of any recovery that might be had, is sufficiently certain and on sufficient consideration to support a lien on the proceeds. The lien of such an assignment has priority over the claim of a judgment creditor in a state court who subsequently files his intervening petition in admiralty after the court has decided that libelant is entitled to recover some amount on his libel.

One reason for the rule thus formulated by the courts is based on the ground that otherwise a party without the means to employ an attorney and pay his fee certain and having a meritorious cause of action or defense would find himself powerless to protect his rights. Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548; Andirac v. Richardson, 125 La. 883, 51 South. 1024.

[3] This brings us to consider the validity of such a contract in another respect. The defendant attacks the same (in which by the way, we have shown that he has no legal or moral interest or right) upon the ground that the relation of attorney and client is a fiduciary one, which raises a legal, but rebuttable, presumption of fraud or of undue influence, which is a species of fraud, and for this position he cites Lee v. Pearce, 68 N. C. 76, and we may add McLeod v. Bullard, 84 N. C. 515, 532, but, if that principle be conceded to be the law, and we are not casting any doubt upon it, the evidence in this case establishes beyond cavil that the attorneys, who were the interveners, acted in perfect good faith when the contract was made and without fraud or the exercise of any undue influence, and that they took no advantage of the plaintiff in the transaction, and further that the compensation (one-third of the recovery) was just and reasonable. Besides, the allegations of the interveners in their petition are to the effect that there was no fraud or undue influence, and no bad faith or unfair advantage taken by them of the plaintiff when the contract was made, but that, in all respects, the latter was fair and just, and the amount of compensation allowed was reasonable when the nature of the litigation and of the services to be rendered by them are considered, and these allegations were not denied, although the plaintiff and the defendant were duly served with copies of the petition and had full opportunity to be heard if they had any defense to it. It is neither a violation of law nor against good morals that a lawyer, if he believes a client or would-be client has been wronged, and is unable to employ counsel, to bring suit for the redress thereof, and to undertake the business without any hope or promise of reward or upon a promise of reward contingent upon the result. Indeed, it is rather to be commended. Stevens v. Sheriff, 76 Kan. 124, 90 Pac. 799, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1153. A contract for a contingent fee must be made in good faith, without suppression or reserve of fact or of apprehended difficulties, and without undue influence of any sort or degree; and the compensation bargained for must be absolutely just and fair, so that the transaction may be characterized throughout by all good faith to the client. If the contract is shown to have been obtained by fraud, mistake, or undue influence, or if it is so excessive in proportion to the services to be rendered as to be in fact oppressive or extortionate, it will not be upheld. Such a contract cannot be condemned solely because the proportion of the claim to be retained by the attorney was very large, if it was deliberately entered into, was free from fraud, and showed no purpose to obtain undue advantage. Thus the mere fact that the attorney is to receive one-half of the recovery does not render the agreement unconscionable, in the absence of proof that it was induced by fraud, or that the compensation provided for is so excessive as to evince a purpose to obtain an improper or undue advantage, although there is said to be a presumption against the propriety of such a transaction. One very properly may demand a larger compensation if it is to be contingent or not certain. A contingent fee is permitted to attorneys only as a reward for skill and diligence exercised in the prosecution of doubtful and litigated claims, and it is not allowed for the rendition of merely minor services which any layman or inexperienced attorney might perform. 6 Corpus Juris, § 316, pp. 740, 741, and notes. The word "unjust or unconscionable," as applied to attorneys' contracts for contingent fees, means nothing more than that the amount of the fee contracted for, standing alone and unexplained, would be sufficient to show that an unfair advantage had been taken of the client, or that a legal fraud had been perpetrated upon him. McCoy v. Gas Engine Co., 135 App. Div. 771, 119 N. Y. Supp. 864.

There is nothing in this case which even suggests that the contract was either unfair, improper, or excessive, or that the interveners did anything, in their professional character, as attorneys, that was not fit for them to do under the facts and circumstances.

[4-7] We need not discuss the question as to whether intervention is the proper method for the attorneys to prosecute their right to the compensation and obtain judgment therefor as they have done. That it is too plain for argument, and it will be found that it is the one which was adopted in the cases we have cited and many others. Under our

Code, it is one of its cardinal rules and of its most commendable provisions that all controversies relating to the same matters should be settled in one action, and the intervention was the most convenient and appropriate method in this case, as one of its objects was to arrest any disposition of the fund to be collected under the judgment which would jeopardize or defeat the interveners' rights, which were about to be greatly prejudiced by the defendant's wrongful conduct, which is particularized and denounced in the petition as an attempt to subject the judgment to defendant's control so that he might oust the interveners of their just and equitable rights. Whether the contract was, in effect, an assignment at law, or in equity, need not be considered. It was not good at common law, as under it choses in action were not assignable, but even then it was valid in equity. Under our law choses in action are assignable. While at common law the rights and benefits of a contract, except in the case of the law merchant and in cases where the crown has an interest, could not be transferred by assignment, a doctrine which Lord Coke attributes to the "wisdom and policy of the founders of our law in discouraging maintenance and litigation, but which Sir Frederick Pollock tells us is better explained as a logical consequence of the archaic view of a contract as creating a strictly personal obligation between the debtor and creditor," the rule in its strictness was soon modified in practical application by the common-law courts themselves and more extensively by the decisions of the courts of equity; and the principles established by these cases have been sanctioned and extended by legislation until now it may be stated as a general rule that, unless expressly prohibited by statute or in contravention of some principle of public policy, all ordinary business contracts are assignable, and that actions for breach of the same can be maintained by the assignee in his own name. Railroad Co. v. Railroad Co., 147 N. C. 368-374, 61 S. E. 185, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 223, 125 Am. St. Rep. 550, 15 Ann. Cas. 363. But it makes no difference whether we call the assignment legal or equitable, as in either case the result will be the same.

[8] As we have held that by the term of the contract the interveners acquire an interest of one-third in the judgment, which is what we call "the recovery," the lien of the judgment under our statute (Consol. Statutes, § 614) attached pro tanto to the defendant's land from the time the judgment was docketed. This is not, therefore, a simple common-law action to recover for services the amount stipulated to be paid, but is the definite appropriation of a special part of the judgment or "recovery," with its attendant lien, as compensation to the attorneys under the contract. This seems to be a case of first impression in our courts, but we deem the law concerning it to be well settled.

The question is treated at large in Weeks on Attorneys (edition of 1878) §§ 346, 350 and 352.

There may be some conflict in the authorities, but our view is well supported by a large majority of the later decisions in courts of the highest repute.

This case bears no resemblance to Mordecai v. Devereux, 74 N. C. 673, and Roe v. Journigan, 181 N. C. 180, 106 S. E. 680, as there was no contract between attorney and client in those cases and the court was asked to allow compensation regardless of that fact.

Upon the whole case, when considered, in any proper or admissible view, our conclusion is that there was no error in the judgment of the court below, as delivered by Judge Finley upon the report of the referee, and we therefore affirm the same.

Affirmed.

(182 N. C. 374)

THOMAS et al. v. CARTERET COUNTY et al.
(No. 180.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 9, 1921.)

1. Stipulations ⇨18(9)—For judgment on mortgage subject to certain credits held abandonment of contention that it was conditionally delivered.

In action to have determined the extent of liability on a note and mortgage executed to plaintiffs' nephew and by him turned over to the county whose funds he had misappropriated, plaintiffs' admission in open court that the county was entitled to judgment for the amount misappropriated subject to credit for such amounts as might be found against a surety was at variance with the theory of conditional delivery and an abandonment of plaintiffs' contention that the mortgage was delivered on condition that other securities were to be exhausted before the mortgage took effect.

2. Evidence ⇨444(2)—After delivery oral agreement that other securities should be exhausted before resorting to mortgage could not be ingrafted thereon.

Where there was a valid delivery of a mortgage executed by plaintiff to his nephew and by him turned over to the county whose funds he had misappropriated, and because thereof the Governor was induced to grant an unconditional pardon, an oral agreement that the mortgage should not be resorted to until other securities were exhausted cannot be ingrafted thereon.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Horton, Judge.

Action by T. M. Thomas and others against Carteret County and others. From the judgment, plaintiffs and defendant Mace appeal. Modified and affirmed.

See, also, 180 N. C. 109, 104 S. E. 75.

Civil action to determine the extent of plaintiffs' liability on a certain note and mortgage executed and delivered to Thomas Thomas, and by him given as security to the county of Carteret. A brief history of this litigation is set out in the judgment of the superior court, entered at the June term, 1921:

"This cause coming on to be heard before his honor, J. Loyd Horton, judge, and a jury, and it appearing to the court that at the June term, 1920, of said court this cause was tried before his honor G. W. Connor, judge, and a jury, and at said term the following issues, with their answers, were submitted and found by the jury as follows, to wit:

"(1) In what amount, if any, is Thomas Thomas, trustee of the courthouse bond sinking fund, indebted to Carteret county? Answer: $13,236.49, with interest.

"(2) What sum, if any, is Carteret county entitled to recover of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety for Thomas Thomas, treasurer of Carteret county? Answer: Nothing.

"(3) What sum, if any, is Carteret county entitled to recover of W. A. Mace, administrator of Alonzo Thomas, deceased, on the bond of Thomas Thomas, trustee? Answer: $5,000.

"(4) Were the note and mortgage of T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura, executed to Thomas Thomas and assigned to Carteret county, taken and accepted with the understanding and agreement that the same should be used only after the other securities held by the county for Thomas Thomas, trustee, had been exhausted, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No.

"(5) What sum, if any, is Carteret county entitled to recover of T. M. Thomas and wife on account of the note for $13,500 secured by mortgage assigned to said county by Thomas Thomas? (Not answered.)

"And it further appearing to the court that the presiding judge of said court in his discretion set aside the answer to the fourth issue and failed to answer the fifth issue, which he instructed the jury the court would answer after they had answered the other issues, and permitted the plaintiffs to file a reply, and further pleading upon which the following issues were submitted and answered at this, the June term, 1921, of the superior court of Carteret county, before his honor Judge Horton and a jury, as follows, to wit:

"(4) In what amount, if any, is W. A. Mace, administrator, etc., of Alonzo Thomas, indebted to Carteret county on account of the term of said Alonzo Thomas as treasurer of Carteret county, beginning on the first Monday in December, 1914, and ending at the death of said Alonzo Thomas on the 18th day of November, 1915? Answer: $5,000 and interest.

"(5) What amount, if any, is Carteret county entitled to recover of defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety for said Alonzo Thomas as treasurer of Carteret county for said term, beginning on the first Monday in December, 1914? Answer: $8,236.49, and interest.

"(6) Were the note and mortgage given to Thomas Thomas by plaintiff given as an accommodation paper to said Thomas Thomas, as alleged by plaintiffs? Answer: Yes.

"(7) Is the defendant Carteret county a holder for value as between it and the plaintiffs of the $13,500 note and mortgage made by plaintiffs? Answer: Yes.

"(8) Were the note and mortgage of plaintiffs executed to Thomas Thomas and assigned to Carteret county taken and accepted with the understanding and agreement that the same should be used by the county only after the bonds of said Thomas Thomas and of said Alonzo Thomas had been exhausted, as alleged by plaintiffs, and then applied to the balance unpaid due said county on account of the Thomas Thomas trusteeship of the sinking fund and the trusteeship of said Alonzo Thomas? Answer: Yes.

"(9) What sum, if any, is Carteret county entitled to recover of plaintiffs on account of the note for $13,500 secured by mortgage assigned to said county by Thomas Thomas? A. $13,236.49, with interest from October 1, 1916, to be credited with $5,000 and interest on same from June 13, 1921, due by the estate of Alonzo Thomas as surety for Thomas Thomas, trustee of the courthouse bond sinking fund, the last issue having been answered by the court by consent of all parties that the court might answer same after verdict as a matter of law."

"It is now considered and adjudged by the court that the answers to the issues numbered 4 and 5 be, and are on motion of defendants, other than Carteret county, set aside, as a matter of law, for the reason that the jury found at the June term, 1920, by its answer to the first issue that Thomas Thomas, trustee of the courthouse bond fund, received and misappropriated the funds.

"It is further ordered and adjudged by the court that Carteret county recover nothing against United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety, and that said defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company go without day and recover its costs.

"It is further considered and adjudged by the court that Carteret county recover of W. A. Mace, administrator of the estate of Alonzo Thomas, deceased, the sum of $5,000, with interest from June 13, 1921, as surety on the bond of Thomas Thomas, trustee of the courthouse bond sinking fund, said Mace, administrator, having tendered judgment for said amount in open court, said amount to be credited on the amount due Carteret county by T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura P. Thomas.

"It is further considered and adjudged by the court that Carteret county recover of T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura Thomas, the sum of $13,236.49, with interest from October 1, 1916, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, to be credited with the sum of $5,000 and interest on same from June 13, 1921, due by Mace, administrator of Alonzo Thomas, deceased, the said Alonzo Thomas having been surety on the bond of Thomas Thomas, trustee of the courthouse bond sinking fund.

"It is further considered and adjudged that the note and mortgage given by T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura P. Thomas, to Thomas Thomas and assigned by Thomas Thomas to Carteret county, be foreclosed to pay said indebtedness, and that Luther Hamilton and Leslie Davis be and are appointed commissioners to sell the lands described in the mortgage of T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura P. Thomas, to Thomas Thomas, recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Carteret county in Book 22, page 339, after due advertisement and in accordance with the law governing sales of real estate under execution.

"It is ordered that such advertisement shall not be made until 60 days after the adjournment of this court, and then only in the event plaintiffs shall not have fully discharged the liability of this judgment.

"It is further adjudged that defendant Mace, administrator, pay the costs of the action, to be taxed by the clerk.

"J. Loyd Horton, Judge Presiding."

Upon the second trial the following admission was made in open court and entered of record:

"Counsel for plaintiffs having so admitted in open court, the court finds the following facts:

"In this case the plaintiffs, T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura Thomas, agree that, pursuant to the issues found in the trial of this case before Hon. George W. Connor, judge, at the June term, 1920, the defendant, Carteret county, is entitled to a judgment against the plaintiffs, T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura Thomas, in the sum of $13,236.49, with interest, said judgment to be credited for such amounts as had been or would be found by the jury in the case that the defendant Mace, administrator, and others are indebted to said Carteret county."

His honor set aside the verdict on the fourth and fifth issues, as a matter of law, and rendered the judgment appearing above. Plaintiffs and defendant Mace, administrator, appealed.

Ward & Ward, of New Bern, H. S. Ward, of Washington, N. C., and Luther Hamilton, of Morehead City, for appellants Thomas.

Julius F. Duncan, of Beaufort, for appellant Mace.

D. L. Ward, of New Bern, and Julius F. Duncan, of Beaufort, for appellee United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co.

CLARK, C. J. The case at bar has been tried twice in the superior court, and this is the second appeal here. Former opinion reported in 180 N. C. 109, 104 S. E. 75. It is doubtful if the allegations of the complaint and the wording of the eighth issue, by correct interpretation, amount to a charge and finding that plaintiffs' note and mortgage were not intended to take effect absolutely and unconditionally at the time of their delivery. It was only upon the allegation of a conditional delivery that plaintiffs were permitted to show the "understanding and agreement" upon which the note and mortgage were "taken and accepted." Indeed, on the facts of the present record—the mortgage having been delivered to the mortgagee and by him in turn assigned to Carteret county—it is not altogether clear or certain that this position was ever open to the plaintiffs. Buchanan v. Clark, 164 N. C. 56, 80 S. E. 424; Huddleston v. Hardy, 164 N. C. 210, 80 S. E. 158; Bond v. Wilson, 129 N. C. 325, 40 S. E. 179; note 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 941. But, as the point is not raised by any specific exception, we shall not pass upon it now. It is unnecessary for us to do so.

The principle applicable to a conditional delivery has been sanctioned and approved by us in a number of carefully considered decisions; and it is now very generally recognized in this and other jurisdictions. Farlington v. McNeill, 174 N. C. 420, 93 S. E. 957; Bowser v. Tarry, 156 N. C. 35, 72 S. E. 74; Gaylord v. Gaylord, 150 N. C. 222, 63 S. E. 1028; Hughes v. Crooker, 148 N. C. 318, 62 S. E. 429, 128 Am. St. Rep. 606; Aden v. Doub, 146 N. C. 10, 59 S. E. 162; Pratt v. Chaffin, 136 N. C. 350, 48 S. E. 768; Kelly v. Oliver, 113 N. C. 442, 18 S. E. 698; and Ware v. Allen, 128 U. S. 590, 9 Sup. Ct. 174, 32 L. Ed. 563. It is said in Anson on Contracts (Am. Ed.) 318:

"The parties to a written contract may agree that until the happening of a condition, which is not put in writing, the contract is to remain inoperative."

And again in Wilson v. Powers, 131 Mass. 539:

"The manual delivery of an instrument may always be proved to have been on a condition which has not been fulfilled, in order to avoid its effect. This is not to show any modification or alteration of the written agreement, but that it never became operative, and that its obligation never commenced."

These excerpts are quoted with approval in Garrison v. Machine Co., 159 N. C. 285, 74 S. E. 821, where the same doctrine is announced by Walker, J., in an elaborate review of the authorities on the subject in hand.

[1] We are of the opinion, however, that the admission made in open court to the effect that the defendant county was entitled to a judgment on the note and mortgage in question (though subject to certain credits) takes these instruments out of the class of conditionally delivered contracts, if, indeed, they were ever entitled to be styled as such. To admit their present validity and binding force for any purpose, in advance of the happening of the contingent event upon which it is alleged they were to take effect, is at variance with the theory of a conditional delivery and brings into operation other principles of law.

"It is * * * fully understood that, although a written instrument purporting to be a definite contract has been signed and delivered, it may be shown by parol evidence that such delivery was on condition that the same was not to be operative as a contract until the happening of some contingent event, and this on the idea, not that a written contract could be contradicted or varied by parol, but that, until the specified event occurred, the instrument did not become a binding agreement between the parties." Bowser v. Tarry, supra.

The question is controlled very largely by the intention of the parties. Waters v. Annuity Co., 144 N. C. 670, 57 S. E. 437, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 805. But plaintiffs have abandoned this position (if they were ever entitled to take it) by their admission in open court; for it is only upon the strength and validity of the note and mortgage that any judgment at all could be rendered against them and in favor of Carteret county.

[2] A valid delivery and binding contract having once been established or admitted, the plaintiffs may not thereafter be permitted to annex a condition subsequent resting in parol and in direct contradiction to the express terms of their written obligation, for this would infringe upon the well-settled rule that oral evidence will not be admitted to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument. Mfg. Co. v. McCormick, 175 N. C. 277, 95 S. E. 555, L. R. A. 1918F, 572, and cases there cited. This doctrine was well stated by Smith, C. J., in Ray v. Blackwell, 94 N. C. 10, as follows:

"It is a rule too firmly established in the law of evidence to need a reference to authority in its support that parol evidence will not be heard to contradict, add to, take from, or in any way vary the terms of a contract put in writing, and all contemporary declarations and understandings are incompetent for such purpose, for the reason that the parties, when they reduced their contract to writing, are presumed to have inserted in it all the provisions by which they intend to be bound"—citing 1 Greenleaf, Ev. § 76; Etheridge v. Palin, 72 N. C. 213.

And to like effect are many decisions in our reports, too numerous to be cited here. In Walker v. Venters, 148 N. C. 388, 62 S. E. 510, it was said:

"It is true that a contract may be partly in writing and partly oral (except when forbidden by the statute of frauds), and that in such cases the oral part of the agreement may be shown. But this is subject to the well-established rule that a contemporaneous agreement shall not contradict that which is written. The written word abides and is not to be set aside upon the slippery memory of man."

See, also, Moffitt v. Maness, 102 N. C. 457, 9 S. E. 399, one of the leading cases on this subject, and Sykes v. Everett, 167 N. C. 600, 83 S. E. 585, 4 A. L. R. 751. This last citation contains an interesting and illuminating discussion of a kindred and closely allied subject which supports and is in full accord with our present decision.

Kernodle v. Williams, 153 N. C. 475, 69 S. E. 431, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, and others like it have no application either to the law or the facts of this case. That case held:

"Where a contract is not required to be in writing, it may be partly written and partly oral, and in such cases, when the written contract is put in evidence, it is admissible to prove the oral part of it."

But the instrument here in question, a conveyance of land, to be applied to the payment of the defalcation of public funds by the grantor's nephew, is required to be entirely in writing, and no oral agreement or private understanding can years afterwards be written into the contract in order to relieve the grantor of the responsibility he assumed and upon the execution of which he procured the release of his nephew.

In Gaylord v. Gaylord, 150 N. C. 222, 63 S. E. 1028, the court held that—

"The doctrine of ingrafting an oral agreement upon a written instrument which is required by the statute of frauds for the conveyance of land cannot be established in favor of the grantor in the deed."

That case has been very often cited since with approval. See citations thereto in Anno. Ed.

In Campbell v. Sigmon, 170 N. C. 351, 87 S. E. 116, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 40, the court held:

"If, notwithstanding the solemn recitals and covenants in a deed, the grantor could show a parol trust in himself, it would virtually do away with the statute of frauds and would be a most prolific source of fraud and litigation. No grantee could rely upon the covenants in his deed"—citing, among other cases, Gaylord v. Gaylord, supra.

In Walters v. Walters, 172 N. C. 330, 90 S. E. 304, the same matter was fully discussed again, and it was held:

"The grantor cannot set up a parol trust in his own favor against the grantees," —saying:

"The ruling in Gaylord v. Gaylord, 150 N. C. 222, that a parol trust cannot be set up by a grantor as to a conveyance in fee to his grantee is not only upheld by the reasoning and authorities therein cited, but that case has since been upheld and reaffirmed in Ricks v. Wilson, 154 N. C. 286, Jones v. Jones, 164 N. C. 322, Cavanaugh v. Jarman, Id. 375, Trust Co. v. Sterchie, 169 N. C. 22, Campbell v. Sigmon, 170 N. C. 351, and Walters v. Walters (when here before) 171 N. C. 313."

In very recent cases, Allen v. Gooding, 173 N. C. 96, 91 S. E. 694, and Chilton v. Smith, 180 N. C. 472, 105 S. E. 1, Gaylord v. Gaylord has been again cited with approval. In the latter case the court overruled a previous decision of this court, Fuller v. Jenkins, 180 N. C. 554, 41 S. E. 706, which had mistakenly held that a deed absolute on its face could be converted into a mortgage because of an oral agreement between the parties at the time that it should operate as a mortgage, and said that it "stands alone and is expressly overruled."

If a negro or some poor white man is convicted of stealing a side of meat for his starving family, the doors of the state's prison usually lie open before him, but Thomas Thomas having been convicted of appropriating thousands of dollars intrusted to his care for safe-keeping and sentenced to the state penitentiary, it was made to appear to the Governor of the state, who has the unrestricted power of pardon, that it was more advisable to secure the return of this money to the taxpayers of Carteret county than that the criminal should be punished, and upon assurance that by this instrument his uncle had insured the payment of this fund to the taxpayers the pardon was granted. That was the consideration for this deed, and, according to the custom, this reason was given out to the world as the ground for the pardon. There is no provision in that deed that the grantor therein, who on the faith thereof procured the release of his nephew from the sentence of the law, should be "exempted from payment if some one else could be sued to recover the sum embezzled." There could be no oral agreement in favor of the grantor that, notwithstanding, in fact the public must collect the money, if they could, out of other people. On the written agreement that out of the land conveyed the county treasury would be reimbursed, the pardon was given and the convict released. The state performed its part of the contract. The agreement, on the other hand, was unequivocal that the property conveyed in the deed should be applied to reimburse the county and protect the people of the county from raising additional taxes to make good the loss their treasury had sustained by the defalcation. Upon the facts in the present record, the mortgage was delivered to the mortgagee and by him assigned to Carteret county in consideration of his pardon, and the conveyance was as unconditional as the pardon which he received.

The admission, having been made in open court in this case to the effect that the defendant county was entitled to a judgment on the note and mortgage in question, takes this instrument out of the class of conditional and conditionally delivered contracts, if indeed it had ever been entitled to be so styled. There was no reservation in the conveyance now sought to be set aside that it was "not to be valid if any one else could be sued for the money." It will not be charged by any one that the Governor in granting the pardon ever understood that this was a part of the instrument executed by the plaintiff. It was absolutely represented to him as an unconditional security to the county that the funds would be replaced by sale of the property conveyed, and in open court in this case it was admitted that the county was entitled to judgment on the note and mortgage.

Instead of that, these funds, which were taken out of the public treasury 8 to 10 years ago, are still withheld, and we are asked by the grantor to hold that there must be a long weary chase, taking the time of the courts at great additional expense to the county, to ascertain whether or not there was some private unwritten agreement with some one by which other people should first be sued to recover the money which the grantor contracted to pay if his nephew were released.

The pardon was unconditional, based upon the security of this conveyance of the unconditional payment of the money. The property of the citizens of Carteret county may be advertised for the payment of the enhanced taxes caused by the defalcation, but the property pledged for the repayment of that sum is still unsold, and the only visible result so far has been the added cost of the courts in investigating the plea of an oral understanding that the property of the grantor is to be exempted from liability, if some one else can be found who can be sued. The public burdens are increased by protracted litigation in the metaphysical round of legal technicalities in the effort by learned counsel to—with the ultimate result possible that, if any one ever pays anything, there will be little, if any, of it that will get into the treasury for the benefit of the people who have lost it.

Applying these principles, his honor might well have excluded all the evidence offered on the second trial and rendered judgment on the verdict as returned and left undisturbed at the June term, 1920. But, as the same result has been accomplished, though somewhat irregularly, by the judgment as entered, we have concluded to let it stand, as it is a matter of public interest to all the people of Carteret county that this litigation should be disposed of as speedily as possible. It is their money which has been misused and misappropriated, if not embezzled; and up to the present time nothing has been refunded or paid back. The note and mortgage in question were given to make good this shortage and to save the county harmless from the defalcations of one of its officers. These transactions occurred in the year 1916. The plaintiffs' obligation matured on February 7, 1917. Nothing further seems to have been done until this suit was instituted on February 3, 1919, to require the commissioners to proceed with the collection of the prior securities in exoneration of plaintiffs' undertaking. Plaintiffs also allege that the county authorities have been negligent in this respect, and they have sought to be relieved from any further liability by reason of such delay and inaction. It would seem that this surreptitiously taken money, to say the least, should have been made good long ago. Public funds belong in the public treasury; and we are unable to find any warrant of law for such indulgences as are disclosed by the present record.

This opinion will be certified to the superior court of Carteret county, to the end that the judgment entered at the June term, 1921, may be modified so as to provide for a report and confirmation of the sale as required by statute; and, as thus amended and changed, the judgment will be affirmed.

Modified and affirmed.

STACY, J., not sitting.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). As much as I deprecate it, I am constrained to dissent from the opinion and impending judgment of this court, as I think that upon the issues found by the jury including the two (Nos. 4 and 5 of the second series of issues) which were set aside by Judge Horton for error in law, and which should be reinstated, as there was no error in law or in fact, there should be a judgment against Mace, administrator of Alonzo Thomas, for $5,000, and against the United States Fidelity Company of Baltimore for $8,500, and only if there is any balance due after applying these sums as credits on the whole amount due the county should there be any judgment against the county. A brief history of this case will demonstrate what a grave injustice we are about to inflict upon the plaintiffs, who have unquestionably the highest and strongest equity in this case as against all of the other parties.

The county of Carteret was about to lose a large sum of money ($13,500) by the defalcation of Thomas Thomas, as special agent of the courthouse fund and as treasurer of the county, and also by the defalcation of Alonzo Thomas, as treasurer of the county. Alonzo was surety on the bond of Thomas Thomas, and hence the judgment against Mace, his administrator, and the United States Fidelity Company of Baltimore was surety on the bond of Alonzo Thomas as treasurer of the county. When the debt to the county had been incurred by the said defalcation, the plaintiffs Thomas M. Thomas and his wife executed their note with a mortgage or deed of trust on their land to secure it, and payable to Thomas Thomas, for the purpose of having it deposited by him with the county to secure the debt he owed the county, with the contemporaneous understanding and express stipulation that the note and mortgage should not take effect until the county had exhausted the securities it already had for said debt, which securities consisted at the time of the bond of Thomas Thomas on which Alonzo Thomas was security for $5,000 and the bond given by Alonzo Thomas himself as treasurer of the county, on which the United States Fidelity Company was surety, for $12,000. No other securities were intended than those just mentioned; in other words, the county was required to exhaust the bonds of Thomas Thomas as agent and as treasurer, and that of Alonzo Thomas as treasurer, before the note and mortgage of the plaintiffs handed to Thomas Thomas with the understanding that it should be deposited with the county, but upon the contingency that it should not become effective or resorted to as security for Thomas Thomas' defalcations of all kinds until other securities were first exhausted.

The authorities are very numerous to the effect that a note and mortgage or contract may be made to depend upon a contingency or condition, and that it is a full defense to an action upon the note that the contingency has not happened or the condition not performed. It makes no difference what the contingency or condition is, so that it is lawful and has some relation to the contract, or perhaps, even if it does not, but is purely collateral. Kelly v. Oliver, 113 N. C. 442, 18 S. E. 698, which has often been approved as a good illustration of the principle. It is also held that such a contingency or condition stipulated for at the time of the execution of the contract, bond, or deed does not contradict or vary the terms of the latter, and is merely a contemporaneous agreement postponing its legal operation. It is said in Kelly v. Oliver, supra, to be competent for the defendant (plaintiffs here) to show that, although he signed and delivered the instrument, it was not to go into effect as to him (or them) until a certain condition was performed, and that this does not violate the rule as to contradicting or varying a writing, but has only the effect of a purely collateral undertaking postponing the effectiveness of the written contract, etc., until the happening of the contingency or the compliance with the condition, citing Penniman v. Alexander, 111 N. C. 427, 16 S. E. 408, which, in its turn, cites Kerchner v. McRae, 80 N. C. 219; Braswell v. Pope, 82 N. C. 57; Woodfin v. Sluder, 61 N. C. 200. The learned reporter thus headnotes the case of Penniman v. Alexander, supra:

"The maker of a promissory note, or other similar instrument, if sued by the payee, may show as between them a collateral agreement putting the payment upon a contingency, and it is competent also for a defendant sued as acceptor of such instrument to show in defense the conditions of his acceptance."

And to the same effect is Aden v. Doub, 146 N. C. 10, 59 S. E. 162, where we held:

"The position taken by the plaintiff that the evidence tended to contradict a written instrument, and, besides, a negotiable instrument, is clearly without any support in law. In the first place, the written agreement was made at the very time the note was given, as a part of the same transaction [and the plaintiff had notice of the condition on which it was delivered]. This does not bring the case within the rule of evidence by which it is forbidden to vary or contradict a written instrument, nor within that other rule protecting an innocent purchaser for value of a negotiable instrument. It is not a correct proposition in law, as stated in the plaintiff's prayer for instructions, that a negotiable instrument is of such high dignity as a medium of exchange that the parties cannot annex any lawful condition to its payment at the time it is given, when the action to recover it is between the original parties to it," or the holder of the note is fixed with notice of the agreement, for he is not then a bona fide purchaser.

The case of Penniman v. Alexander, supra, was reaffirmed in 115 N. C. 555, 20 S. E. 210. The question is fully discussed, as to this and other features of this case, in Evans v. Freeman, 142 N. C. 61, 54 S. E. 847, where we said that—

"Applying the rule we have laid down, it has been adjudged competent to show by oral evidence a collateral agreement as to how an instrument for the payment of money should in fact be paid, though the instrument is necessarily in writing and the promise it contains is to pay so many dollars. In support of the proposition, as thus stated, we may refer specially to the comparatively recent decisions."

Hughes v. Crooker, 148 N. C. 318, 62 S. E. 429, 128 Am. St. Rep. 606 (opinion by Connor, J.), held that, when a promissory note is given in pursuance of the terms of a written contract, evidence can be introduced of a contemporaneous oral agreement, made as a part thereof, to the effect that the note and contract were executed and given upon a condition which has not been performed. This does not vary by parol the terms of the written instrument, but postpones its operation until the happening of the contingency. I could cite additional authorities in this and other jurisdictions to the same effect, and almost without number, but will add only a few in the court: Garrison v. Machine Co., 159 N. C. 285, 289, 290, 74 S. E. 821; Sykes v. Everett, 167 N. C. 600, 83 S. E. 535, 4 A. L. R. 751; Bressee v. Crumpton, 121 N. C. 122 (opinion by Clark, J.), 28 S. E. 351; Gazzam v. Insurance Co., 155 N. C. 330, 71 S. E. 434, Ann. Cas. 19120, 362; Bowser v. Tarry, 156 N. C. 35, at pages 38, 39, 72 S. E. 74; Pratt v. Chaffin, 136 N. C. 350, 48 S. E. 768; Mercantile Co. v. Parker, 163 N. C. 277, 79 S. E. 606. No case states the principle more strongly or clearly than Bowser v. Tarry, supra (opinion by Justice Hoke), and he adds that "it is now very generally recognized."

But I am not bound to sustain that proposition, in order to show that the plaintiff cannot be proceeded against until the county fulfills its part of the agreement so solemnly entered into by it.

My second contention is this, and I think that there can be no question as to its correctness if our own decisions are of force or value as authorities or precedents: Whether or not the condition which was annexed contemporaneously with the delivery of the notes to the county affects the operation or validity of the contract is not essential to the protection of the plaintiffs from the injustice of making them pay what others owe. We may waive or pretermitt this view, and yet they are still without any liability unless and until the county has shown its compliance with the condition, for, if the condition was annexed by parol as a collateral part of the contract, not in writing, and not intended to be, or, to be more accurate, if it is the other part of the contract (and does not contradict the written part), the county is just as much bound to perform the condition before suing the plaintiffs as if it affected the operation, going into effect, validity, or enforceability of the contract. Mr. Clark, in his treatise on Contracts (2d Ed.), at page 85, says:

"Where a contract does not fall within the statute, the parties may at their option put their agreement in writing, or may contract orally, or put some of the terms in writing and arrange others orally. In the latter case, although that which is written cannot be aided by parol evidence, yet the terms arranged orally may be proved by parol, in which case they supplement the writing, and the whole constitutes one entire contract."

Commenting upon the quoted passage, we substantially said in Evans v. Freeman, supra, that in such a case there is no violation of the familiar and elementary rule we have before mentioned, because in the sense of that rule the written contract is neither contradicted, added to, nor varied; but, leaving it in full force and operation as it has been expressed by the parties in the writing, the other part of the contract is permitted to be shown in order to round it out and present it in its completeness, the same as if all of it had been committed to writing. The oral evidence tends to insert by parol the complement of the written terms so as to present the whole of it as the parties intended it should be.

All the cases hold, and there are many of them, that in so doing there is no contradiction of the written terms, but they can co-exist in perfect harmony. I have already referred to some of that class of cases. Justice Hoke states the general proposition well in Typewriter Co. v. Hardware Co., 148 N.

C. 97, 55 S. E. 417, and, citing Broom on Parol Evidence, § 117, he says that parol evidence is admissible to show an agreement or method of discharging the contract other than that specified in the bond. He discusses the matter fully and assigns the reason for the rule, citing Woodson v. Beck, 151 N. C. 144, 65 S. E. 751, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 235, and Walker v. Venters, 148 N. C. 388, 62 S. E. 510 (relied on in the opinion of the court in this case), as necessarily excepted from the operation of the principle by the peculiar terms of the contracts upon which those suits were brought. I also refer to Cobb v. Clegg, 137 N. C. 153, 49 S. E. 80, where the subject is fully discussed. If we should not follow the principle stated, we might shake the validity of many transactions in our banks which have been recognized as entirely within the law, for deposits of collaterals to secure debts are conducted in the same way and accompanied by similar parol agreements to the one in this case. No one has ever doubted their legality. As pointed out in Evans v. Freeman, supra, and Typewriter Co. v. Hardware Co., supra, the promise, by note or otherwise, to pay so many dollars at a specified time, is not contradicted by, nor does it conflict with, oral terms as to how the money should be paid, or by showing that something was to be done by the other party before the money should be forthcoming. But there is a more recent case which fully and completely covers our case and upon similar facts. Kernodle v. Williams, 153 N. C., at pages 476, and 477, 69 S. E. 431, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934, where the Chief Justice says:

"While it is true that a contemporaneous parol agreement is not competent to vary, alter, or contradict a written agreement, still, when a contract is not required to be in writing, it may be partly written and partly oral, and in such cases, when the written contract is put in evidence, it is admissible to prove the oral part thereof. Nissen v. Mining Co., 104 N. C. 310. This is not varying, altering, or contradicting the written instrument, but merely showing forth the entire contract that was made."

He then instances the conditions of a mortgage and a penal bond, and says:

"So also with a penal bond, which is generally in a large sum, with a condition annexed by which it is of no effect unless a certain event happens, and even then the obligor is usually called on to pay a much smaller sum. There are many other instances which might be given of a like nature."

Referring to the special facts of his case, the Chief Justice puts our case in principle when he says further:

"In the present case the contract, as alleged by the defendants and found to be true by the jury, in its entirety, was that the plaintiff gave his daughter $500 absolutely, and took her note for the other $915, upon which certain payments were to be made (which are admitted to have been made), and the balance was given conditionally that it was to be accounted for with the father's executor, i. e., to be required only if needed for the payment of the debts of the estate. Such an agreement is not a contradiction of the terms of the bond, for the full amount would be paid, if necessary, upon the happening of the conditions stipulated for. Agreements of this nature have often been held valid."

But he goes on and refers to our cases as decisive of the question, such as Penniman v. Alexander, supra, Evans v. Freeman, supra, and Typewriter Co. v. Hardware Co., supra. He continues:

"In Evans v. Freeman [supra], it is said that, if an agreement is partly in writing and partly oral, evidence is competent 'for the purpose of establishing the unwritten part of the contract, or even of showing the collateral agreement made contemporaneously with the execution of the writing.' The court adds that this has been repeatedly held by this court, and 'it has been adjudged competent to show by oral evidence a collateral agreement as to how an instrument for the payment of money should, in fact, be paid, though the instrument is necessarily in writing, and the promise it contains is to pay so many dollars.' To same purport, Typewriter Co. v. Hardware Co. [supra]."

And finally he collates the law in this wise:

"The subject is thus summed up by Browne on Parol Ev. 252, who, quoting the last-named case [Brook v. Lattimer, 44 Kan. 431] and many others, says, that parol evidence is competent between the original parties to show that the consideration was illegal, or to show the real consideration and purpose, or to show that it was fraudulent, or to show an additional collateral consideration, giving many instances, among them the most common being to show that a note given by a child to a parent, though absolute in terms, was by parol agreement to be deemed an advancement."

Justice Manning dissented in that case, but at page 485 admits the correctness of the principle we have stated, but says it is confined to a certain class of cases, and "it will be discovered, I think, that none of these written instruments were based upon a present consideration or that the maker executed them as evidence of an existing liability, but for accommodation of the payee and without consideration." The learned justice largely bases his dissent upon the ground that in that case the oral evidence would not only contradict the written part of the contract, but destroy the bond. But that would not be the case here, as, if the county prosecuted the defaulting parties and their sureties with proper diligence and failed to recover, it would have complied with the condition (or contingency), and the bond and mortgage would immediately come into full operation as a security for the county (as said by the Chief Justice in the Kernodle Case), for the latter, even under the entire contract, written and parol, was only a guarantor for collection, and subject only to the obligation of such a guarantor. So it comes to this, that in the Kernodle Case the court was practically unanimous as to the question we have here for decision. Other authorities are Wilson v. Powers, 131 Mass. 539; Pym v. Campbell, 6 El. & Bl. 88; 1 Elliott on Ev. § 575. So that I say finally, as to this part of the case, that in either of the views presented by me the judgment of the court below and the opinion of this court about to be promulgated, in which it is affirmed with slight modification, are erroneous, and fly in the face of every well-considered case of this court upon the subject.

Now let us look at this case from another viewpoint, and this concerns the larger equity involved. The jury, by their verdict at June term, 1920, found as follows:

First. That Thomas Thomas, trustee of the sinking fund, misappropriated $13,236.39, and is indebted to the county in that amount.

Second. That the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as surety of Thomas Thomas, as treasurer of the county, owed nothing.

Third. That Mace, administrator of Alonzo Thomas, as surety for Thomas Thomas, trustee, etc., is indebted to the county in the sum of $5,000.

Fourth. That the note and mortgage of T. M. Thomas and wife, Laura, delivered to Thomas Thomas and assigned to the county, were not taken and accepted by the latter with the agreement that they should be used only after the other securities held by the county for Thomas Thomas, trustee, were exhausted, as alleged in the complaint. (This part of the verdict set aside by Judge Connor.

Fifth. The fifth issue as to the indebtedness of T. M. Thomas and wife to the county on the note for $13,500 was not answered.

The court at June term, 1920, gave no judgment, but merely set aside the answer to the fourth issue and allowed the plaintiffs to amend generally, and it will be seen now that the issues submitted by Judge Horton at June term, 1921, are different from those submitted by Judge Connor at June term, 1920. They are as follows:

"(4) In what amount, if any, is W. A. Mace, administrator, etc., of Alonzo Thomas, indebted to Carteret county on account of the term of said Alonzo Thomas as treasurer of Carteret county beginning on the first Monday in December, 1914, and ending at the death of said Alonzo Thomas on the 18th day of November, 1915? Answer: $5,000 and interest.

"(5) What amount, if any, is Carteret county entitled to recover of defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety for said Alonzo Thomas as treasurer of Carteret county for said term, beginning on the first Monday in December, 1914? Answer: $8,236.49, and interest.

"(6) Were the note and mortgage given to Thomas Thomas by plaintiff given as an accommodation paper to said Thomas Thomas, as alleged by plaintiffs? Answer: Yes.

"(7) Is the defendant Carteret county a holder for value as between it and the plaintiffs of the $13,500 note and mortgage made by plaintiffs? Answer: Yes. (But it had notice of the condition because it agreed to it at the time.)

"(8) Was the note and mortgage of plaintiffs executed to Thomas Thomas and assigned to Carteret county taken and accepted with the understanding and agreement that the same should be used by the county only after the bonds of said Thomas Thomas and of said Alonzo Thomas had been exhausted, as alleged by plaintiffs, and then applied to the unpaid balance due said county on account of the Thomas Thomas trusteeship of the sinking fund and the treasurer'ship of said Alonzo Thomas? Answer: Yes.

"(9) What sum, if any, is Carteret county entitled to recover of plaintiffs on account of the note for $13,500, secured by mortgage assigned to said county by Thomas Thomas? Answer: $13,234.49, with interest from October 1, 1910, to be credited with $5,000 and interest on same from June 15, 1921, due by the estate of Alonzo Thomas as surety for Thomas Thomas, trustee of the courthouse bond sinking fund, the last issue having been answered by the court by consent of parties that the court might answer same after verdict as a matter of law."

The court then entered the following as a part of its judgment:

"It is now considered and adjudged by the court that the answers to the issues numbered 4 and 5 be, and are on motion of defendants, other than Carteret county, set aside as a matter of law, for the reason that the jury found at the June term, 1920, by its answer to the first issue that Thomas Thomas, trustee of courthouse bond fund, received and misappropriated the funds. It is further ordered and adjudged by the court, that Carteret county recover nothing against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety, and that said defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company go without day and recover its costs."

Judgment was then given against Mace, administrator of Alonzo Thomas, for $5,000 and the costs, a judgment against the plaintiffs for $13,236.49, less the $5,000 adjudged against Mace, administrator, and the mortgage of the plaintiffs assigned to the county was ordered to be foreclosed, and the land therein described sold to pay the said debt of plaintiffs to the county.

It will be observed that Judge Horton set aside the fourth and fifth issues of June term, 1921, as matter of law because the jury at June term, 1920, had found in answer to the first issue that Thomas Thomas, trustee of the courthouse fund, had received and misappropriated the same.

How the fourth and fifth issues of June term, 1921, could be set aside, as matter of law, because of the finding on the first issue, I fail to perceive. Nobody doubted that Thomas Thomas, as trustee of the courthouse fund, had defaulted and was indebted to the county in the sum of $13,236.49, but this did not prevent Alonzo Thomas, as treasurer of the county, from being indebted also to the county, if, as treasurer, he had received the funds from Thomas Thomas, no matter where they came from, so that he received them by virtue or by color of his office. Having received them in that way, he became responsible for them to the county, and it appears from the evidence in the record and the finding of the jury that Thomas Thomas, as trustee, and the same as treasurer, and also Alonzo Thomas, as treasurer, had jointly and by their indiscriminate use and misuse of the county funds in their hands, made themselves liable for the same. It makes no difference from whence the money came, or how they juggled with these funds, so that they received them "by virtue of" or "by color of" their several offices, the two terms having very different meanings. Judge Reade has said:

"The defendants insist that 'by virtue' and 'under color' mean the same thing. They mean very different things. For instance, the proper fees are received by virtue of the office; extortion is under color of the office. Any rightful act in office is by virtue of the office. A wrongful act in office may be under color of the office. Color in law means not the thing itself, but only an appearance thereof; as color of title means only the appearance of title." Broughton v. Haywood, 61 N. O. at page 384.

If the position of the United States Fidelity Company is correct, then the county could not have recovered money belonging to it, as its courthouse fund, if Thomas Thomas, the original defaulter, who was insolvent, had paid it over to either Thomas Thomas, treasurer, or Alonzo Thomas, treasurer. But that is not the law, as Broughton v. Haywood, supra, shows, and it is upon the principle as therein stated that the sureties of the two defaulters were charged with liability by the jury, and really also by the referee. They were manipulating the county's money, as if it belonged to them, for their own benefit and advantage, playing fast and loose with the county finances, whereas the proper place, as said in the opinion of the court in this case, for the county's money to be, was in the county treasury, and but for the malfeasance of these two officers, who forget that they were fiduciaries, it would have been there long ago, but it should not get there, and the county, as shown by its answer, does not want it to get there, by a gross injustice to the plaintiffs, who, as a mere gratuity, helped to secure it to the county, upon its sacred promise that it would not call on the plaintiffs, by suing on the note or foreclosing the mortgage, until it had exhausted all other securities held by it in law or in equity, and it has expressly asked that such be not done. The good people of Carteret county would prefer that the treasury be empty than to subject the note and mortgage to the payment of the amount due by the default of its officers, in violation of its agreement not to fall back upon the note, and it expresses itself as ready and willing to comply with its part of the agreement. It would not have received this security but for this promise on its part, and which it is asking now that it may be permitted to keep and perform.

The plaintiffs are volunteers, while the United States Fidelity Company, though professing to be a benefactor to our people, has come into this state to ask for the patronage of its citizens, for a consideration and a good one, which it has been receiving from them for years and filling its coffers, and now is asking to transfer its obligation, purchased for a consideration by the defaulting officers, to the shoulders of the plaintiffs, who acted gratuitously to help the county out of its difficulty and financial embarrassment. Which of the two is entitled to the first consideration of this court, or any court as far as that is concerned? The law is with the plaintiffs, and the highest and strongest equity, which appeals to a court of conscience for its aid in executing justice. Judge Connor very properly set aside the answer to the original fourth issue, as being against the clear weight of the evidence. The eighth of the new issues, relating to the same question, that is, the manner in which the note and mortgage were held by the county, was answered in favor of plaintiffs that the bonds of the two Thomases should be first exhausted before plaintiffs should be compelled to pay anything, and only used to pay any balance due after such bonds were exhausted. The jury further find that the note and mortgage were strictly accommodation papers. There was no conflict between the answer to the first issue and the answers to the new fourth and fifth issues. They related to different matters, and were not in any way inconsistent, but can well stand together. His honor's order setting them aside was not only error in law, but also error in fact, and I have already demonstrated that this is true, by showing that both Thomas Thomas, as trustee, and Alonzo Thomas, as surety, could be indebted to the county at one and the same time, and, even if there was error in law, he could only order a new trial as to those issues, and not vacate them and stop there, if it was competent at all for the judge to render a judgment upon two verdicts returned before different judges and especially after there had been a general order to replead. Such procedure might produce great confusion if followed as a precedent. But I contend that, if we take both verdicts into consideration, the answers to the fourth and fifth issues should be reinstated, and judgment thereon rendered for the county. This is the safest, shortest, and swiftest method by which the county can be restored to its own, and has the great advantage of enabling the county to discharge its legal, equitable, and moral duty to the plaintiffs by redeeming the promise upon the faith of which it obtained their note and mortgage. It is asking that it be allowed to do so, and why not let it do so, and make the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company pay its share of the liability, which it assumed for a valuable consideration.

Reverting now to a more intimate and particular discussion of the issues and evidence to support them, Judge Horton did not set aside the third and fourth issues because they were against the weight of the testimony, and he let the other issues stand unchallenged, and especially the eighth, which found the agreement made contemporaneously with the delivery of the note and mortgage to be as alleged by plaintiffs. Judge Connor also believed there was evidence to support the plaintiffs' contention, and he set aside the fourth of the first set of issues as being against the clear weight of the testimony. The fourth issue of that set corresponds somewhat with the eighth issue of the second set, though the latter is broader and more comprehensive. So we have the concurrent opinions of Judges Connor and Horton to the effect that there was evidence to be considered by the jury on the material issues. In this contention I will refer to Palmer v. Lowder, 167 N. C. 331, at page 333, 83 S. E. 464, 466, where the Chief Justice says:

"While parol evidence is not admissible to vary or contradict a written agreement, yet, when the agreement is not one which the statute requires to be in writing, it is competent to show by parol that only part of the agreement was in writing and what was the rest of the agreement. * * * Indeed, no proposition of law can be better settled."

He cites many cases, including Kernodle v. Williams, supra, Nissen v. Mining Co., 104 N. C. 309, 10 S. E. 512, and Colgate v. Latta, 115 N. C. 138, 20 S. E. 388, 26 L. R. A. 321, and says Abbott's Trial Ev. p. 294, thus states the same principle:

"A written instrument, although it be a contract within the meaning of the rule on this point, does not exclude evidence tending to show the actual transaction, where it appears that the instrument was not intended to be a complete and final settlement of the whole transaction, and the object of the evidence is simply to establish a separate oral agreement in the matter as to which the instrument is silent and which is not contrary to its terms nor to their legal effect."

This passage from Abbott's book is quoted with approval in Bule v. Kennedy, 164 N. C. at page 298, 80 S. E. 445. Judge Allen states the rule very aptly in Brown v. Mitchell, 168 N. C. 312, 84 S. E. 404, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 933, and actually sustained the introduction of a brand-new stipulation into a written contract, citing Wilson v. Scarboro, 163 N. C. 384, 79 S. E. 811, and other cases already mentioned by me, and he further held the consideration of the contract to be amply sufficient. See, also, Potato Co. v. Jenette, 172 N. C. 1, 89 S. E. 791.

The contention in the court's opinion by the Chief Justice that Kernodle's Case has no application here is based upon a total misconception both as to what that case decides and as to what is involved in this case. This is not an attempt to reform a written instrument, contradict, or vary it. Judge Pearson with his usual legal acumen, accuracy, and vigor of perception, makes it very clear in Shelton v. Shelton, 68 N. C. 292, 294, 295, that the rule of evidence as to altering a written instrument by parol is not at all violated or infringed. Besides, the deed of mortgage was not the only paper deposited as collateral, but the note was the principal thing, and the deed would go with it, if it had not been deposited, as an incident to it. Hyman v. Devereux, 63 N. C. 624. Nor is the deposit of a collateral required to be in writing. The deposit of a note as collateral is generally by parol, and the commercial world will be amazed to know that this proposition is even disputed. But a complete answer to the contention is that this kind of transaction is not required to be evidenced by a writing, as the statute of frauds has nothing to do with it, and the court travels far afield to support its untenable position when it advances such a reason. Nor has the doctrine of trusts any bearing whatever on the question. It is not a parol or oral trust, and this excludes from the case all that is said about Gaylord v. Gaylord, 150 N. C. 222, 63 S. E. 1028, Campbell v. Sigmon, 170 N. C. 351, 87 S. E. 116, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 40, Walters v. Walters, 172 N. C. 330, 90 S. E. 304, and the other cases cited in this connection. This is distinctly and only the deposit of collaterals—that is, the note secured by the mortgage—upon a contingency or a condition which may lie in parol, and is not required to be in writing. Colebrook on Collateral Securities, pp. 376 and 377, thus states the well-known rule of law and the commercial custom and practice:

"Parol testimony is received to establish the fact that the transfer of certificates was intended as collateral security only, although absolute in terms. This principle was applied to a stock transaction, where the assignment of title was absolute, the rule excluding parol testimony to vary or contradict a written instrument having reference only to the language used therein, and not forbidding inquiry into the object of the parties in executing and receiving the same"—citing many cases in the notes in support of the text, and among them McMahon v. Macy, 51 N. Y. 155; Lathrop v. Kneeland, 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 432; Jones v. Portsmouth R. R. Co., 32 N. H. 544; Pittsburg R. R. Co. v. Stewart, 41 Pa. 54; Tonica R. R. Co. v. Stein, 21 Ill. 96.

The contingency or condition is that the county shall first exhaust its other securities before resorting to the notes and mortgage, a transaction, not unusual, as our reports will clearly and fully show. See Michie's Digest, title "Contracts," and Kelly v. Oliver, supra, Evans v. Freeman, supra, and Hughes v. Crooker, supra, to which we add Hinton v. M. R. F. Life Ass'n, 135 N. C. 314, 326, 47 S. E. 474, 478, 65 L. R. A. 161, 102 Am. St. Rep. 545, where Justice Connor said:

"The testimony was competent. It is said, however, that to permit the testimony to be introduced violates the rule excluding parol evidence to contradict a written instrument. The proposed testimony in no manner contradicted the terms of the policy. It was offered to prove an agreement collateral to the policy."

See, also, Blair v. Security Bank, 103 Va. 762, 50 S. E. 262, where the court held it competent to prove that a paper delivered to the payee, or to any other person who is the holder thereof, on agreement that it was not to take effect except in a certain contingency or on condition, the latter must first happen or be performed before the holder can sue or recover on it. And this, we add, is true in all cases, except where the writing itself is contradicted or varied, which is not the case here, and even not as much so as in Cobb v. Clegg, supra, and some of the other cases we have mentioned. See, also, Hicks v. Critcher, 61 N. C. 353.

I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not challenge the correctness of Gaylord v. Gaylord and the other numerous cases supposed to be like it, because I am not required to do so to establish my contention, as they bear no likeness to this case, and are not pertinent authorities. I have only adverted to these matters because they are set forth in the opinion of the court as the grounds upon which it attempts to support what I consider to be a very unfortunate ruling. It is all beside the real merits of the case and the law involved in its proper decision, because, in any view, the plaintiffs are entitled to have the judgment against Mace, administrator, and the United States Fidelity Company entered upon the verdict. The eighth issue establishes their right, and has not been reversed or impaired in its force.

nor have any of the other issues essential to the enforcement of plaintiffs' right. The county says in its answer:

"Said Carteret county and M. Leslie Davis, treasurer, join with the plaintiffs in asking the court to fix liability upon the estate of Alonzo Thomas and upon the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company in such amounts as the evidence and law in this case will fix them with, on account of the default and embezzlement of the said Thomas Thomas as hereinbefore set out, and asks the court, if such liability is fixed in any amount against the estate of Alonzo Thomas or the United States Fidelity Company, that said amounts, as fixed, be paid in exoneration upon the said $13,500 note executed by the said T. M. Thomas and wife and indorsed for value by Thomas Thomas to Carteret county; and the said Carteret county and M. Leslie Davis, treasurer of Carteret county, do not in any way or manner waive any of their rights hereby against the plaintiffs in this action."

Even where a contract is required by the statute of frauds to be written, if it is admitted in the pleadings, the statute is thereby waived, and proof by parol will answer instead of a writing, and so also with the rule as to oral evidence to prove the entire contract, part of which is in writing. The cases already cited show this conclusively. Nor is this an effort to convert a deed absolute on its face into a mortgage, and nothing like it. There is not even a suggestion in the mortgage as to the conviction of Thomas Thomas of embezzlement, nor as to his pardon and the conditions of it. Nobody expected anything to be said in the mortgage about T. M. Thomas' nephew being exempted if some one else paid the debt or was sued for it, as it was not intended to be in there, but to take the form of a solemn collateral promise of the county (which admits it) that its other securities should be first exhausted, nor is there anything akin to a Pickwickian promise, which is purely imaginary and rather far-fetched, but, on the contrary, it is a promise expressly made by the county, and which it is anxious to perform in spirit and in letter, if the court will only give it a chance to do so. There is nothing wrong in this, at least the county does not think so, and refuses to assent to such a suggestion by asking now to perform the condition. It makes no difference how long litigation is protracted. It was not the fault of the plaintiffs, but of the United States Fidelity Company, who, if any one, has prolonged the litigation, but, if anybody has done so, it surely is not the plaintiffs.

Counsel and parties will be surprised to find that they are accused of protracting litigation unnecessarily by trying to defend and protect their clients' rights, and of invoking the invective of Samuel Butler in this couplet from Hudibras,

"He could distinguish, and divide
A hair 'twixt south and southwest side."

This was intended for a particular class of reformers, and not for the lawyers. That famous poem was conceived and written to satirize a certain officer who lived in the time of the Commonwealth, and who was enforcing too drastically the observance of laws by Parliament for the suppression of the innocent sports and amusements of the people, and it did not apply to the weightier matters of the law. If there is any excuse for the reference, a more appropriate one would be Dickens' satire of Lord Eldon, the Chancellor, in his Bleak House, but even the noble lord, while a little slow, preserved and protected equitable rights, though he was called the great procrastinator. People who believe in the rights of others as well as their own are of the mind that nothing is ever finally decided until it is decided right, but after all is said the county has the money owing to her within her grasp if she is only allowed to take it, as we have before shown. Thomas' pardon has nothing to do with this case, which concerns only the enforcement of a clearly worded and admitted contract with the equities of all kinds on the plaintiffs' side.

There is no agreement in the record that militates at all against my views, but the one that is there accords fully with them, and itself recognizes and submits to the enforcement of the condition upon which the papers were delivered to the county, and it does not rely on any such agreement to defeat the plaintiffs' action. The agreement expressly provides that the plaintiffs are only to pay what is left of the debt after applying as credits the amounts due from Mace, administrator, and the fidelity company, which does not appear in the opinion of the court. But the cases of Kelly v. Oliver, supra, as to the condition upon which the note and mortgage were taken by the county, and Kernodle v. Williams, supra, as to the admissibility of parol evidence to show the unwritten part of the agreement, are conclusive as to plaintiffs' equity. Those cases have been approved frequently since they were decided.

In conclusion I call attention to the manifest error in setting aside the fourth and fifth issues. This error was a clear misapprehension of the nature of the issues with which they were supposed to be in conflict.

The plaintiffs are not attacking or criticizing the issues and answers thereto as they now appear in the record, but the action on the two set aside by the judge and the answer to the ninth by him, which as a matter of law depends upon the ones set aside. His honor was evidently misled by the second issue of 1920, which was on another bond and cause of action set out in the original complaint against another principal with the same surety company for a different term and a different office. It had no reference to the cause of action set out in issues 4 and 5, June term, 1921, against another treasurer, Alonzo Thomas, on other bonds, with the same surety, introduced in the action by the further pleadings filed by permission of the court after June term, 1920, under the order at that term. There is no inconsistency between the two causes of action and the issues, though the surety involved is the same company. His honor also seemed to be under the impression that two different men and their sureties could not be liable for the same defalcation, which is, of course, erroneous.

Whatever may be said, the outstanding fact remains that the defendant in its answer admits the contemporaneous agreement to exhaust other securities, and asks of the court that, whatever may be done, that agreement should not be violated. The case is exceedingly plain, and there is but one conclusion to be drawn from it, not that the people will be taxed one cent more, as stated in the court's opinion, but that the county, which is asking equitable relief, is itself willing to do full equity in the premises. Nothing that can be said pro and con as to the facts or the law can overcome the force of its admission and its willingness to abide by it.

The county should have a judgment on the issues as returned by the jury, but the court refuses its request that the plaintiffs, if they are required to pay, be subrogated equitably to its rights, as against the fidelity company.

While the county was not the original payee named in the note and mortgage, it took both with notice of the stipulation touching the contingency or condition as to exhausting the securities, and in truth it was a party to that stipulation. So that it was not an innocent purchaser, and does not pretend that it is.

While I really believe and confidently insist that the judgment should be as I have indicated, it should, in any event, be so modified as to provide that the plaintiffs, if they are required to give up their note and mortgage and pay this debt to that extent, should be equitably subrogated to all the rights of the county as against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, with the verdict on the third and fourth issues restored, and that is what it asks should be done.

It is hard, very hard measure, that the plaintiffs should be made to carry this heavy indebtedness and the really responsible party should be allowed to go free, when the eighth issue and the answer to it now stand unreversed and unimpaired, and alone establish that the note and mortgage were given upon a contingency which had not happened or a condition which has not been performed.

BRANNON v. HARRIS et al. (No. 10685.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Principal and surety \S 115(2)—Failure to record mortgage security notes does not release surety.

Where surety on a note indorsed without understanding that it was to be secured by a mortgage, without inquiring as to whether security was taken, or whether it was in proper shape or recorded, and exercised no vigilance for his own protection, as by requesting that the mortgage be recorded, he is not released from liability because of loss in the value of the security caused by the failure of the obligee to record the mortgage.

2. Principal and surety \S 121—To release surety the act committed or omitted by the obligee must be enjoined on him by equity and required of him by the surety.

To effect the discharge of a surety, the act complained of on the part of the creditor must be of a positive character or an omission to perform some act, when required by the surety, which equity enjoined upon him and the omission of which proved injurious to the surety. (Per Cothran, J.)

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by A. B. Brannon against G. B. Harris and L. E. Garner. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant L. E. Garner appeals. Affirmed.

J. Clough Wallace and John K. Hamblin, both of Union, for appellant.

Barron, Barron & Barron, of Union, for respondent.

WATTS, J. [1] This is an appeal from judgment entered upon a directed verdict in favor of plaintiff by his honor Judge Townsend. At the close of the evidence a motion was made by both parties for a directed verdict in their favor—that of the plaintiff for full amount against both defendants; that of defendants for full amount against Harris and against Garner for $79.72. His honor directed a verdict against both defendants for the sum of $564.89. Defendant Garner appeals on the following exceptions:

"(1) His honor erred in holding that it was necessary for the indorser and accommodation surety, L. E. Garner, to request or demand of the plaintiff that he have the mortgage recorded before he could claim credit for any loss or damage to the security from plaintiff's neglect to have the said mortgage recorded, and in not holding that the failure to have the mortgage recorded under such request or demand would have absolutely discharged the surety from all liability on the note.

"(2) His honor erred in not holding that under the law the surety accommodation indorser, L. E. Garner, was entitled to credit on the note evidencing the debt sued on for all loss or damage caused by the plaintiff's neglecting to have the said mortgage recorded, resulting in the deterioration and depreciation of the security held for the payment of said debt, and in not directing the verdict as moved by defendant's counsel.

"(3) His honor erred in directing the verdict against both defendants for the full amount due on the debt evidenced by said note."

It will be seen that Harris had practically no defense and does not appeal. Garner's defense is that plaintiff should have recorded his security, and, if he had done so, he would have had first mortgage over the mules, instead of second mortgage. The evidence shows that, when the trade was closed between Brannon and Harris, Garner was not present. Harris took mortgage on his own initiative, without suggestion from any one. Garner does not suggest that the security was to be taken for the protection of himself, and that the taking in any manner influenced him in indorsing the note, but says that the matter was not mentioned between Brannon and himself, but that he knew Brannon had taken the security. The evidence shows conclusively that Brannon took the mortgage for his own protection. Garner did not suggest it at the time it was taken, knew nothing about it until later; indorsed the note with no understanding that such security was to be taken, or that he was to be benefited thereby. He simply assumed that plaintiff would do what he could to secure the note. He made no inquiry as to whether security was taken, whether it was in proper shape, whether it was recorded or not. He simply did nothing to protect his indorsement, and by his carelessness he cannot now be relieved from paying the debt he obligated himself to pay when he indorsed the note sued upon. He exercised no vigilance at all for his protection.

All exceptions are overruled, and judgment affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

COTHRAN, J. (concurring). [2] The point in this case is whether or not a surety is discharged in full or pro tanto by reason of loss resulting from the failure of the creditor to record a mortgage which the principal debtor had executed to the creditor as security for the debt. The question, in both aspects, is absolutely foreclosed by the cases below cited, which declare that, in order to effect the discharge of the surety, the act complained of on the part of the creditor must be of a positive character, or an omission to do so when required by the surety, which equity enjoined upon him, and the omission of which proved injurious to the surety. Lang v. Brevard, 3 Strob. Eq. 59;

A carrier, having posted notice that it would not be liable for goods left on platform until issuance of bill of lading, was not liable for loss of bale of cotton placed on platform by shipper, but stolen prior to issuance of bill of lading, notwithstanding shipper's custom of placing cotton on platform when purchased without obtaining bill of lading until the close of the business day, when bill of lading for the full day's purchases would be issued.

Action by S. Behrmann against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Rutledge, Hyde & Mann, of Charleston, and Winter & Winter, of Monck's Corner, for appellant.

John O. Edwards, of Monck's Corner, for respondent.

FRASER, J. The agreed statement of facts set out in the case is as follows:

"This is an action by S. Behrmann, plaintiff, against Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, defendant, for the value of one bale of cotton, alleged to have been delivered by plaintiff to defendant at Monck's Corner, S. C., on or about November 20, 1915, for shipment to Charleston, S. C., and not accounted for to plaintiff. The action was tried before Magistrate Altman, at Monck's Corner, January 25, 1917, and resulted in a verdict for plaintiff; whereupon the defendant appealed to the circuit court, Judge Ernest Moore presiding. Judge Moore having affirmed the judgment of the magistrate, notice of appeal to the Supreme Court was given, and the case now comes up on appeal, on the following agreed statement of facts:

"At the trial in the magistrate's court it was shown that the plaintiff was in the habit of buying cotton from the farmers, changing the marks, and shipping en bloc. On the day in question this particular bale of cotton was placed on defendant's platform at Monck's Corner by B. F. Murray, who notified plaintiff. Plaintiff paid Murray for the cotton and changed the mark, but did not notify defendant's agent that the cotton was on the platform. During the day plaintiff bought other cotton—a total of 16 bales that day. Late in the afternoon, plaintiff applied to defendant's agent for a bill of lading for the 16 bales. The agent agreed to give him a bill of lading for 15 bales, all that he could find on the platform, but said he knew nothing about the 16th bale, and declined to give a bill of lading for it. No trace of the missing bale has ever been found.

"It was shown on behalf of defendant that there had been a prior suit between the same parties for a missing bale of cotton, for which defendant had been required to pay. Defendant posted a notice at its depot, which plaintiff admits having seen, and to which he admits his attention was particularly directed at the former trial, to the effect that the railroad would not be liable for goods or freight of any kind left on its platform until after the shipper had received a bill of lading. Although this notice had been displayed for a long time, it was shown that plaintiff and one or two other shippers had been in the habit of placing cotton on the platform as it was purchased, and of getting a bill of lading for the full day's purchases just before closing time.

"Defendant contended at the trial, and in the circuit court, that it could not be held responsible for cotton or other property placed on its platform, unless it has issued a bill of lading, or at least had been notified and had accepted the property for shipment. Plaintiff claimed that, since the custom had been for merchants to leave cotton on the platform until the close of the business day, and then get a bill of lading for the entire amount, defendant was estopped from disclaiming responsibility for cotton placed on its platform, even though a bill of lading had not been issued, and the agent had not been notified.

This case is very nearly the same as the case of Copeland v. Railway, 76 S. C. 476, 57 S. E. 535. The differences are fatal to the respondent's view. The Copeland Case was a "fire case," but it was not tried on that theory, but on the theory that the cotton had been delivered to the railway as a common carrier. In that case there was no notice limiting liability. The respondent claims that, although in this case there was a notice, it had been disregarded, and it was a question of fact as to whether it had been waived or not. In this the respondent is in error. The notice did not forbid the placing of cotton on the platform, but limited the liability to the time of the giving of a bill of lading. There was no evidence that this was disregarded. If the cotton had been burned, the custom might have been construed as consent to the placing of the cotton on the right of way. The cotton was not burned, but stolen. The railway is liable for things burned on, but not for things stolen from, the right of way. The difference is fatal to the respondent's case. The judgment in the Copeland Case was affirmed on the scintilla doctrine. There is another difference, and that is that the unburned cotton was taken by the railway and sold for its own account. That was evidence from which a ratification might have been inferred. There are no such facts in this case.

Making allowances for the differences in the two cases, the Copeland Case is conclusive of this case, and the judgment appealed from is reversed.

COTHRAN, J. I concur in the opinion rendered by Mr. Justice FRASER. The action, as the agreed case shows, was for the value of a bale of cotton, alleged to have been delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, for shipment, and not accounted for by the defendant. It is therefore distinctly an action against the railroad company as a common carrier, and not as a warehouseman. The onus was upon the plaintiff, therefore, to show facts sufficient, at least prima facie, to establish the relation of the railroad company to him to have been that of a common carrier. The undisputed facts are as follows:

The plaintiff is a cotton buyer at Monck's Corner; he was in the habit of buying cotton from farmers who brought it into town in wagons; after a sale was consummated the farmer would have the cotton weighed and placed upon the depot platform, after which it was settled for by the plaintiff at his place of business; it was the custom of the plaintiff and other buyers to leave the cotton thus placed on the platform until the close of the business day, and then get a bill of lading for the entire lot purchased and placed during the day, the railroad company receiving no specific notice of such placing; there had been a prior suit between the same parties for a bale of cotton that had been so placed but could not be found, and the defendant was required to pay for it; the defendant posted a notice at its depot, which plaintiff admits having seen, and to which he admits his attention was particularly directed at the former trial, to the effect that the railroad would not be liable for goods or freight of any kind left on its platform until after the shipper had received a bill of lading. For the purpose evidently of counteracting the effect of this notice, this statement appears in the case:

"Although this notice had been displayed for a long time, it was shown that plaintiff and one or two other shippers had been in the habit of placing cotton on the platform as it was purchased, and of getting a bill of lading for the full day's purchases just before closing time."

During the day of the particular occurrence, the plaintiff bought a bale of cotton from a farmer by the name of Murray. Murray placed the bale on the platform and notified the plaintiff, not the defendant. The plaintiff paid Murray for the cotton and changed the marks, but did not notify the defendant that the cotton was on the platform. During the day he bought 15 other bales which were similarly placed. After the close of business, the plaintiff applied to the railroad agent for a bill of lading for the Murray bale and the other 15 bales which he had bought during the day. The Murray bale could not be found, and the agent declined to issue a bill of lading for more than the 15 bales then on the platform. No trace of the missing bale has ever appeared, and there is not the slightest explanation in the evidence as to the cause of its disappearance. It was not burnt, but whether stolen from the platform or shipped in error to another point does not appear.

The plaintiff sued in the magistrate's court for the value of the lost bale, and recovered a judgment; on appeal to the circuit court the magistrate's judgment was affirmed, and from that order the defendant has appealed.

The facts are conceded. There are no issues of fact in the case, and therefore the rule that this court in a law case has no power to review the findings of fact below is without applicability. The conclusions to be drawn from these admitted facts are legal, as to which this court has ample power of review, Whitney v. R. Co., 38 S. C. 365, 17 S. E. 147, 37 Am. St. Rep. 767, where it is held:

"While it may be admitted that a question of delivery is a mixed question of law and fact, yet there was no conflict of testimony here. Matters of law may be passed upon by the court."

The question of law for determination is: Do these facts tend to establish the relations of common carrier on the part of the railroad company? If they do not, as I shall endeavor to demonstrate, the judgment should be reversed. There is no allegation and no effort on the part of the plaintiff to establish the relation of warehouseman, but he has chosen to attempt the establishment of the relation of common carrier, a relation which generates a liability so drastic that relief can be had only upon the ground that the loss occurred by act of God or the public enemy. It is but fair, therefore, that in making that choice the plaintiff must take it with its concomitant conditions; that the burden is upon him to establish, at least prima facie, the existence of that relation.

He has attempted to do this by allegation and proof that the cotton was delivered to the railroad company for shipment. These are the elements of the relation, and of course, if he has established them, he is entitled to his verdict.

It is pertinent to inquire, therefore, what are the essential elements of delivery, and then to compare the facts of this case with them. In my opinion the authorities fully sustain the following proposition:

In order to charge the carrier with the practically absolute liability of a common carrier as compared with the limited liability of a warehouseman, the burden is upon the owner of the goods to establish: (1) That there has been a complete delivery of the goods to the carrier, actual or constructive; (2) that the delivery has been made for shipment, with full shipping directions; (3) that the goods have been accepted by the carrier for immediate shipment or at such time as the convenience of the carrier may suggest; (4) that the goods have gone into exclusive possession of the carrier and that nothing further is to be done with or to them by the owner.

The rule is thus clearly stated in 1 Hutch. Carr. (3d Ed.) § 105:

"The delivery must be complete. The duties and obligations of the common carrier with respect to the goods commence with their delivery to him; and this delivery must be complete, so as to put upon him the exclusive duty of seeing to their safety. The law will not divide the duty or obligations between the carrier and the owner of the goods. It must rest entirely upon the one or the other; and until it has become imposed upon the carrier by a delivery and acceptance, he cannot be held responsible for them."

The same author says, at section 112:

"The delivery must be to the carrier or his agent for immediate transportation; for if the goods are delivered to him to be stored for a certain time or until the happening of a certain event, or until something further is done to prepare them for transportation, or until further orders are received from the owner, the carrier becomes a mere depository or bailee until the appointed time has expired, or the other contingency happened, upon which the carriage is to commence, or until further orders have been given, as the case may be; for nothing could be more unjust than to permit the owner of the goods to impose upon a mere depository or warehouseman, whether he has yet become related to the goods as carrier or not, the extremely hazardous responsibility of the common carrier, so long as it might suit his interest or convenience to do so."

"The general and well-settled rule is that the liability of the common carrier commences wherever and as soon as the goods have been delivered to and accepted by him solely for transportation, although they may not be put immediately in itinere, but are at first, for his (the carrier's) own convenience and preparatory to the voyage or journey for which they are intended, temporarily deposited in his wharf or storeroom. In such cases, the deposit is a mere accessory to the carriage, and does not postpone his liability as common carrier to the time when they shall be actually put in motion towards their place of destination." 1 Hutch. Carr. § 113.

"To effect a delivery to the carrier there must be, either actually or in legal effect, a complete surrender to him of possession and custody, and, as a consequence, all control over the goods must be abandoned by the owner until the purpose of the bailment has been accomplished; and until this has been done it cannot be said that the carrier has assumed any responsibility for them as a carrier." 1 Hutch. (3d Ed.) § 119.

In Missouri R. Co. v. McFadden, 154 U. S. 155, 14 Sup. Ct. 990, 38 L. Ed. 944, the railroad company had actually issued a bill of lading for the cotton, but as a matter of fact it was in the possession of a compress company for subsequent delivery to the railroad company, and was destroyed by fire before actual delivery. The court held:

"The liability of a carrier begins when the goods are delivered to him [the carrier] or his proper servant authorized to receive them for carriage."

The quotation from Hutchinson set forth above is approved by the court, adding, "This doctrine is sanctioned by a unanimous course of English and American decisions," citing a large number of them, and stating, "Indeed, the citations might be multiplied indefinitely."

In Watts v. Railroad Co., 106 Mass. 466, it is held:

"The question arising in this case relates to their liability in respect to goods received at the depot to be carried. In respect to such goods, their liability as carriers commences as soon as the duty of immediate transportation arises, and not while they are delayed for the convenience of the owner."

In Turner v. Railroad Co., 86 Conn. 71, 84 Atl. 298, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 637, it is held (quoting from syllabus):

"The liability of a common carrier of goods commences upon complete delivery of the goods for immediate transportation, and until that time it does not hold the goods in the capacity of a common carrier."

The opinion states:

"The law is well settled that, until the goods to be carried are delivered for immediate transportation, the receiver does not hold them in the capacity of common carrier. His liability in that capacity commences upon the complete delivery of the goods for immediate transportation."

In a note to this case it is stated:

"The responsibility of a common carrier for goods entrusted to him commences when there has been a complete delivery for the purpose of immediate transportation. If part only of the goods is delivered and such part is lost or injured while awaiting the delivery of the remainder, the liability of the carrier is that of a warehouseman only. The liability as insurer commences only when the duty of immediate transportation arises. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Riggs, 10 Kan. App. 578, mem., 62 Pac. 712; Dunnington v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 153 Ky. 388, 155 S. W. 750; Watts v. Boston, etc., R. Corp., 106 Mass. 466; Burrowes v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 87 Neb. 142, 126 N. W. 1064, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 223; Fisher v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 9 Ohio Cir. Dec. 413, 17 Ohio Cir. Ct. 491; Union Steamship Co. v. Drysdale, 32 Can. Sup. Ct. 379. Gracy*, 93 Tenn. 314, 27 S. W. 664; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Insurance Co. of North America (Tex.) 28 S. W. 237."

In Bainbridge Co. v. Railroad Co., 8 Ga. App. 677, 70 S. E. 154, the car had been placed upon a side track and loaded and a bill of lading had been issued the carrier, and the shipper had, however, expressly agreed that the shipment should not be deemed delivered to the carrier until it had actually taken possession of it. The court held that the relation of common carrier had not been created.

In Wilson v. Railroad Co., 82 Ga. 386, 9 S. E. 1076, it is held that wood piled up along a railroad track, to be loaded by the owner when he could get the cars, is not completely delivered to the company.

In Railroad Co. v. Byrne, 100 Fed. 359, 40 C. C. A. 402, it is held that, where a carrier has constructed pens or yards in order to facilitate the loading of stock, the mere placing the stock in such pens will not be sufficient to impose upon the carrier the duties and liabilities of a common carrier.

In Mente v. I. C. R. Co., 7 Orleans App. 154, it is held that, while it is true that the custody of a carrier begins as soon as the goods are delivered by the shipper at the place appointed by the carrier for their reception, and before they are actually placed in the cars, still this custody is not that of a common carrier but that of a warehouseman, unless the goods are so delivered to the carrier that it may immediately, and without awaiting any further action on the part of the shipper, commence its service of actual transportation.

In Anderson v. Railroad Co. (Miss.) 38 South. 661, the cotton was placed on a station platform built for cotton for shipment. According to custom the shipper requested a car from the nearest station, but the conductor failed to comply with the request. The court held that, as no bill of lading had been issued, no actual delivery of the cotton made, and nothing to establish an implied acceptance of the shipment, the relation of common carrier had not been established.

In Busnight v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 592, 16 S. E. 323, it is said:

"Taking the facts most strongly in favor of the plaintiff, he asked of the defendant's freight agent a car to load with lumber to go to Philadelphia. The agent pointed out to the plaintiff a car which he might use for the desired purpose. The plaintiff loaded the car with lumber, and finished on the night of the 24th of December, but did not notify defendant's agent that the car was ready for shipment, nor of the name of the consignee. Treating the loading of the car upon defendant's track as a delivery to defendant and an acceptance, it was not yet ready for transportation, for the defendant had not been notified of its readiness, nor to whom it was to be shipped. It was necessary for the defendant to await further orders before shipment. Where goods are delivered to a common carrier to await further orders from the shipper before shipment, the former, while they are so in his custody, is only liable as warehousemen. O'Neill v. New York, C. & H. R. Co., 60 N. Y. 138; Wells v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 51 N. C. (8 Jones) 47, 72 Am. Dec. 556; Angell, Carr. 129. He is only responsible as carrier where goods are delivered to and accepted by him in the usual course of business for immediate transportation."

In Railroad Co. v. Lumber Co., 170 Ala. 627, 54 South. 205, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 965, it is held that where a carrier, at the request of a shipper, in pursuance of its usual practice, placed a car on a side track to be loaded with lumber, but failed to move it upon request of the shipper, in the absence of shipping instructions, no responsibility as a carrier arose.

In Nelson v. Railroad Co., 157 Ky. 256, 162 S. W. 1129, the carrier had placed a car upon a side track; the car was loaded by the shipper; the carrier was notified of the loading and requested to move it; nothing was said about the shipment of the car or to whom it was to go. The court held that the relation of common carrier had not been established.

In Dunnington v. Railroad Co., 153 Ky. 388, 155 S. W. 750, a car had been placed by the carrier on a side track to be loaded by the shipper; it was partly loaded; no bill of lading was issued and no notice given to the carrier; the court held that, although the carrier placed the car on the siding to be loaded by the shipper and to be moved after being loaded, there was no evidence that it was the custom of the carrier to take charge of a car until notified that it had been loaded, nor of a custom to treat freight thus partly loaded as delivered to and accepted by the carrier; and that accordingly the relation of common carrier had not been established.

In Barron v. Eldredge, 100 Mass. 458, 1 Am. Rep. 126, it is held:

"The responsibility of a common carrier, for goods intrusted to him commences when there has been a complete delivery for the purpose of immediate transportation. * * * The delivery must be for immediate transportation, and, of course, it cannot be complete if anything remains to be done by the shipper before the goods can be sent on their way."

In Wilson v. Railroad Co., 82 Ga. 386, 9 S. E. 1076, the court approved the charge of the trial judge which was stated to have been:

"The court charged the jury, in substance, that delivery is complete when, actually or in legal effect, the possession is surrendered to the carrier, and the owner abandons all control over the goods until the carriage is completed, and that not until this has been done does the responsibility of the carrier commence, either for loss or detention. Also, that if deposit along the line was made for the convenience of the owner in delivering at some future time, and if the carrier did not assume possession and custody to the exclusion of the owner, the wood was not accepted for shipment, and the carrier's responsibility would not begin until something more was done to accomplish the bailment. Also, that if plaintiff's vendors deposited the wood in this way, and continued to exercise acts inconsistent with its exclusive possession and custody by the company as a common carrier, the bailment would not begin until there was a complete surrender by the plaintiff to the carrier for shipment. Under the facts in evidence, and according to the authorities, these instructions were correct. Hutch. Carr. §§ 82-99, inclusive; 2 Ror. R. R. 1279 et seq. We think it clearly appears that under the system which both parties had in contemplation it was expected that, before delivery was consummated, the owner would either load the cars himself, or have it done by the company at his expense, after special request. Delivery on board the cars, according to that system, would terminate the plaintiff's possession, and be the inception of possession by the carrier."

In Dixon v. R. Co., 110 Ga. 173, 35 S. E. 369, the syllabus by the court is:

"The relation of shipper and carrier does not begin between the owner of goods and a railway company, though the former may have delivered the goods to the latter, if after such delivery anything required, either by law or the contract, remains to be done by the shipper, and in such case the rights and liability of the company are those only of a warehouseman."

The opinion declares:

"While the company, therefore, retained this property on board its cars at its depot, on account of the failure of the shipper to comply with the conditions precedent to its shipment, it occupied, as to him, the position of a warehouseman."

In a note to L. R. A. 1916C, 612, the author states the rule thus:

"As a general rule the responsibility of a common carrier for goods received by it begins as soon as the same are delivered and ready for immediate transportation. But, on the contrary, if the goods when so deposited are not ready for immediate transportation, and the carrier cannot make arrangements for their carriage to the place of destination until something further is done, or some further direction is given or communication made concerning them by the owner, the deposit must be considered to be in the meantime for his convenience and accommodation, and the receiver, until some change takes place, will be responsible only as a warehouseman. The party bringing the goods must first do whatever is essential to enable the carrier to commence, or to make needful preparations for commencing, the service required of it before it can be made liable or subjected to responsibility in that capacity."

In Railroad Co. v. Lowery (Tex. Civ. App.) 155 S. W. 992, it is held that, in order to constitute a delivery, complete control of the goods must be given to the carrier; that is to say, the owner must not retain any manner of control over the goods, and if any one else retains such control it must be as the agent of the carrier and not as the agent of the shipper.

The case of Whitney v. Railroad Co., 38 S. C. 265, 17 S. E. 147, 37 Am. St. Rep. 767, is one of questioned delivery to the consignee after the carriage had terminated. The car containing the cotton had been placed on a spur track built for the manufacturing company; the bill of lading had been surrendered; the freight had been paid; the seals had been broken by the manufacturing company and the cotton partly unloaded. The plaintiff contended that it had not been delivered. The court held otherwise, and applied the same test to delivery by the carrier as should be applied to delivery to it, viz. the possession and control of the property. It is the converse of the case at bar, but settled by the same principle.

In Brown v. Railroad Co., 19 S. C. 39, it is assumed to be the law that no liability as common carrier attaches until the goods shall have come into possession of the carrier and under its control.

In Railroad Co. v. Byrne, 100 Fed. 359, 40 C. C. A. 402, it is held that a railway company which permits stock to be placed in the pens which it has prepared by the side of its tracks to facilitate loading and unloading does not thereby receive the stock for shipment, or take possession or assume charge of it as a common carrier; that the limit of its liability is that of a warehouseman, to exercise ordinary care in the construction and maintenance of its pens.

In 10 C. J. 226, it is said:

"It is well settled that, where the carrier is directed by the shipper to do that which is incompatible with its common-law duty as carrier, as, for instance, not to forward the goods until further orders, there is no such delivery and acceptance as will render the carrier liable as such. Under these circumstances it is liable only as an ordinary bailee, so long as such special instructions are operative."

In 10 C. J. 225, it is said:

"Delivery cannot be complete if anything remains to be done by the shipper before the goods can be sent on their way."

In Stapleton v. Railroad Co., 133 Mich. 187, 94 N. W. 739, it is held that, if the goods are merely placed in the carrier's depot for the shipper's convenience, and are not ready for shipment until the shipper has done something further to them, the carrier is not liable as a common carrier but only as a warehouseman.

In Missouri P. Co. v. Riggs, 10 Kan. App. 578, 62 Pac. 712, it is held that, where goods are delivered to a carrier to be shipped, but are not to be shipped until other goods which are to be shipped with them are delivered, the liability of the carrier in the meantime is only that of a warehouseman. The court declares:

"Where goods are received by the carrier to be forwarded in the usual course of business, the liability of a common carrier attaches immediately; but where the goods are not to be shipped in the regular course of business, but are to be retained at the depot at the shipper's instance, the liability is that of a warehouseman only. The rule, broadly stated, is that if, after the delivery of the goods for shipment, anything remains to be done by the shipper, the liability of the carrier as an insurer does not attach, and it is responsible only as a warehouseman."

In Railroad Co. v. Powers, 73 Neb. 816, 103 N. W. 678, it is held that where the stock, while in the carrier's pens or yards, awaiting transportation, is subject to the right of the shipper to remove it when necessary for food and water, the carrier's liability will be no greater than that of an ordinary bailee, and that he will be liable only where he has failed to exercise ordinary care. The syllabus by the court states:

"When a shipper surrenders the entire custody of his goods to a common carrier for immediate transportation, and the carrier so accepts them, the liability of the carrier at once attaches."

"Such liability does not attach until the goods are unconditionally delivered by the shipper and accepted by the carrier."

In Grand Co. v. Ullman, 89 Ill. 244, it is held in substance, that, where goods are delivered to a railroad company for transportation at its earliest convenience, nothing further remaining to be done in reference to them by the owner, the company is liable as a common carrier for their loss.

The doctrine of constructive delivery without notice to the carrier is well recognized; it may exist by an express agreement that a deposit of goods at a particular place shall be a valid delivery, or by a well-known and established custom to receive the goods in that way. Such an agreement, either expressed or implied, must necessarily go to the extent that such deposit shall be accepted as a delivery for transportation; it surely cannot exist in the face of an express notice of which the owner has knowledge, that it shall not be so accepted without the issuance of a bill of lading.

In O'Bannon v. Exp. Co., 51 Ala. 481, it is held that, to render a carrier liable as a common carrier for the loss of goods, there must have been an actual delivery of the goods to him, or a constructive delivery, with notice to him of an intention thereby to place them in his care and custody. Merely placing them in such a position that he could easily have taken them, but without calling his attention to them, is not sufficient.

In Southwestern R. Co. v. Webb, 48 Ala. 585, it is held that, in an action against a railroad company for failure to deliver cotton received by it for transportation, the railroad company is not liable as a common carrier for cotton stolen or lost after deposit by the owner upon a station platform, unless it be shown that the company or its agents had notice of the deposit and received the cotton for transportation as a common carrier.

The case of Copeland v. Railroad Co., 76 S. C. 476, 57 S. E. 535, is, in my opinion one of an entirely different character, and has little, if any, application to the facts of the case at bar. While the question does not seem to have been raised in the case, as a matter of fact it was a case of liability, independently of the relation of common carrier, under what is known as the Fire Statute (section 3226 of Civ. Code 1912); an absolute liability upon destruction of property by fire which originates upon the right of way of a railroad company; the only exception being where the property has been placed upon the right of way unlawfully or without the consent of the railroad company. It was not contended by the company that the cotton had been placed on the platform without its consent; on the contrary, the custom had long existed with their consent. The judgment is easily sustainable, therefore, under the statute.

But, considered as an action not under the statute, but against the railroad company as a common carrier, as it in fact appears to have been considered by the court, the facts are clearly distinguishable from those of the case at bar in the following particulars: (1) The cotton was deposited on the platform "marked ready for shipment"; in the case at bar that fact does not appear; in fact it was not marked for shipment at all, and was not ready for shipment until other cotton making a carload had been purchased. (2) The agent there gave the owner no notice that cotton left on the platform under such circumstances was at the owner's risk; here the agent, with the instinct of a burnt child, posted a notice, which the plaintiff admits he saw and which was particularly called to his attention before the loss, that "the railroad would not be liable for goods or freight of any kind left on its platform until after the shipper had received a bill of lading."

(3) There was evidence that after the fire the salvage of the cotton was sold by the railroad company, from which it might have been inferred that they acknowledged responsibility for the cotton; no such circumstance appears here.

The charge of the circuit judge, approved by this court, exactly fits the facts of this case:

"If it was not the custom of the defendant company in dealing with Mr. Copeland to allow him to put cotton on their platform for the purpose of shipping it and make themselves liable for it, unless he called for a bill of lading and notified them that it was there for shipment, then, under those circumstances, he would not be entitled to recover."

And again:

"Whenever a railroad company permits any one to put cotton on their platform for the purpose of shipping without objection on their part, and does anything to lead the parties putting the cotton there to believe that they had accepted it for the purpose of shipping it, and it is afterwards destroyed while in their possession, under those circumstances then the company would be liable."

How it is possible to conclude that the railroad company induced the owner to believe that they had accepted the cotton placed upon the platform, even without objection, for shipment, in the face of the notice referred to? A man must be endowed with a feeble brain indeed to believe that the railroad company accepted the cotton for shipment when he placed it upon the platform without their knowledge when he was told specifically that they did not intend to accept it until a bill of lading had been issued. In my opinion the testimony does not tend to establish a single one of the elements essential to the relation of common carrier.

It is not pretended that there was a complete delivery of the 16 bales of cotton at the time the lost bale was placed upon the platform. If the shipment included only that particular bale it is not claimed that it was actually delivered to the railroad company; the contention is that it was constructively delivered by placing it on the platform without notice to the company, and in the face of an express declaration and notice to the plaintiff that it would not be considered as delivered or accepted until the bill of lading had been issued. It was placed there by the plaintiff for his convenience until the remainder of the carload could be assembled. In the light of the notice he received, it must be assumed that in doing so he undertook to shoulder the risk of loss.

The so-called delivery was not for immediate shipment, as the plaintiff admits that the shipment was not to go forward until the carload had been made up; the cotton was not marked with any shipping directions, and none given to the carrier. The cotton had not gone into the exclusive possession of the carrier, which is absolutely essential to the relation. The plaintiff had full control of it and could the next minute have moved it off of the platform. That there was something further to be done by the owner to the shipment is admitted by his statement that the Murray bale was to remain on the platform until the remainder of the carload was completed.

No notice of the placing of the cotton on the platform was given to the agent, which is necessary to constitute a constructive delivery, unless the custom of the company justified his failure to do so, of which there is no evidence. On the contrary, if he had given such notice it could not have constituted constructive delivery, which is a question of intention, in view of the positive notice repelling any such implication.

BELSER, A. A. J. (concurring). This is an action to recover for a bale of cotton lost from the defendant's platform at Monck's Corner, S. C. The facts appear in the agreed statement, and are undisputed, the bale was deposited on the platform during the day, and a bill of lading for this bale and 15 other bales, which had also been deposited on the platform by or for the plaintiff, was applied for late in the afternoon. The bale in question was then missing, and has never been discovered. No notice was given to defendant's agent when the bale was left on the platform, and there was no evidence to show how long the bale remained on the platform before its removal, or that it was ever brought to the knowledge of defendant's agent that it was there prior to the application for the bill of lading and discovery of the loss. Plaintiff, who was a cotton buyer, was in the habit of buying cotton during the day, having the cotton bought placed on the platform, and getting a bill of lading en bloc at the close of the business day. The defendant, having had previous trouble with the plaintiff about the similar loss of a bale of cotton, had posted a notice to the effect that it would not be responsible for property left on the platform unless a bill of lading had been issued for same; and this notice had been brought to the personal attention of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff based his right to recover on the ground that the deposit of the bale on the platform amounted to delivery to the carrier for shipment, rendering the carrier liable as insurer; there was no claim that the cotton had been deposited with the carrier as warehouseman, or any proof of its negligence in that capacity. The issue therefore narrows to the consideration of the question whether or not there was evidence establishing, or tending to establish, a delivery of the cotton to the carrier for shipment.

The essential elements of delivery to the carrier for shipment were lacking. These elements include (1) complete surrender of the goods into the custody of the carrier, with instructions to the carrier for their shipment, and (2) the acceptance, actual or implied, of the goods by the carrier for shipment. 5 Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 181; 4 R. C. L. 167; 1 Hutch. Carr. §§ 105, 113, 119. Mere deposit upon an open railroad platform cannot per se be regarded as a delivery into the exclusive possession of the railroad. No notice was given the defendant's agent that the bale was delivered ready for shipment, and in fact it was not ready for shipment when deposited; for it is conceded that the bale of cotton was placed on the platform by the plaintiff to await the collection of the day's purchases before shipment. These facts warrant no other inference than that the cotton was placed on the platform by the shipper for his convenience and remained in his control at least for the purpose of completing the lot to be shipped. Since no notice had been given the agent that the bale had been placed there for shipment, there was nothing to invoke the custody of the carrier or prevent the shipper from removing the bale of cotton at will. Moreover, in the absence of shipping instructions, it is impossible to see how there could have been an acceptance of the bale for shipment; neither the shipper, the assignee, the route, or destination was known to the carrier. Even the subject of the shipment—the existence of the bale of cotton on the platform—was unknown. How, then, could there be any meeting of minds or contract of carriage, actual or implied, which is necessary to initiate the relation of shipper and carrier?

The facts in this case do not show a constructive delivery to the carrier by deposit of the bale on the platform pursuant to an agreement or custom between the shipper and carrier to deliver in that manner, as in the case of Copeland v. Railway Co., 76 S. C. 476, 57 S. E. 535. In the Copeland case the cotton was placed on the platform marked ready for shipment; it remained there for sufficient time (not having been destroyed until some hour of the night following the day of delivery) to warrant the inference that the carrier knew it was there; and the custom by the carrier to accept shipment in this manner without objection was shown. This court held that the evidence to sustain the judgment against the carrier was "weak," but under the scintilla doctrine was properly submitted to the jury, whose verdict concluded the issue. In the case at bar the material facts are different, and clearly distinguish the cases. For aught that the evidence here discloses, the bale in question may have been removed immediately after having been placed on the platform. The posted notice—actual knowledge of which had been brought to the attention of the plaintiff—that the railroad company would not be responsible for goods left on the platform unless a bill of lading was obtained prevents the inference of a custom or tacit agreement to accept such deposit as delivery for shipment.

That the plaintiff, notwithstanding this notice, was in the habit of placing cotton on the platform as bought, and getting a bill of lading at the end of the business day, does not show a disregard or waiver of the notice by the railroad in dealing with the plaintiff. On the contrary, this course of dealing was perfectly consistent with the notice given, and the railroad company had the right to assume that cotton placed by the plaintiff on the platform remained at his risk until a bill of lading was applied for. If such notice is to be held ineffective, and in the face of it a mere deposit on the platform to render the carrier liable, then the railroad, if it desires to escape unknown and unknowable responsibility, would be without recourse save to fence off its platform from the public or place a guard about it.

I therefore concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice FRASER.

GARY, C. J. (dissenting). This is an action to recover the value of a bale of cotton, which was tried before a magistrate, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the judgment of the magistrate, and the defendant again appealed to this court. The facts are thus stated in the record:

"At the trial in the magistrate's court it was shown that the plaintiff was in the habit of buying cotton from the farmers, changing the marks, and shipping en bloc. On the day in question, this particular bale of cotton was placed on defendant's platform at Monck's Corner by B. F. Murray, who notified plaintiff. Plaintiff paid Murray for the cotton and changed the mark, but did not notify defendant's agent that the cotton was on the platform. During the day, plaintiff bought other cotton—a total of 16 bales that day. Late in the afternoon, plaintiff applied to defendant's agent for a bill of lading for the 16 bales. The agent agreed to give him a bill of lading for 15 bales, all that he could find on the platform, but said he knew nothing about the sixteenth bale, and declined to give a bill of lading for it. No trace of the missing bale has ever been found.

"It was shown on behalf of defendant that there had been a prior suit between the same parties for a missing bale of cotton, for which defendant had been required to pay. Defendant posted a notice at its depot, which plaintiff admits having seen, and to which he admits his attention was particularly directed at the former trial, to the effect that the railroad would not be liable for goods or freight of any kind left on its platform, until after the shipper had received a bill of lading. Although this notice had been displayed for a long time, it was shown that plaintiff and one or two other shippers had been in the habit of placing cotton on the platform as it was purchased, and of getting a bill of lading for the full day's purchases just before closing time. (Italics added.)

"Defendant contended at the trial, and in the circuit court, that it could not be held responsible for cotton or other property placed on its platform, unless it had issued a bill of lading, or at least had been notified and had accepted the property for shipment. Plaintiff claimed that, since the custom had been for merchants to leave cotton on the platform until the close of the business day, and then get a bill of lading for the entire amount, defendant was estopped from disclaiming responsibility for cotton placed on its platform, even though a bill of lading had not been issued, and the agent had not been notified.

"The case comes before this court on the same questions that were raised in the magistrate's court, and in the circuit court."

The following are the exceptions:

"First. His honor erred in holding that defendant was responsible for cotton placed on its platform, without a bill of lading having been issued, or defendant's agent being notified; whereas he should have held that defendant's responsibility could not begin until after the cotton had been actually delivered for shipment.

"Second. His honor erred in not holding that, when plaintiff, with full notice that defendant declined to assume responsibility for property for which a bill of lading had not been issued, placed his cotton on the platform, without obtaining a bill of lading or notifying defendant's agent, any loss sustained was the result of his own negligence, and defendant could not be held liable therefor.

"Third. His honor erred in not holding that, inasmuch as only 15 bales could be accounted for at the time when plaintiff applied for a bill of lading, the legal presumption was that the other bale had been removed by some other than the defendant, and that defendant was not responsible for its disappearance."

The law is well settled that findings of fact by the circuit court, on appeal from a magistrate's decision, are not reviewable by this court. Gossett v. Gladden, 112 S. C. 144, 99 S. E. 752; Dingle v. Railway, 112 S. C. 390, 99 S. E. 828. Therefore, if there was any testimony sustaining the judgment rendered by the circuit court, it cannot be reversed by this court on the ground that it was not sustained by the testimony.

If the first sentence which we have italicized stood alone, it might be successfully contended that there was not such a delivery of the bale of cotton, as rendered the defendant liable for its loss. But the first must be considered, in connection with the second italicized sentence.

In the case of Copeland v. Railway, 76 S. C. 476, 57 S. E. 535, this court, in discussing the question whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing the motion for nonsuit, said:

"It is contended especially that there was no evidence to show that the cotton was ever delivered to defendant in any way to create the relation of shipper and carrier or entail liability for its safekeeping. * * * The plaintiff testified that the cotton was delivered to defendant on its platform, marked ready for shipment, before 5 o'clock on October 13, 1903; that no notice or shipping directions were given defendant's agent that day, and no receipt or bill of lading was taken; that the 8 bales was a part of a lot of 25 bales he had agreed to ship the Orangeburg Manufacturing Company, and he was waiting to procure the remainder of the lot before actual shipment, and that in such cases he generally got a receipt from the agent when he had completed the number sold; that he did not act differently with this lot of cotton from what he did when he delivered other cotton; * * * that the agent never gave him personal notice that cotton left on the platform under such circumstances was at the owner's risk. * * * While the testimony tending to show liability of the defendant may be weak, we cannot say the case was improperly submitted to the jury. Whether the defendant had any notice that the cotton was delivered for shipment was left to be inferred by the jury from all the circumstances of the case, the publicity of the delivery on the platform, the opportunity for observation, and the course of dealing with the plaintiff in like cases." (Italics added.)

His honor the circuit judge in that case charged the jury as follows:

"It does not make any difference if they did have a custom with other people that it was to be put there before a certain hour and bills of lading given for it, yet, if in their dealing with Mr. Copeland, it was their custom and usage to allow him to put cotton on their platform for the purpose of shipping it, and they afterwards shipped it and gave him a bill whenever he called on them for it, if it was burned while in their custody and care, the railroad would be liable. * * * I charge you further, as a matter of law, for the purpose of having this case settled in the event they want to carry it to the Supreme Court, that whenever the railroad company permits any one to put cotton on their platform for the purpose of shipping without objection on their part, and does anything to lead the parties putting the cotton there to believe that they had accepted it for the purpose of shipping it, and it is afterwards destroyed while in their possession, under those circumstances then the company would be liable."

The foregoing charge was held by this court to be free from error.

Under the custom and usage that existed between the plaintiff and defendant, the defendant's agent knew that the plaintiff intended to place cotton on its platform during the day, for the purpose of shipment, and that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to get a bill of lading when each bale purchased during the day was placed on the platform, but that he would get the bill of lading for the full day's purchases just before closing time.

There is not a particle of testimony tending to show that after the cotton was placed on the platform the plaintiff was in any manner responsible for its loss. He complied in every respect with the custom and usage that prevailed between him and the defendant, and it would be against justice and equity to allow the defendant to take advantage of its own wrong in failing to exercise due care in the protection of the cotton after it had been delivered to the railroad company in the manner contemplated by the custom and usage that existed between these parties.

We concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice FRASER that the Copeland Case is conclusive of this case, but we cannot agree with him that there are differences in the two cases that render necessary a reversal of the judgment rendered by the circuit court.

For these reasons, I dissent.

SHANNON v. FREEMAN et al. (No. 10737.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Specific performance §101—Failure to make formal tender held not to defeat remedy.

Where a trustee, though without authority to delegate her duties, recognized a sale made by an agent selected by her son-in-law and signed a contract prepared and presented by the son-in-law, and the purchaser, who was ready, willing, and anxious to perform, notified the son-in-law of his readiness to close the contract, and relied on his promise to furnish a deed, and later his statement that he would forward the deed to the trustee for her signature, she having left the state, the purchaser's failure to tender the purchase price to the trustee held not to defeat specific performance.

2. Vendor and purchaser §73—Purchaser not required to go to another state to make tender.

Where a contract for the sale of land in South Carolina was made in that state and between citizens of such state, it evidently contemplated consummation by payment of the purchase price and delivery of the deed in South Carolina, and the purchaser could not reasonably be required to go to Louisiana, where the vendor had gone temporarily, to tender the purchase price.

3. Contracts §300(3)—One preventing performance or tender cannot take advantage of delay.

One who has himself prevented performance or tender of performance of a contract at the time set cannot take advantage of the delay.

4. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 101—Failure to make tender excused, though fact that it would have been unavailing became apparent after time for tender.

Where a tender of the purchase price under a contract for the sale of land would have been refused by the vendor, the purchaser was not barred of his right to specific performance by reason of his failure to make tender, though it did not become apparent that a tender would have been unavailing until after the tender should have been made.

5. Vendor and purchaser \Leftrightarrow 186—Vendors, not ready and willing to perform, cannot take advantage of purchaser's laches in making tender.

Vendors who were not themselves ready, desirous, prompt, and eager to perform the contract, were in no position to take advantage of any delay or laches attributable to the purchaser in making a tender.

6. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 121(8)—Evidence held to show selling price full and fair.

In a suit for specific performance, defended on the ground, among others, that the price was inadequate, evidence held to show that it was a full and fair price for the land.

7. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 49(2)—Enhancement of price after sale will not justify refusal of relief.

In a suit for specific performance, the question of adequacy of price must be considered as of the date of the contract, and any subsequent enhancement of value does not justify refusal of specific performance.

8. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 12—Not denied because trustee did not require cash payment required under trust, where purchaser willing to pay cash.

Though a conveyance in trust to sell the land at public or private sale provided that at least one-third of the price must be paid in cash, where a contract of sale by the trustee, not requiring payment of one-third in cash, also allowed the purchaser to pay all cash, and in his suit for specific performance he offers to do so, specific performance will not be denied.

9. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 12—Will not be granted when breach of trust will be caused.

A court of equity should not grant a decree of specific performance when such decree will produce or result in a breach of trust.

10. Trusts \Leftrightarrow 191(3)—Contract to sell held a "sale" within conveyance authorizing trustee to sell.

A valid written contract for the sale of land, made upon payment of a substantial part of the consideration, constituted a "sale" within a deed conveying the land to a trustee in trust to sell, as against the objection that it was only a contract to sell and not a sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sale.]

11. Trusts \Leftrightarrow 191(3)—Power to sell held to include power to enter into contract to sell.

Under a deed conveying land to a trustee in trust to sell the land, even though a sale was not made until the deed was delivered and the purchase money paid, the power to sell necessarily included the power to take such steps as were reasonably necessary to effect a sale, including power to enter into a contract to sell.

12. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 65—Purchaser, contracting to sell to another, held entitled to specific performance.

Where a purchaser of land had contracted to sell it to a third person, to whom he would be liable in case of his inability to perform, he was entitled to specific performance of the vendors' contract, where the decree asked for would not work hardship upon the vendors.

13. Specific performance \Leftrightarrow 130—Interest on price denied where defaulting vendors remained in possession, though property did not produce income.

In a purchaser's suit for specific performance, the decree will not require payment of interest on the purchase price where the delay in performance was due to the default of the vendors, one of whom has remained in possession, refusing to deliver possession to the purchaser, though the land is vacant and probably has not produced any income.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. W. DeVore, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Shannon against Alice E. Freeman, individually and as trustee, and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The master's report was as follows:

The master, to whom this case was referred to take the testimony and to hear and determine all issues of fact and law and report the same to the court, respectfully reports that he has had several references herein, and has taken the testimony which is reported herewith.

This is an action by the purchaser against the seller for specific performance of a contract of sale of real estate. The complaint alleges that on December 2, 1919, the plaintiff and the defendant Alice E. Freeman, as trustee, entered into a contract whereby plaintiff agreed to buy for the price of \$10,000, and said defendant, as trustee, agreed to sell, a certain lot of land in Greenville, S. C.; that said defendant held said land as trustee for herself and her four children, the other defendants herein; that in a deed conveying to her the said lot of land the said trustee was authorized to sell at private sale provided $\frac{1}{2}$ of the price was paid in cash; that the plaintiff has at all times been, and is now, ready and willing to comply, and either to pay the full amount of the purchase price in cash, or to pay $\frac{1}{2}$ cash and secure the balance by purchase-money mortgage, but that the defendant Alice E. Freeman at the time fixed for the performance refused and still refuses to convey.

The defendant Lidia M. Schwartz filed a separate answer. The other defendants filed a joint answer. The defenses set up by one or the other of these answers and argued before me may be stated as follows: (1) A general denial; (2) that the price was grossly inadequate; (3) that the contract is void, in that it provides for a cash payment of less than $\frac{1}{2}$ of the price, while the trustee had power to sell only upon payment of at least $\frac{1}{2}$ of the price; and (4) that the contract is void, in that the trustees had power only to sell outright, and not to contract to sell.

The master finds the following to be the facts in this case:

The allegations of the complaint are substantially true, being sustained by undisputed testimony. The defendants formerly owned certain real estate in the city of Greenville. This was sold in 1913, and in part payment they took the property in question. By a contract entered into at that time between all the defendants it was agreed that for their mutual convenience in selling and conveying the property in question title should be taken in the name of Alice E. Freeman, as trustee, who should sell it and divide the proceeds among all the defendants. Accordingly, the deed was made, conveying this property to her "in trust to sell said land at public or private sale to such person or persons as she may deem advisable for cash or upon such other terms as may seem proper, provided at least $\frac{1}{2}$ cash is paid thereon."

On December 2, 1919, Alice E. Freeman, as trustee, entered into a contract with the plaintiff, which provided that, "Said Freeman as trustee has bargained and sold and will convey or have such conveyance as may be necessary to give good title to said Shannon to all that lot of land," described by metes and bounds. "The purchase price for said lot is $10,000, of which $500 is paid at the signing and sealing of these presents, and the remainder to be paid as follows: $2,000 January 15, 1920, and the balance in one, two and three years at 7 per cent. or with privilege to pay all the amount at any time." It further provided that time is of the essence, and that should Shannon fail to make payment at the time stated, the money paid up to such failure should be retained by Mrs. Freeman as liquidated damages, and that upon payment of the $2,000 referred to deed should be executed and delivered to Shannon. At the time of the signing of this contract Shannon paid to Mrs. Freeman the sum of $500.

On November 14, 1919, prior to the execution of the above contract Schwartz (the husband of the defendant, Lidia M. Schwartz, and son-in-law of Alice E. Freeman), purporting to act as agent, had listed this property with W. R. Tabor, a real estate agent or broker, authorizing him to sell it for $10,000 net; that is, he was to collect his commission from the purchaser in addition to this sum. Tabor, having found a purchaser in the person of the plaintiff, prepared in duplicate the above-described contract in accordance with terms designated by Schwartz. Both copies were executed by Shannon and delivered to Schwartz, who presented them to Mrs. Freeman for her signature. Mrs. Freeman signed both, and Schwartz returned one copy to Shannon. On the day this contract was signed, Mrs. Freeman left Greenville for a visit to her daughter in Baton Rouge, La. She did not return until January 28, 1920, eight days after the date fixed by contract for the payment of the money and delivery of the deed.

Neither Shannon nor Tabor had any conversation with Mrs. Freeman with reference to this contract either before or after execution; all their dealings being had through Schwartz.

After making the contract with Mrs. Freeman, Shannon determined to sell the property, and accordingly placed it in Tabor's hands. About the latter part of December or early part of January, Tabor made the sale to Mr. Pete Hodges, who was acting for his wife, Eva S. Hodges, for the price of $12,500.

Some time prior to January 15, the date fixed for delivery of the deed and payment of the money, Shannon notified Schwartz that he was ready to close the matter, at the same time telling him about the resale to Mrs. Hodges, and suggesting that deed should be made either to Mrs. Hodges or to him. Schwartz stated that it would be satisfactory to make the deed direct to Mrs. Hodges, and that he would attend to it. Accordingly Schwartz had his attorney, Jas. H. Price, prepare a deed conveying the land to Mrs. Hodges. This deed Schwartz undertook to execute under a written power of attorney from Mrs. Freeman. Oscar Hodges, Esq., who at the time was examining the title and representing Mrs. Hodges in the transaction, refused to accept a deed signed by Schwartz. At the same time he advised that, in view of the provisions in the deed to Mrs. Freeman, at least $\frac{1}{2}$ of the price should be paid in cash. Accordingly a check for $\frac{1}{2}$ was left with Mr. Hodges, who thereupon prepared a new deed, as well as a note and mortgage to be signed by Mrs. Hodges. This deed Schwartz forwarded to Mrs. Freeman in Baton Rouge, La. On January 13th, Shannon wrote Mrs. Freeman at her Greenville address, giving formal notice that he was ready to close the matter. On January 23, Mrs. Freeman returned to Greenville, bringing with her the deed which had been prepared, but which she had not signed. It was not until after her return that the parties in Greenville had any intimation that she would not convey. It seems that upon her return she learned that Shannon was making a profit in the sale to Mrs. Hodges. Thereupon Shannon was informed by Schwartz that Mrs. Freeman was not satisfied with the price. Shannon offered to pay the full amount in cash, but was informed that Mrs. Freeman would not convey for \$10,000. Subsequently Mr. McSwain, as attorney for Mrs. Freeman, tendered back to Shannon the \$500 which he had paid and which Mrs. Freeman had retained.

[1] The case was exhaustively argued by counsel for both sides and the master has given careful consideration to the questions of law and fact suggested by the argument. In addition to the points indicated by the answers, counsel for defendants relied largely upon the fact that the plaintiff had made no tender of the purchase price. The master is of the opinion that the defendants are not in a position to take advantage of this and to defeat plaintiff's right to specific performance upon this ground.

[2] The master is satisfied from the testimony, and finds as a matter of fact, that the plaintiff was at all times ready, willing and anxious to perform, and that he exercised due diligence in the matter. He had dealt with Mrs. Freeman only through Schwartz. In ample time he notified Schwartz of his readiness to close. Schwartz agreed to furnish the deed promptly. When Shannon relied upon this, he did no more than any reasonably prudent business man would have done. It is perhaps true that Mrs. Freeman, being a trustee, could not delegate her duties to Schwartz, nor give him a valid power of attorney to represent her, but it is equally true that all the parties to this transaction did, in fact, think that Schwartz did have authority to represent Mrs. Freeman in this matter. Mrs. Freeman had dealt through Schwartz; she had recognized the sale made by the agent selected and authorized by Schwartz; she had signed the contract prepared in accordance with Schwartz's dictation and presented to her by Schwartz, and by Schwartz she had returned the signed contract to Shannon. She had executed a power of attorney, purporting to authorize Schwartz to act for her, which the parties themselves evidently thought to be valid as is shown by the fact that Schwartz had his attorney prepare a deed, which he signed pursuant to this power of attorney and delivered to Mr. Oscar Hodges for approval. When Shannon learned that Schwartz did not in fact have power to execute the deed, and that Mrs. Freeman was without the state, he did all that could reasonably have been required of him. He relied upon Schwartz's statement that he would forward the deed to Mrs. Freeman for her signature. At the same time he mailed a letter to Mrs. Freeman at her home address, notifying her that he was ready to comply. A legal tender within the time limited was prevented by the act of Mrs. Freeman in going to Louisiana, immediately upon signing the contract and remaining there until after the time for performance. The contract was made in this state, between citizens of this state, and related to land in this state. It evidently contemplated consummation by payment of the purchase price and delivery of the deed in this state. Shannon could not reasonably be required to go to Louisiana to make a tender. Counsel for the defendants suggested that Shannon should have mailed to Mrs. Freeman in Louisiana the consideration or cash portion thereof with executed note and mortgage for the balance. But the master has hesitation in finding that no reasonably prudent business man would have forwarded this to Mrs. Freeman before she had executed the deed.

[3] One who has himself prevented performance or tender of performance at the time set cannot take advantage of the delay. 35 Cyc. 716; 26 A. & E. Enc. (2d Ed.) 72, 73; Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 68, at 78, et seq., 10 Sup. Ct. 498, 33 L. Ed. 818.

[4] Moreover, Mrs. Freeman herself states, and I find as a matter of fact, that if tender had been made within the time specified, she would not have accepted it, and that at no time after she learned of the resale to Mrs. Hodges would she have conveyed for the price of $10,000.

Where a vendor repudiates the contract, or where it is evident from all the circumstances that tender would have been unavailing, a court of equity will not hold a vendee barred of his right to specific performance by reason of his failure to make tender. 38 Cyc. 135, 136; 26 A. & E. Enc. (2d Ed.) 117, 118; 28 A. & E. Enc. (2d Ed.) 6; 25 R. C. L. 321; 26 R. C. L. 624; Pomeroy, Eq. Jurisp., § 1408; Wright v. Young, 6 Wis. 127, 70 Am. Dec. 453.

Counsel for defendants suggest that this rule does not apply unless it was apparent at the time that tender would have been unavailing, and that in this case this was not apparent until later. The master does not so understand the rule. The basis for the rule is that equity will not require the doing of a useless thing, nor foreclose the rights of the party for failure to do something which in view of all the facts the court finds would have been useless.

[5] Moreover, as the Supreme Court of this state said, in Fanning v. Bogacki, 111 S. C. 376, at 381, 98 S. E. 137, 138: "The party who desires to maintain an objection founded upon the other's laches must show himself to have been 'ready, desirous, prompt, and eager.'" The master finds as a matter of fact that at no time have defendants shown themselves to have been ready, desirous, prompt, and eager. They are not in a position to take advantage of any delay or laches if there were any attributable to the plaintiff.

[6,7] The objection based upon alleged inadequacy of price is not sustained by the testimony. The testimony of reliable real estate men who are familiar with the values of, and have handled large numbers of sales of property in this vicinity, shows beyond question that $10,000 is not an inadequate price for this property; in fact, it appears that relatively this is a much better price than was realized by any of the owners of adjacent property who sold about the same time. It is true that Shannon, some three or four weeks after his purchase, resold the property at a profit. But the profit made by Shannon may well be accounted for by the unprecedented boom in real estate, resulting in great activity and great increase in prices of Greenville real estate during December, January, and February past. The question of adequacy of price must be considered as of the date of the contract, and the subsequent enhancement in value would not justify refusal of specific performance. 26 A. & E. Enc. (2d Ed.) 27; 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 2286.

It may be added that this boom came to an end long before the reference in this case. If the present market value were an issue, I would have to hold that the present market value is no greater than the market value on December 2, 1919.

Mrs. Freeman and her daughter, Mrs. Kirchner, both testified that they considered the price inadequate. But their statements are not entitled to much weight in view of all the evidence. At the first reference, Mrs. Freeman very clearly sought to give the impression that she had not listed this property for sale within recent years, and had not been anxious to sell it, though at a later reference she admitted on cross-examination that she had listed it, but could not remember the price. Mrs. Kirchner testified that both she and her husband were opposed to a sale at $10,000 and that her husband had never made any effort to sell it. Yet it developed that in 1919 Mrs. Kirchner's husband took the matter up with Dr. Long of the firm of Long & Ables, real estate agents, carried him to the Kirchner home, where Mrs. Freeman was then living, and Mrs. Freeman there gave Dr. Long a written listing or option at the price of $8,000, less commissions, and while the matter remained in Dr. Long's hands both Mrs. Freeman and Kirchner were active in efforts to procure a sale at this price.

Though the sale to Shannon was made on December 2d, and Mrs. Freeman had the contract before her and discussed it with her children, neither Shannon nor Tabor, nor even her son-in-law, Schwartz, had any intimation that the price was not entirely satisfactory until approximately two months later, after Mrs. Freeman returned to Greenville and learned that Shannon had sold it at a profit. The objection of defendants on this ground does not commend itself to the master.

The master finds as a matter of fact that the sum of $10,000 was, on the date of the sale, December 2, 1919, and is now, a full and fair price for the land, and that the defendants will not suffer hardship by reason of a decree for specific performance.

[8] Defendants further contend that specific performance of the contract should not be decreed because Mrs. Freeman has power to convey only upon payment in cash of at least $\frac{1}{3}$ of the purchase price, while the contract calls for a smaller cash payment. This would be a sound objection if plaintiff had asked for a decree requiring Mrs. Freeman to convey upon payment of only \$2,500 in cash, but the contract also allowed payment of all cash, and plaintiff has come into court offering to pay the entire purchase price in cash, and asking for a decree requiring Mrs. Freeman to convey only upon such payment.

[9] It is unquestionably true that a court of equity should not grant a decree of specific performance when such decree will produce or result in a breach of trust for the same reason that it will not grant a decree which will impose undue hardship upon any person. But no such decree is asked for in this case. The decree here sought will be in strict conformity, both with the terms of the contract and with the terms of the deed under which Mrs. Freeman holds.

[10] As a further objection to specific performance, it is urged that this is not a sale, but a contract to sell, and that, while Mrs. Freeman had power to sell, she did not have power to contract to sell. This involves a too narrow construction of the language of the deed. The master is of the opinion that the transaction of December 2, 1919, was a sale within the meaning of the language used in the deed. Shannon paid a substantial part of the consideration, $500, and a valid written contract was entered into. In sales of real estate, it may be said that the sale within the usual and ordinary meaning of the contract is made when a valid contract is entered into in the case of private sales, or when the land is knocked down to the highest bidder in the case of public sales, though almost invariably it is necessary that some time elapse for examination of title and preparation of papers between the making of the sale and the delivery of the deed and payment of the purchase price.

[11] Even if it could be said that a sale is not made until the deed is delivered and the purchase money paid, still the power to sell must necessarily include the power to take such steps as are reasonably necessary to effectuate a sale, including the power to enter into an agreement and to execute and deliver a deed. 31 Cyc. 1077; Demaret v. Ray, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 563.

[12] In general it may be said that the objections of defendants are more of form than of substance. Mrs. Freeman held title in her name as trustee, merely for the mutual convenience of all the defendants in selling and conveying this property. She made a fair sale at a full price. The purchaser has acted fairly and with due diligence. Relying on his contract with Mrs. Freeman, he has entered into a contract with Mrs. Hodges. Should he be unable to convey to Mrs. Hodges, he would be liable for such damages as she might prove; certainly he would be liable to be subjected to suit for failure to perform his contract. He is entitled to specific performance of the contract in question, and the decree asked for will not work hardship upon any of the parties.

As was well said by Sir John Romilly, M. R., in Parkin v. Thorold, 16 Beavan, 59: "Courts of equity make a distinction in all cases between that which is a matter of substance and that which is matter of form; and, if it find that by insisting on the form the substance will be defeated, it holds it to be inequitable to allow a person to insist on such form and thereby defeat the substance."

[13] Should the plaintiff be required to account to the defendants for interest? This question was not argued before the master, but the master is of the opinion that the purchaser is not liable for interest. The master finds that the delay in the performance has been due to the default of the defendants; that the defendant Mrs. Freeman, as trustee for herself and the other defendants, has remained in possession of the land, refusing to deliver possession to plaintiff, and retaining for herself and the other defendants such benefits or profits as go with the possession of this land. As the land is vacant, it may be, and very probably is, the case that there has been no income therefrom. But of this defendants cannot complain. Such benefit, if any, as grows out of possession of this land they have retained over the protest of plaintiff. Where the delay in performance is imputable to the vendor, he is not entitled to interest. Hart v. Brand, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 159, 10 Am. Dec. 715; Stevenson v. Maxwell, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 273; Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 498, 33 L. Ed. 818; 22 Cyc. 1554, 1557; 16 A. & E., Enc. (2d Ed.) 1064; 15 R. C. L. 83.

The master therefore recommends that a decree do issue, ordering that the defendant Alice E. Freeman do execute a good and sufficient deed, conveying to D. H. Shannon the land described in the complaint; that said deed be delivered to plaintiff upon payment by plaintiff to the master of the sum of $9,500 (being the purchase price, less the sum of $500 already paid), and that out of said sum so paid the master do pay the costs of this action, and do pay over the balance to Alice E. Freeman, as trustee, for distribution among the defendants in accordance with their rights.

Haynsworth & Haynsworth, of Greenville, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. This court is entirely satisfied with the very able report of the master, confirmed by the circuit judge, and the decree is accordingly affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 17, 1921.)

Physicians and surgeons \S 11(2)—Dentist may advertise painless extraction of teeth.

An advertisement reading, "Take out teeth absolutely painless," is not a violation of Acts 1915, p. 218, providing for revocation of license of dentist who advertises "to practice dentistry without pain," since teeth may be extracted without pain, and this is not negated by fact that pain may follow the operation.

Fraser, J., and Gary, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; W. H. Townsend, Judge.

Certiorari by J. M. Harris against B. F. Sims and others, members of the State Board of Dental Examiners, to review proceedings had before them. From a decree dismissing his petition, the former appeals. Reversed.

Benet, Shand & McGowan and Moffatt & Marion, all of Columbia, for appellant.

Samuel M. Wolfe, Atty. Gen., for respondents.

COTHRAN, J. Of the many grounds upon which the state board revoked the petitioner's license to practice dentistry, the only one sustained by the circuit judge was the fact that the petition advertised his ability to extract teeth without pain. This the circuit judge held was a violation of the statute (Acts 1915, p. 218), which in effect prohibits an advertisement "To practice dentistry without pain." The correctness of his conclusion upon this point is practically the only issue in this appeal.

The practice of dentistry includes numerous separate and distinct branches and operations. Some of the branches are conducted without pain, and some of the operations, in a branch that is fraught with pain, may be performed without pain. To lay claim "to practice dentistry without pain" is universally inclusive in its character, embracing all branches and all operations, and comes within the inhibition of the statute. To profess to conduct a certain branch of dentistry, or a certain operation in a branch without pain, is not only not within the inhibition of the statute, but is susceptible of absolute demonstration as a fact. It may not be a matter of which the court may take judicial cognizance, but it is a fact, which a judicial utterance cannot make otherwise, that in the advance of the science the process of extracting teeth is daily accomplished without pain or consciousness of the fact. The fact that pain may follow the operation does not at all negate the fact that the extraction was painless.

The judgment in my opinion should be reversed.

WATTS, J., concurs.

PURDY, A. A. J. (concurring). The board of dental examiners revoked the license of the petitioner. On appeal to the circuit court, his honor Judge Townsend affirmed their act, and the petitioner appealed to this court. The question on appeal has narrowed down to the inquiry as to whether advertising to practice dentistry without pain is in violation of the statute, and is a sufficient cause to sustain a revocation of the license.

It will be noted that the prohibition is not against the use of narcotics or drugs which would prevent pain in extracting teeth, but the prohibition is against advertising that teeth may be painlessly extracted, so that, for the purpose of construing this act, it is not unlawful to use the means which would bring about such result. The title of the act is:

"An act to regulate the practice of dentistry in South Carolina and to provide for the revocation of the licenses of dentists in certain cases."

Throughout the body of the act, with the exception of the clause, "or advertising to practice dentistry without pain," practically every clause is preceded or followed by a statement showing that there must be fraud in the doing of the act prohibited. The clause quoted, and now particularly before the court, stands alone.

The argument of the case before the court, and the idea conveyed by the decree of his honor Judge Townsend, both tend to give the construction to the act that there must be some element of fraud in the act complained of, or that the act must be done with intent to deceive the public, and I think that this is the proper construction to give it. If this construction be taken away from the act, and if this construction be not intended in the clause cited and now being construed, then the case would assume a more serious aspect as touching the constitutionality of the act in this respect. It is an act to regulate the practice of dentistry. It cannot be denied that this is within the purview of the Legislature. The Legislature has the power to classify all persons engaged in a like calling or undertaking, and to declare that they shall be subject to certain rules and regulations operating upon that class. But, as has been well said by the counsel for the appellant in the argument before the court, while admitting the power to regulate, the Legislature has not the power, under the guise of regulating, "to impair the fundamentals of life, liberty, and property."

To prohibit advertising to practice dentistry without pain where it is an admitted fact that such can be done would be beyond the power of the Legislature, if we eliminate from it the element of fraud or deceit. I prefer, however, not to base my judgment upon this ground, but upon the ground that the act contemplated that the advertisement must contain a statement calculated to practice fraud or deceit upon the public or upon the patients of the dentist, and that the advertisement of the appellant in this case does not violate the spirit of the act, although, taking the clause in question by itself, and permitting the mere advertisement of the truth to be a ground upon which to revoke the license, such might be done; yet it is the spirit and intent of the act, and not the letter of it, that should govern, and I am therefore of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

Reversed.

FRASER, J. I dissent. This is an appeal from a decree of Judge Townsend in certiorari proceedings to review the records and proceedings of the Board of Dental Examiners for this state, in the matter of revocation of the license of Dr. J. E. Harris. Judge Townsend dismissed the petition.

The statute of this state (Acts 1915, p. 218) provides for the revocation of the license of a dentist who advertises "to practice dentistry without pain." The appellant does not deny that his advertisement read, "Take out teeth absolutely painless."

I. The first exception assigns error in holding that the advertisement was forbidden by the statute. It is claimed that taking out teeth is only one department of dentistry. The whole is forbidden and, of course, includes "taking out teeth," absolutely painlessly. Exception should be overruled.

II. The second assignment of error relates to a statement concerning one Dr. Smathers. His honor held that the Smathers incident was insufficient, and, even if error, it cannot affect this case. This exception should be overruled.

III. The third exception attacks the constitutionality of the act. It is not denied that the Legislature has the right to make rules for the conduct of those who practice law, medicine, dentistry, etc. The wisdom of the law is not for the courts. The Legislature has its committees whose duty it is to investigate these matters. The courts are not presumed to know the effect of those methods used to prevent the pain of taking out teeth. It may be that the pain of taking out teeth may last for a minute, but the pain-destroying process may last for life. This court cannot assume that the Legislature acted arbitrarily. Pain-destroying remedies frequently destroy life, as well as pain. There are some things in this statute that are broad—it may be too broad, and uncertain—but, unfortunately for the appellant, he violated that part that is neither broad nor uncertain. This exception should not be sustained.

IV. The last exception is that the main grounds for the revocation of this license were for causes held insufficient by his honor. One good reason for revoking a license is enough. It makes no difference how many insufficient reasons there are. One good reason revokes the license. This exception should be overruled.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

1. Sales \S 116—Refusal of valid tender does not justify rescission of contract.

Suit in a justice's court was brought on a promissory note for $78 principal, "payable as follows: Money or war savings stamps—$39, Nov. 15, 1918, without interest—$39, Nov. 15, 1919, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from date." On appeal in the superior court the defendant testified: That on the day the note was due, he tendered plaintiff in full payment 20 war savings stamps, the par or maturity value of which was $5 each, a total of $100, and the surrender value of which on the day of tender "was sufficient to pay in full the said note and about $6 or $7 more"; that plaintiff refused to accept such stamps, for the reason assigned that he "would be forced to pay defendant the $6 or $7 as the difference in value of said stamps and the note"; that defendant did not demand this difference, but stated to plaintiff that it might be paid when the stamps were turned in and cashed; that plaintiff kept the stamps 10 or 15 days, considering whether he would accept them under such conditions, and then refused to do so and returned them to defendant, whereupon defendant demanded a rescission of the contract, tendered back the sewing machine for which the note was given, and demanded his note, because of plaintiff's refusal to perform his covenant in declining the tender. On cross-examination, however, defendant admitted that he had disposed of the stamps before plaintiff filed suit. There was nothing in the pleadings or evidence showing that the previous tender of the stamps was continued, or that there was any renewed tender of money or stamps when the case was pending or tried. The court on motion directed a verdict for plaintiff for the $78 principal, interest at 6 per cent. from July 31, 1918, and costs of suit. The record shows that afterward the court on its own motion, during the trial term, modified the judgment so as to throw the costs against the plaintiff. Defendant excepted. Plaintiff filed no cross-bill, but, in the brief of counsel, objects to the shifting of costs from defendant to himself. Held:

A refusal of even a valid and continuing tender by a creditor does not relieve the debtor of all liability, such as would justify a rescission of his obligation to pay, but its effect, even when properly made and continued, is merely to protect the debtor from future interest and costs. Civ. Code 1910, § 4322; Gray v. Angier, 62 Ga. 596. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to a judgment for the principal sum called for by the note; and the only question raised by the plea was whether, under the evidence, the defendant had been relieved from the payment of interest and costs.

2. Appeal and error ¶270(4)—Tender ¶18, 24—Debtor must keep money or property in readiness to pay and bring it into court; tender did not defeat recovery of interest where property tendered subsequently used by debtor; error as to costs not reviewable when no exception taken.

In order for a tender to have this effect, it must be continuing, and the debtor must at all times keep the amount of money or property tendered in readiness so as to pay whenever the creditor will receive. Using the money or property tendered after refusal by the creditor to receive it, whereby the continuity of the tender is broken, destroys this necessary attribute of a legal tender. Ansley v. Anderson, 35 Ga. 18; Toomey v. Read, 133 Ga. 855, 856(4), 67 S. E. 100; Fannin v. Thomason, 50 Ga. 614, 617; Gray v. Angier, supra. When a plea of tender is filed, the defendant "should bring the thing tendered into court, or aver his readiness to do so." Mason v. Croom, 24 Ga. 211(5). The evidence for defendant having failed to show such a tender as would meet the requirements of the legal rule, the court did not err in directing the verdict, including interest, for the plaintiff. There being no exception taken by the plaintiff relative to the subsequent shifting of the costs against him, that question cannot be considered.

ADAMS v. OVERLAND-MADISON CO.
et al. (No. 12252.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

1. Corporations ¶10, 28(2), 34(8), 507(6)—Judgment ¶141—Default properly set aside on showing that corporate name was merely trade-name and person served not defendant's agent; corporation not created when charter not accepted nor franchises used; use by individual of corporate name held not to create corporation de facto or by estoppel; evidence held to warrant finding that person served was not agent in charge of business.

Where a petition alleged that a named defendant was a corporation, and a default verdict and judgment were taken against it as such, and thereafter an individual filed a verified petition in the nature of a motion to vacate and set aside such verdict and judgment, upon the ground that the name in which defendant was sued and verdict and judgment taken was not in fact that of a corporation, but was only the trade-name of petitioner, who owned the business as an individual, and that no such corporation existed, and upon the further ground that the judgment was void, in that no service had been perfected, because the person served by the sheriff as the agent of defendant in charge of the business was not such an agent, and where the petition as amended set up a traverse of the sheriff's return of service, and duly made the sheriff a party thereto, and the petition was filed at the same term of court at which judgment was rendered, and showed proper diligence by petitioner and his counsel after knowledge of the judgment, and a meritorious defense to the original suit, and where in a hearing of both parties, after rule nisi served upon the plaintiff, the allegations of the petition were fully supported by evidence, it was not error for the court to set aside the original verdict and judgment and to reinstate the case.

(a) Although in the trial of such issues there was evidence that petitioner and others had filed in the superior court an application for charter as a corporation, which was granted, the evidence was undisputed, and demanded a finding that such charter had never been accepted by the incorporators, and that, as there had never been a user of the corporate franchise, there was in fact no such corporation. Brooke v. Day, 129 Ga. 696, 59 S. E. 769; Franklin Bridge Co. v. Wood, 14 Ga. 86. Nor was there, under the evidence, any corporation de facto or by estoppel (Stewart Paper Co. v. Rau, 92 Ga. 511, 17 S. E. 748), since there was neither allegation nor proof of any holding out to the public as a corporation, other than the mere employment by the individual owner of such trade-name, nor was there allegation or proof of any loss or injury thereby to plaintiff.

(b) The evidence as to service showing that the person served had been merely a helper of the movant, and that during his absence, when the service was made, that person had only carried the keys and looked after the gasoline and other sales of the garage and collected, but without any authority to sell cars or other authority, a finding for the movant was authorized, if not demanded, that the person served was not an agent in charge of the business or one upon whom service could be made which would bind the movant. Welman v. Polhill, R. M. Charlton, 235; Smith v. Southern Ry. Co., 132 Ga. 57, 62, 63 S. E. 801.

2. Corporations ¶522—Judges ¶53—Judgment ¶139—Judgment against corporation held not a nullity, though charter never accepted or franchise used; disqualification of judge held waived when not raised by either party; statute vesting discretion in judge to open defaults has no application after final judgment.

The refusal to sanction the writ cannot, however, be sustained upon the grounds argued: (1) That the original judgment rendered by the trial judge was a nullity, because defendant was not chartered as a corporation, or, if so chartered, because the evidence showed that the trial judge was a stockholder and disqualified from presiding, or (2) that even if such judgment was not a nullity for either of these reasons, the right to open such default was, under section 5656 of Civil Code 1910, left to the discretion of the trial judge, since the evidence showed that a charter was in fact granted to defendant as a corporation; nor does the record show that the question of disqualification had ever been raised by either party at any time, and, even if the fact that the judge had been one of the original applicants for the charter could of itself be taken as sufficient to establish the fact that he was a stockholder at the time the case was tried, any such disqualification must be accounted as impliedly waived (Meeks v. Guckenheimer, 102 Ga. 710, 29 S. E. 486; Beall v. Sinsquefield, 73 Ga. 48; Shuford v. Shuford, 141 Ga. 407(3), 81 S. E. 115; Berry v. State, 117 Ga. 15, 43 S. E. 438); nor does the act of 1895 (Civ. Code 1910, § 5656), vesting discretionary powers in the trial judge to open defaults, have application where there has been a final judgment (Mathews v. Bishop, 106 Ga. 564(1), 32 S. E. 631; O'Connell v. Friedman, 118 Ga. 831, 832, 45 S. E. 668; Tenn. Oil & Gas Co. v. American Art Works, 10 Ga. App. 45, 48, 72 S. E. 517); yet, as the setting aside of the verdict and judgment was fully authorized under the procedure taken, and as the evidence offered in support thereof indisputably shows that there had never been any acceptance of the charter or any use of the corporate franchise, and, moreover, since in any event the evidence authorized the finding that no legal service had been perfected, the judge of the superior court did not err in refusing to sanction the petition. Little v. City of Jefferson, 9 Ga. App. 878(1), 72 S. E. 436; Gillespie v. Farkas, 19 Ga. App. 158, 91 S. E. 244; Barksdale v. Security Inv. Co., 120 Ga. 388, 47 S. E. 943; Mathews v. City of Thomaston, 21 Ga. App. 496(2), 94 S. E. 631; 5 Enc. Proceed. 655, 656, and notes.

3. Appeal and error ¶222—Absence of brief of evidence on motion immaterial, when no question raised by the parties.

While a motion to set aside a verdict, based on matters not appearing on the face of the record, is in effect a motion for a new trial, and is subject to all the rules of law governing such motions, so as to require a brief of the evidence (James v. Douglasville Banking Co., 26 Ga. App. 509, 106 S. E. 595; Ga. Ry. & Electric Co. v. Hamer, 1 Ga. App. 673, 58 S. E. 54), yet where the judge has finally passed on the merits of such a motion and the parties have raised no question as to the filing or approval of the brief of evidence, but have acquiesced in his entertaining the motion at that time, no such question can be entertained by the reviewing court, especially where the evidence in the original trial is immaterial to the questions presented by the motion. Marietta Fertilizer Co. v. Gary, 22 Ga. App. 604(2), 96 S. E. 711; Goodwyn v. Hightower, 30 Ga. 249(1); Cook v. Childers, 94 Ga. 718(1), 19 S. E. 819; Pilgrim Health Ins. Co. v. Gray, 16 Ga. App. 692(2), 85 S. NORRIS v. STATE. (No. 12613.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 18, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Criminal law \S 1172(8)—Indictment and information \S 191(8)—Indictment for assault with intent to rape warrants conviction for assault and battery; error in defining battery harmless when defendant convicted of assault with intent to rape.

Under an indictment for an assault with intent to rape, which also charges a battery upon the person of the female in question, a verdict can lawfully be returned either for an assault with intent to rape or for a mere assault and battery. Where, under such an indictment, one is convicted of the graver offense, an error in the charge of the court upon the subject of an assault and battery does not necessarily require another trial of the case.

T. W. Rucker, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

W. O. Dean, Sol. Gen., of Monroe, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of an assault with intent to rape, under an indictment thereof which also charged a battery. The court correctly and fully charged the law of an assault with intent to rape, but, while instructing the jury that if they did not find the defendant guilty of that charge they should consider whether he was guilty of the offense of an assault and battery, inadvertently charged them that—

"Any touching of the person of another in anger or in lust or in any other unlawful way is a battery within the meaning of the law."

This charge was error, for the mere touching of another in lust would not be a battery unless the touching was without the consent of the person touched. Plaintiff in error in his motion for a new trial claims that this error was prejudicial to him because he had admitted in his statement to the jury that he had touched the person of the female in question for the purpose of having sexual intercourse with her, but said that she had freely consented to the same, and that this error in the charge misled the jury and caused them to believe that even under his statement he was guilty of the offense of an assault with intent to rape. We cannot agree with this contention, for it is obvious that this erroneous portion of the charge was misleading to the jury upon the subject of an assault and battery only, and not upon the subject of an assault with intent to rape. It is evident that the jury believed the evidence for the state, which demanded a verdict of an assault with intent to rape, and rejected the defendant's statement, which showed only fornication and adultery, for if they had believed the statement in preference to the evidence for the state, then, under the erroneous charge of the court upon the subject of an assault and battery, they would necessarily have returned a verdict for a mere assault and battery, and not for an assault with intent to rape.

No other error of law is complained of, and the evidence amply authorized, if it did not demand, the verdict returned.

FORD v. SERENADO MFG. CO. (No. 12268.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading \S 205(2), 256—When plea sufficient to support amendment stated; plea held sufficient to prevent dismissal on general demurrer.

In a suit on a written contract for the purchase price of goods sold thereunder, a plea which is in effect no more than the general issue, when attacked at the appearance term by general demurrer or motion to strike, is not sufficient to support an amendment (Simmons Furniture Co. v. Reynolds, 135 Ga. 595, 69 S. E. 913; Millen Hotel Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Millen, 20 Ga. App. 701[3], 93 S. E. 253; Smith v. First Nat. Bank of Marietta, 115 Ga. 608, 41 S. E. 983); but if the original plea and answer sets up any valid defense, though imperfectly pleaded, it will authorize a properly pleaded amendment (Atlanta Suburban Land Corp. v. Austin, 122 Ga. 374[3], 378, 379, 50 S. E. 124; Nat. Duck Mills v. Catlin, 10 Ga. App. 240[1], 73 S. E. 418; Hicks v. Hamilton, 3 Ga. App. 112[2], 59 S. E. 331). The defense set up in the ninth paragraph, that the plaintiff had failed to furnish certain specially printed folders as provided in the written contract, may be taken as a plea of partial failure of consideration, and as such was sufficient to save the original plea and answer from dismissal on general demurrer. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4250, 4137; Grier v. Enterprise Stone Co., 126 Ga. 17, 54 S. E. 808. Such defense, as originally made, and as amended so as to allege the value of the goods in question, raised an issue for the jury.

2. Pleading \S 36(3), 256, 263—Plea of non est factum held too indefinite to authorize amendment; amended plea of non est factum held entitled to allowance even after the first term; admission of signing of contract prevails over denial.

That part of the original answer which was in the nature of a plea of non est factum merely denied that the contract between the parties was "the same as the copy attached to the petition," without specifying the particulars in which the same had been modified. It was therefore too vague and indefinite to furnish within itself even the basis for an amendment (Mozley v. Reagan, 109 Ga. 182[1], 183, 34 S. E. 310; Caudell v. Nabstedt, 22 Ga. App. 694, 695, 97 S. E. 99); yet since the defense already referred to furnished enough to amend by, and the amendment setting up this defense distinctly shows that the contract as executed was the same as that sued upon, except that the exhibit marked "Schedule B," setting forth the prices at which plaintiff was to furnish the machines, was not attached, and that the goods sued for had not been ordered under "Schedule B," such sworn amendment would have raised an issue for the jury, and should have been allowed upon being sworn to, even after the first term (Patton v. Bank of La Fayette, 124 Ga. 965[1], 53 S. E. 664, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 592, 4 Ann. Cas. 639; Tucker v. Carson, 110 Ga. 908, 910, 36 S. E. 217; Norton v. Scruggs, 108 Ga. 802[2], 34 S. E. 166), were it not for the fact that by another portion of the amended plea (treated in paragraph 4 of this syllabus) the defendant, by solemn admission in judicio, in effect admits the signing of the contract as sued on. In such a case the admission and not the denial must prevail. City of Moultrie v. Schofield's Sons Co., 6 Ga. App. 464, 468, 65 S. E. 315; Williams Mfg. Co. v. Warner Sugar Refining Co., 125 Ga. 408, 411, 54 S. E. 95.

3. Evidence \S 434(11)—Defense held insufficient to raise issue of fraud so as to modify terms of contract.

Neither the original nor the amended ground of defense by which it was sought to set up fraud, in that the plaintiff had failed to comply with an oral contemporaneous promise of its agent to alter the terms of the contract as signed, by substituting other merchandise for that specified in the agreement, was sufficient to raise an issue of fraud, so as to modify the express terms of the written contract. Tinsley v. Gullett Gin Co., 21 Ga. App. 512(2), 94 S. E. 892; Ozmore v. Coram, 133 Ga. 250(1), 65 S. E. 448; Bond & Maxwell v. Perrin, 145 Ga. 200, 88 S. E. 954; Southern Fertilizer Co. v. Harrell, 17 Ga. App. 642, 87 S. E. 911; Chewning v. Tucker, 17 Ga. App. 768(1), 88 S. E. 593.

4. Principal and agent \S 41—Bayer's right to recover consideration under guaranty of sales held limited by terms of contract.

In the answer as amended the defendant alleges that, although the plaintiff had guaranteed by the contract that the defendant would be able to sell a specified number of machines within a stated period, it had nevertheless, after the execution of the contract, notified him in writing that the prices the defendant was to pay for the machines had been materially increased above the prices set forth by the contract, and the defendant says that for this reason he has been damaged in a stated sum represented by the difference in such prices for the specified number of machines, because it would be impossible for him to make the sales contemplated and guaranteed under the terms of the contract, on account of such increase. The prices which under the contract the defendant was to pay for the machines are scheduled in the exhibit marked "Schedule B," referred to in paragraph 2 of this syllabus. Paragraph 6 of the original contract provides: "In consideration of our (my) fair and reasonable effort in promoting the sale of the Serenado, in accordance with your 'Methods and Directions,' and the performance 'by us (me) of our (my) part of the agreement as specified herein, you agree that if we (I) have not disposed of at least twenty-six (26) Serenado model 49 talking machines, or other models of equal value, within fifteen months of the date of this agreement, you will at our (my) request, refund the face value of this agreement, two hundred fifty ($250.00) dollars, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from the time of your approval of this agreement, provided that we (I) return the sample Model 49 by express prepaid, properly boxed and in reasonably good condition." Held, whatever, if any, might be the rights of the defendant to recover the $250 consideration paid by him to the plaintiff, upon showing a compliance on his own part with the conditions and terms of such guaranty, his claim, if any, must be limited to and measured by the quoted paragraph of the contract, which the defendant by his pleading has not sought to do.

Nov. 1, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Evidence ¶441(11)—Sales ¶89, 267, 428
—Oral warranty available in suit on purchase-money note not specifying terms of agreement; purchase money-notes held to waive all warranties and merge all representations and warranties; purchase-money note cannot be altered by subsequent promises or representations without consideration; vendor's promise made upon renewal of purchase-money note not enforceable if terms of note thereby varied.

Under the rule stated in Fryor v. Ludden & Bates, 134 Ga. 288, 67 S. E. 654, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, a plea setting up a breach of an oral warranty can be maintained in a suit on a purchase-money note, which, though reciting the consideration, fails to integrate within itself the terms of the sale agreement; but where the note sued on recites that, "in consideration of such renewal and extension of time of payment, I hereby expressly waive all claims arising out of the purchase of said property and all defenses, statutory or otherwise, to the payment hereof," this provision of the agreement must be taken as a waiver of any express or implied warranties relative to the subject-matter of the sale, with the effect that all previous and contemporaneous representations and warranties are merged into and controlled by the written instrument; nor could the terms of such a writing be altered by subsequent representations or promises, unless supported by a consideration. Thus, while it is true that, unless the instrument should expressly or by implication provide otherwise, a vendor is bound by his promise made at the time a purchase-money note is renewed, whereby he agrees to remedy existing defects, or to warrant a then undelivered portion of the purchased property (Atlanta City Street Ry. Co. v. American Car Co., 103 Ga. 254, 29 S. E. 925; Lockett v. Rawlins, 13 Ga. App. 52, 78 S. E. 780), still, under the rule stated, such promises and warranties cannot be enforced, if, in order to do so, it is thereby necessary to add to or vary any of the terms of the agreement, such as are covered by and embodied in the written instrument. Bond v. Perrin, 145 Ga. 200(6), 88 S. E. 954; Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Broach, 137 Ga. 602(1), 73 S. E. 1063. The trial judge did not err, therefore, in excluding the testimony offered by defendant, or in directing a verdict in the plaintiff's favor.

Nov. 1, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Judgment ¶358—Judgment including interest not unauthorized by pleadings because petition and exhibit does not give sufficient data for computation.

Suit was brought for a stated sum, "besides interest" on an open account, a copy of which as an exhibit was attached to the petition. The case being in default, and there being no demand for a jury, the city court judge, sitting without a jury, rendered a judgment for the plaintiff for the principal amount claimed, besides a stated sum as "interest to date of judgment," and future interest at the rate of 7 per cent., the finding and judgment reciting that it was based "upon the evidence submitted." At a later term, and more than six months thereafter, the defendant filed a petition in the nature of a motion to set aside this judgment, upon the grounds, (1) that, although the petition claimed a principal sum "besides interest," and attached an exhibit showing the items of principal, it failed to show the dates of the account or any data upon which interest could have been computed, and that the judgment for interest was therefore unauthorized by the pleadings; and (2) that, although the finding and judgment recited that it was based "upon the evidence submitted," no evidence had in fact been offered by the plaintiff. The record shows that the original petition and process were personally served on the defendant. The motion as amended alleges that, while the movant had employed counsel to represent him in filing defenses at the first term, none were in fact filed. No legal cause for such failure, or for the failure to move to set aside the judgment at the term when it was rendered, was shown, save that the "petitioner did not know that such judgment had been rendered until within the last few days." At the hearing of the motion it was shown that no evidence other than the pleadings was offered by the plaintiff at the time when the judgment in question was taken. Held:

When pleadings are so defective that no legal judgment can be rendered, the judgment will be arrested or set aside. Civ. Code 1910, §§ 5957, 5959. But a judgment cannot be arrested or set aside for any defect in the pleadings or the record that may be aided by verdict, or is amendable as matter of form. Civ. Code 1910, § 5960; Strickland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 15 Ga. App. 464, 83 S. E. 853. The mere failure in the instant case to include in the petition or exhibit the dates or other data upon which interest might be computed, being an amendable defect, did not render the judgment unauthorized by the pleadings. Civ. Code 1910, § 5936; Wilson v. Stricker, 66 Ga. 575(1); Davis v. Bray, 119 Ga. 220, 46 S. E. 90.

2. Judgment \S 336, 338—Motion to set aside judgment on verdict or finding for want of evidence is governed by rules governing motions for new trials; motion to set aside judgment for want of evidence properly overruled when excuse for failure to file defense, etc., not shown.

Where a judgment is based upon a verdict or finding on facts, as the verdict or finding must be set aside before a motion to set aside the judgment can be granted for any cause not apparent on the face of the record or pleadings (Ayer v. James, 120 Ga. 578, 580, 48 S. E. 154), a motion to set aside the judgment, based solely upon matters of evidence, such as, as in the instant case, the want of evidence as to the amount of interest due, is tantamount to a motion for a new trial on the general ground that the verdict or finding is contrary to evidence and without evidence to support it, and thus is controlled by the rules of law governing such motions. James v. Douglasville Banking Co., 26 Ga. App. 509, 106 S. E. 595; Ga. Ry. & Electric Co. v. Hamer, 1 Ga. App. 673, 58 S. E. 54; Garfield Oil Mills Co. v. Stephens, 16 Ga. App. 655, 659, 85 S. E. 983. The second ground of the motion being thus limited, in that it wholly fails to show any legal ground or excuse for the failure to file defenses, or to file a motion to set aside the finding and judgment or a motion for new trial at the term when the judgment was rendered, the court properly overruled the same.

LYNCH v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Intoxicating liquors \S 146(1)—Ability to complete sale unnecessary to convict for offering.

The ability, at the time of an offer to sell ardent spirits, to complete the sale in accordance with the offer, is not an essential element of the offense of offering ardent spirits for sale under Prohibition Act 1918, § 3.

2. Intoxicating liquors \S 146(1)—Offer to sell must not be joke.

To constitute the offense of offering ardent spirits for sale, under Prohibition Act 1918, § 3, the offer must be, at least apparently, an actual offer to sell such spirits, and not a joke.

3. Intoxicating liquors \S 238(5)—Offer to sell 50 gallons of whisky not impossible of performance as matter of law.

An offer to sell 50 gallons of whisky cannot be said, as a matter of law, to be an offer to do something so utterly impossible of performance that it cannot reasonably be taken seriously and relied on as an actual offer, in violation of Prohibition Act 1918, § 3.

4. Intoxicating liquors \S 236(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for offering to sell ardent spirits.

In a prosecution for offering ardent spirits for sale, in violation of Prohibition Act of 1918, § 3, evidence held to warrant a finding that the offer in question was an actual offer, and was not intended as a joke.

5. Intoxicating liquors \S 146(1)—Mere "offer" to sell ardent spirits an offense.

A mere verbal offer to sell whisky is an offense, under Prohibition Act 1918, § 3; the word "offer" in such statute not having the meaning of "attempt."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Offer.]

Error to Corporation Court of Radford.

Zelgler Lynch was convicted of offering ardent spirits for sale, and brings error. Affirmed.

In this case there was a trial by jury and a verdict finding the accused guilty of offering ardent spirits for sale, contrary to the statute (section 3 of the Prohibition Act of 1918, Acts 1918, p. 578), and fixing the punishment of the accused in accordance with another section of the same act. Whereupon the accused moved the court to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence. This motion the court overruled, entered judgment, and sentenced the accused in accordance with the verdict of the jury.

The sole assignment of error is that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to the law and the evidence; the position taken in argument for the accused being that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, because the evidence does not show that the accused, at the time he offered the whisky for sale, had the ability to complete the sale in accordance with his offer.

The evidence for the commonwealth consists of the testimony of two witnesses, one of whom testified that he overheard the accused talking to one O. J. Dudley, when the two were in a certain garage together, and that the "accused offered to sell Dudley 50 gallons of whisky if he wanted that much"; and the other testified as follows:

"I am connected with the ——— garage. * * * Accused came to the garage on Sunday. * * * I had C. J. Dudley working for me. I was sitting in the office, and heard loud talking and swearing; * * * heard * * * [the] accused offer to sell Dudley whisky. He [the accused] said, 'I will sell you [Dudley] as much as 50 gallons if you want that much, and bring it to you any time you want it.' I did not infer that he [the accused] had any at that time; said he would get it for him."

The accused testified that he did not offer to sell any whisky. That if he offered to sell Dudley any whisky he was joking, as he (the accused) did not have any whisky at the time and did not know where he could get any.

The case was submitted to the jury upon a single instruction asked for by the accused which, in substance, submitted to the jury for their decision the question of whether or not they believed from the evidence that the commonwealth had proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused made the offer to sell as much as 50 gallons of whisky and did so, not as a joke, but, with the intention "to carry out" such offer.

Harless & Calhoun, of Christianburg, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The sole question presented for our decision by the assignment of error in this case is as follows:

[1] 1. Is the ability, at the time an offer to sell ardent spirits is made, to complete the sale in accordance with the offer, an essential element of the statutory offense of offering ardent spirits for sale?

The question must be answered in the negative.

It is elementary that an actual offer to sell anything is in itself an implied representation on the part of the person making the offer that he either has at the time, or undertakes to subsequently acquire, the ability to complete the sale in accordance with the offer. The offer to sell, therefore, is complete the moment it is made, and in no way depends for its existence upon the present or future ability of the person making the offer to complete the sale in accordance with the offer. The actual lack of such ability does not afford any ground of defense to the person making the offer in a prosecution under the statute aforesaid, any more that it would in a civil action against him for damages for deceit, or for breach of contract, by one who may have accepted the offer in reliance upon the implied representation or undertaking aforesaid. In neither case would the lack of such ability to complete the sale alter the fact that the offer to sell was made. An offer to sell is one thing. A completed sale is another and different thing.

[2-4] Of course, to constitute the offense, the offer must have been, at least apparently, an actual offer to sell the whisky, and not a joke. Abstractly speaking, an offer to do something may be so utterly impossible of performance that it cannot reasonably be taken seriously and relied on as an actual offer. We cannot say, however, that the offer to sell 50 gallons of whisky is per se of that character. And the verdict of the jury, under the instruction given, concluded against the accused the fact that the offer in question was an actual offer, intended by him as such, and not as a joke.

[5] As laid down in the authorities cited for the accused (23 R. C. L. § 61, pp. 1243, 1244, and First Nat. Bank v. Turnbull, 73 Va. [32 Grat.] 695, 34 Am. Rep. 791), the actual or potential existence of the thing sold is an essential element of a sale. But that is true only at law, and then only of completed sales. As held in the case just cited, a valid equitable assignment may be made of things not in actual or potential existence at the time of the assignment; and, as stated in the section of R. C. L. just mentioned, while "a mere possibility or contingency not founded on a right or coupled with an interest cannot be the subject of a present sale, * * * it may often be of an executory contract to sell." (Italics supplied.) An actual offer to sell is an overt act (in the instant case a verbal act), which is merely the first action taken in the attempt to make an executory contract of sale, or a sale, and which, unless frustrated by unexpected extraneous circumstances, will result either in an executory contract of sale or in a sale. It is this first overt act which the statute creates into an offense. The language of the statute, so far as material to be quoted here, is as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person in this state to * * * sell * * * or * * * offer * * * for sale * * * ardent spirits. * * *"

It is not alone the actual completed sale of ardent spirits which falls within the condemnation of the statute. It also forbids the taking even of the first step towards the making of the sale.

It is true that the word "offer" may have the meaning of "attempt." It is so stated by Webster. But that authority also defines the word "offer" to mean: "To present in words; to proffer; to make a proposal to," giving as an example a quotation from 2 Samuel xxiv: 12, "I offer thee three things." See, to same effect, 8 Bou. Law Dictionary (8d Ed.) p. 2399. So that it is plain that the offer condemned by the statute may consist in the verbal offer which was made in the instant case according to the testimony for the commonwealth. Therefore, although there was a conflict in the testimony on the subject, that conflict involved the credibility of the witnesses, and since, in the conflicting testimony, there was testimony before the jury sufficient to support their finding to that effect, we must consider that the accused did commit the overt act of making the "proffer," the "proposal," the "offer," and, in that sense, the "attempt" to sell the ardent spirits, which, as aforesaid, is the offense created by the statute.

Such an "attempt" falls precisely within the definition of an attempt given in Hicks' Case, 86 Va. 223, 9 S. E. 1024, 19 Am. St. Rep. 891 (a prosecution for an attempt to poison), relied on in argument for the accused. The following is said in that case of an attempt, quoted from Wharton's Cr. Law (9th Ed.):

"An attempt is an intended apparent unfinished crime.' Therefore the act must reach far enough towards the accomplishment of the desired result to amount to the commencement of the consummation."

And again, quoting from Wharton's Cr. Law, § 181:

"To make the act an indictable attempt * * * it must be a cause as distinguished from a condition, and it must go so far that it must result in the crime unless frustrated by extraneous circumstances."

In Wharton's Cr. Law (11th Ed.) § 224, it is said that—

An attempt, to be indictable and punishable, "need not be capable of success; * * * it being clear that apparent adaptation may constitute the attempt. * * * It is enough if there is a possibility. * * *"

Berkeley's Case, 88 Va. 1017, 14 S. E. 916, also relied on in argument for the accused, was a prosecution for an assault. It is true that the opinion of the court in that case quotes with approval extracts from Davis Cr. Law and Russell on Crimes, in which the statement is made that "to constitute an assault there must be present ability to inflict an injury," yet, as indicated in the very extracts quoted, this statement is subject to the qualification that if the threatened conduct is such that it puts the person assailed in such apparent peril as to create in him the reasonable belief that he is in peril, the assault will be complete, although it may be that the person making the assault did not in truth have the present ability to inflict the threatened injury. As said in Bish. New Cr. Law (8th Ed.) § 32, on the subject of what constitutes an assault:

"There is no need for the party assailed to be put in actual peril, if only a well-founded apprehension is created. For his suffering is the same in the one case as in the other, and the breach of the public peace is the same. To illustrate: * * * If, within shooting distance, one menacingly points at another with a gun, apparently loaded, yet not in fact, he commits an assault the same as if it were loaded."

Thereupon Mr. Bishop proceeds to lay down what is undoubtedly the correct rule on the subject, in the following words:

"There must be some power, actual or apparent, of doing bodily harm; but apparent power is sufficient. In the instance we are referring to, the person assaulted is really put in fear. * * * It has been said that the gun must be within shooting distance; but plainly if it is not, yet seems to be so to the person assaulted, or danger otherwise appears imminent, it will be sufficient."

It appears from the opinion in Berkeley's Case that the prosecutor himself testified that the accused "did not attempt to strike" him. Hence it affirmatively appeared that the prosecutor was never put in any apparent peril or apprehension of bodily harm. And the court correctly held, under those circumstances, that the charge of the assault was not sustained by the evidence. Plainly, therefore, the case does not hold, as is claimed for the accused in the case before us, that to constitute an attempt the overt act must in all cases be accompanied with the present ability on the part of the actor to accomplish the actual thing attempted. And we find nothing in the holding in Berkeley's Case in conflict with our conclusions reached above.

The case will therefore be affirmed.

MULLINS v. SUTHERLAND et al.

1. Sales ¶383—Evidence held insufficient to sustain finding of application by buyer of staves on improper contract.

In an action in conversion by sellers against buyer, by reason of an alleged application by the buyer of staves on a contract not existing at the time of the contract of sale in violation of such contract, evidence held insufficient to sustain a finding that the staves were not applied on a then existing contract.

2. Evidence ¶568(1)—Opinion evidence not proper.

In action by sellers for conversion by the buyer in shipping goods on later contracts of the buyer, contrary to the contract between plaintiffs and defendant, testimony of one of the sellers that they loaded the goods for the purpose of shipping "under this contract" and that "they were not shipped under the contract," but stating no reason for that conclusion, was insufficient to show conversion, as it was incumbent upon the sellers to show the facts and not the mere opinion of the witness.

3. Sales ¶477(1)—Seller may waive provision of contract.

A seller could waive a provision in a conditional contract of sale under seal providing that the staves could be applied by defendant buyer only on existing contracts, and permit sales by buyer to other persons.

4. Sales ¶477(1)—Provision for resale only to certain parties held waived.

A provision in a contract of sale of staves that resale by buyer could be made only to parties under existing contracts, seller retaining title for purpose of additional security for the purchase price until paid for, was waived, where the purchaser applied shipments of staves on contracts not existing at the time of the contract of sale, and no objection was made that there was a violation of the contract.

5. Sales ¶477(2)—Application of purchase of staves on improper contracts held not conversion.

Where provision in a contract for the sale of staves that they could only be applied by purchaser on then existing contracts was waived and the actual possession and right to the staves passed to buyer, and after such waiver he applied a shipment of staves on a contract not existing at the time of the original contract, sellers could not maintain trover against the purchaser under a provision in the contract retaining title in the seller.

6. Trover and conversion ¶16—Right to possession essential.

One who had neither actual possession of property nor the right to demand the immediate possession thereof at the time it was disposed of by defendant in violation of contract cannot maintain an action of trover.

Action by S. R. Sutherland and others against E. L. Mullins. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Chase & McCoy, of Clintwood, for plaintiff in error.

Geo. C. Sutherland, of Clintwood, for defendants in error.

BURKS, J. The defendants in error agreed to sell to the plaintiff in error 500,000 oak staves, by a contract under seal bearing date February 10, 1919, which was modified by a supplemental contract in writing not under seal, bearing date September 6, 1919. The contract called for complete delivery by September 15, 1919. The supplemental contract simply extended the time for delivery. The price to be paid for the staves was $57 per thousand "f. o. b. cars at Fremont, Virginia, or other points in Dickenson county," on the orders of Mullins. The Sutherlands (who were the sellers, and designated in the contract as parties of the first part) agreed "not to knowingly deliver any culls," but, if upon inspection at destination by Mullins or his assigns or consignees, culls were found in the cars, it was agreed that Mullins, his assigns or consignees, should "unload and remove them from the cars, and make no charge therefor." Clauses 6 and 8 of the original contract are as follows:

"Sixth. The party of the second part hereby agrees to pay for said staves as each car is shipped, and received and inspected at destination by consignees of the party of the second part, but in the event that said report is not received within twenty days from date of shipment then said party of the second part is to pay forty dollars per thousand for the staves so shipped, the remaining seventeen dollars to be paid as soon as said report is received, and at any rate not to be longer than forty days from date of shipment. But title to the said staves is not to pass out of the party of the first part till payment is made in full for the said staves."

"Eighth. It is understood by the parties of the first part, that the above staves are to be applied on contracts of party of the second part, and is to be shipped by parties of the first part to such firms, and at such times as may be directed by the said party of the second part; the parties of the first part are to furnish to party of the second part the car number and name and the quantity of staves shipped in each car as soon as convenient after each car is shipped."

At the time the original contract was entered into, it is claimed that Mullins had contracts with the Interstate Cooperaage Company and A. Knabb & Co.; but the character of these contracts, if any such existed, is not disclosed by the record. A large quantity of staves was delivered under the contract, but they are not in controversy here and need not be further noticed.

In January, 1920, the Sutherlands, on the order of Mullins, delivered to the railroad company 138,700 staves to be shipped under the contract. These staves were consigned by Mullins to the T. Johnson Company, at Chicago, and upon inspection the culls were thrown out, and the T. Johnson Company reported the shipment as containing 125,144. Prior to this shipment, Mullins had no contract with the T. Johnson Company, but his brother did have, and the staves were shipped under the brother's contract under the name of Mullins Stave & Lumber Company. The Sutherlands made repeated efforts to collect of Mullins the contract price of this shipment, without avail, and then brought trover against Mullins to recover damages as for conversion. They laid their damages at $13,000, and recovered a verdict for $9,015.50, which was far in excess of the contract price. W. F. Mullins was the brother under whose contract the shipment was made, and he was united as a defendant in the action, but the jury found in his favor. The verdict of the jury was so plainly right as to him that it is unnecessary to consider the cross-error assigned as to this finding.

The defendant E. L. Mullins, did not plead at rules, but followed the usual course and pleaded "not guilty" at the calling of case on the court docket, and the case was laid over to a later day of the term. At this later date he tendered a special plea of recoupment under section 6145 of the Code of 1919, setting up the contract of February 10, 1919, and alleging a failure and refusal of the plaintiffs to deliver all of the staves called for by the contract and a consequent damage to him of a large amount which he offered to set off and have allowed against the plaintiffs' demand. The trial court rejected this plea without assigning its reasons therefor at the time. It is suggested for the defendants in error that the refusal might very properly have been because it was not filed at the time the plea of "not guilty" was filed, but this is too improbable to warrant a ruling on that supposition, as we find in one of the bills of exception, certified by the trial judge in his rulings on evidence offered to support that line of defense, the statement that—

"The court sustains all of the objections upon the theory, and for the reason that the defendant is not allowed to plea an offset in damages or otherwise against the plaintiffs in action of tort."

It is quite manifest that the trial judge rejected the plea because he thought such a plea was not admissible in an action which was in form in tort.

A number of errors have been assigned, and several of them overlap each other; but in the view we take of the case it will not be necessary to consider them seriatim.

[1-4] The Sutherlands admit that the staves in controversy were delivered to the railroad company on the order of Mullins, "for the purpose of shipping under this contract," but deny that they were shipped by Mullins under the contract. They insist that, at the time the contract was entered into, Mullins had contracts for shipment of staves to the Interstate Cooperaage Company and to A. Knabb & Company; that the contract restricted Mullins to shipments to these two parties; and that the shipment of the staves in controversy by Mullins to the T. Johnson Company at Chicago was a conversion of their property. According to the contention of the Sutherlands, section 8 of the contract would have to be interpreted as if it read:

"It is understood by the parties of the first part (Sutherlands) that the above staves are to be applied on existing contracts of the party of the second part (Mullins) and are to be shipped by parties of the first part to such firms as the party of the second part now has contracts with, and at such times as may be directed by the party of the second part," etc.

It may be well doubted if the contract is susceptible of the interpretation contended for. The circumstances under which the contract was entered into are not disclosed by the record, and the meaning of the language used is not clear. But if the situation be viewed in the light most favorable to the Sutherlands, it is conceivable that they intended to restrict Mullins to sales under his then existing contracts and retained the title until the staves were fully paid for, with a view to obtaining additional security for the purchase price. If this was their intention, it was poorly expressed, and, in the absence of any light on the surrounding circumstances, we are unable to say that is a proper interpretation of the contract and that Mullins should have so understood it. But even if this be the proper interpretation, it was necessary for the Sutherlands to show, in order to recover in this action, that the staves were not shipped to parties with whom Mullins had contracts on February 10, 1919. The testimony in the case does not show with whom Mullins had contracts on that date. The nearest approach to it is the incidental statement of S. H. Sutherland, in detailing a conversation with one of the parties, that "I knew that Luther's contracts were with the Interstate Cooperaage Company and A. Knabb & Co." But it does not appear therefrom, or elsewhere in the record, when these contracts were made. There is a statement in the testimony of S. H. Sutherland that they "loaded them for the purpose of shipping under this contract," and that "they were not shipped under the contract"; but he states no reason for that conclusion. His opinion that they were not shipped under the contract should have been supported by facts showing that they were not so shipped. The Sutherlands delivered them "under this contract," and if there was thereafter a conversion by Mullins, it was incumbent upon them to show the facts and not the mere opinion of the witness that there was such conversion. Furthermore, if the contention of the Sutherlands be correct that Mullins was limited in his sales to persons with whom he had contracts on February 10, 1919, it was entirely competent for them to waive this provision of the contract and permit sales to other persons. Three witnesses for the defendant Mullins testify that S. H. Sutherland, one of the plaintiffs, consented to the sale to the T. Johnson Company, and their testimony was in no way contradicted by any one, although S. H. Sutherland was recalled to the stand to testify to another matter after these witnesses had testified. This shipment to the T. Johnson Company was made in January, 1920, and in February and March following S. H. Sutherland, one of the plaintiffs, was earnestly contending for the collection of the amount due under the contract of February 10, 1919, and, although he was at that time "not positive where they had gone," "he had learned from the bill" that they had gone to the T. Johnson Company, and had ascertained that they had paid Mullins for them, for in detailing a conversation with Mullins he says:

"And then I told him, I says, 'T. Johnson Company says these staves have been paid for,' and he admitted they had been paid for."

In addition to this, the other plaintiff, E. D. Sutherland, on March 18, 1920, wrote the defendant Mullins:

"Please let us have settlement on the stave contract as this is long past due. I have written you two letters asking for payment and cannot quite understand why the delay in this matter."

No reference is here made to any conversion though the writer had ample time to have ascertained the fact, if it existed and he intended to rely upon it. These facts constituted a complete waiver of the right, if it existed, to insist that Mullins could only sell to those with whom he had contracts on February 10, 1919, and the jury should have so found. They had no right to disregard the uncontradicted evidence on this question, and their verdict in this respect is plainly contrary to the evidence.

[5] Therefore the transaction was a perfected sale. The actual possession and the right thereto passed to Mullins, so that there was no conversion and the plaintiffs could not maintain trover. The title passed upon the consummation of that sale, and thereafter the rights of the plaintiffs (Sutherlands) were those of lienors for the purchase money. They could not sell and deliver the staves and at the same time remain the owners thereof.

"Courts have frequently, without regard to the designation of the contract by the parties as a conditional sale and the reservation of the title until the price is paid, construed the contract as in effect an absolute sale with a mortgage back as a security for the price and not a conditional sale, where the contract read as a whole and the special circumstances surrounding the transaction justified the conclusion that such was the ruling intention of the parties and the proper construction of the instrument as a whole. * * * Conditional sales are not favored in law, and where it is doubtful from the face of the instrument whether the contract is a conditional sale or a mortgage, the courts generally treat it as a mortgage, for the reason that such a construction will be most apt to attain the ends of justice, and prevent fraud and oppression, because an error which converts a conditional sale into a mortgage is less injurious than an error which changes a mortgage into a conditional sale." 24 R. O. L. § 744, and cases cited; Herryford v. Davis, 102 U. S. 235, 26 L. Ed. 160; Singer Man. Co. v. Smith, 40 S. C. 529, 19 S. E. 132, 42 Am. St. Rep. 897; Montenegro, etc., Co. v. Beuris, 160 Ky. 557, 169 S. W. 986, L. R. A. 1916C, 557.

In no view of the case do we think that the action of trover can be maintained.

[6] The plaintiffs in the trial court mistook their remedy. They sued in trover when they should have sued on the contract. The evidence in the case fails to disclose a conversion, though it does disclose a plain violation of contract. They sold the staves to Mullins, and made delivery thereof "under this contract," and thereafter they had neither the actual possession of the staves nor the right to demand the immediate possession thereof, without which the action of trover does not lie.

The Sutherlands claim that Mullins is also indebted to them in other sums for money due them under the contract of February 10, 1919, which could not be recovered in the action of trover, and for which an action on the contract would have to be brought, so that even if the present action in trover could be maintained it would require two actions to give them complete relief. Furthermore, we are of opinion that, if the Sutherlands get the contract price for their staves, with interest and costs, they will be fully indemnified.

For these reasons, the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the trial court thereon will be set aside, and the action of the plaintiffs in the trial court will be dismissed, with costs, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs in said action to bring such action on the contract of February 10, 1919, as supplemented by the contract of September 6, 1919, as they may be advised.

HOOVER et al. v. HOOVER.

1. Bastards ¶13—Legitimacy established if father at any time unequivocally recognized child as his.

The law so favors legitimacy that if, at any time, the putative father unequivocally recognized the child as his, such child is legitimate and the father's heir at law, no matter how often he repudiated his paternity.

2. Bastards ¶12 — Voluntary marriage of parents inferred from lack of haste and absence of threats.

Where the father of a child born out of wedlock did not marry the mother until six weeks after his arrest on a charge of seduction, and no threat, except that of the prosecution itself, was made, nor physical force used, there was an inference that his act was deliberate, and that he intended to legitimate the child; the purpose of the seduction statute being to require the seducer to right his wrong in the interest of his child as well as for the sake of the woman.

3. Bastards ¶6—Evidence held to show father's recognition of child as his.

In a partition suit involving complainant's legitimacy, evidence held to show that her father, by his conduct, his silence when he should have spoken, and his words, had recognized her as his child.

4. Bastards ¶3—Presumptions in favor of legitimacy and in support of judgment in doubtful cases.

Every fair presumption should be indulged in favor of legitimacy, and, in doubtful cases, in support of the judgment of the trial court.

Burks, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Rockingham County.

On rehearing. Former opinion reversed, and judgment below affirmed.

For former opinion, see 105 S. E. 91.

O. R. Winfield, of Broadway, and John T. Harris, of Harrisonburg, for appellants.

Ward Swank, of Harrisonburg, for appellee.

PRENTIS, J. [1, 2] While in accord with the views expressed in the previous opinion (105 S. E. 91) as to the legal inferences to be drawn from the mere fact of such a marriage, a further consideration of the evidence in this case leads us to the conclusion that too much emphasis was there placed upon the testimony which was adverse to the appellee, Winnie Hoover, and that the evidence and the proper inferences therefrom in her favor were insufficiently emphasized. The vital question, as has been stated, is whether or not Benjamin Hoover ever, by words or conduct, acknowledged, accepted, admitted, or owned that Winnie Hoover was his child.

It makes no difference how often he repudiated his paternity, for the law so favors legitimacy rather than illegitimacy that if, at any time, he unequivocally recognized her as his child, she is legitimate and his heir at law. It is said in the former opinion that "no doubt if a man voluntarily married a woman who was grossly incompetent, or shortly after the birth of a child, the marriage itself would afford all the evidence necessary of recognition by the husband of the paternity of the child," and then follows the recital of the facts indicating that this marriage was not voluntary but the result of intimidation caused by his arrest and prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage. In this connection it is proper, however, to observe that there is no evidence in the record of any threat from any source whatever, except the prosecution itself and the threat to invoke the law. No physical force was suggested by any one. The accused promptly gave bail for his appearance to answer the charge. He employed counsel known to this court to be exceptionally competent to advise him and to protect his legal rights. Six weeks elapsed between the time of his arrest and the marriage. The proposition to relieve himself of the prosecution by the payment of money came from him, and when he failed in his effort the offer to marry Mattie Farrell, the mother of Winnie Hoover, came from him. There was no particular haste about it. He was told to bring his own pastor; instead of this, two days later he appeared with the pastor of the church to which the woman belonged. The marriage ceremony took place in the home of Mattie Farrell, in the presence of her foster father and mother, and after the ceremony they together retired to an upstairs room, and according to her testimony spent the night in the same apartment; whereas, according to some of the witnesses who undertake to repeat Hoover's statements, they did not sleep in the same room, but in adjacent rooms open to each other.

The inferences to be made from a marriage of this sort, where the only force applied is the force which the statute itself applies, while not conclusive, have a significance far greater than where the marriage is brought about hastily by physical force and threats of personal violence. Benjamin E. Hoover, after his arrest, had six weeks for reflection and conference with his relatives, friends, and attorney, and there is an inference therefrom that his act was deliberate and with the intention of assuming all of the obligations to his wife and child which the law and sound public opinion under such circumstances would impute. Any lesser inference tends to defeat the apparent purpose of the seduction statute, which is to require the seducer to right his wrong, as much in the interest of his innocent child as for the sake of the woman.

[3] There is, however, much more to support the view, not only that Winnie Hoover is his child, but that he recognized her as such. His wife, the child's mother, whose testimony must always be considered in such cases, testifies to the fact of such recognition emphatically and unequivocally. The previous opinion emphasized the fact that in her bill for divorce the birth of the child was improperly alleged to have taken place after instead of before the marriage. It should be observed in this connection, however, that the bill was signed by counsel, that it was a mere bill for a divorce upon the ground of desertion, and that the date of the birth of the child and whether born before or after the marriage was entirely immaterial so far as the issue raised in that case was concerned; the only vital allegations being the residence of the parties, the marriage, and the desertion for more than three years. So that such a mistake may have been merely the result of lack of information on the part of the attorneys who drew the bill.

Then much has been said of the answer and cross-bill of Benjamin E. Hoover in this divorce suit, but here, too, the significant facts are that the answer filed as a cross-bill did not deny the marriage and desertion, and though as a cross-bill it alleged that the marriage was invalid because induced by his own fright and the threats which had been made against him, the cross-bill was withdrawn. It also appears that although that suit was pending for several months, Hoover never appeared as a witness in support of the allegations of his cross-bill, and never at any other time, when it is alleged that he made the various statements attributed to him which are relied upon to show his lack of recognition, was he under oath or subject to cross-examination.

Then Hiram Hoover testified that shortly after the marriage Benjamin E. Hoover took his wife and the child to the home of Emmanuel Hoover, his father, to visit his mother. It must also be noted that although the accusation was clear and definite, at no time, either before or after the marriage, did Benjamin E. Hoover ever deny to Hiram Hoover, the foster father of his wife, that he was the father of the child. This question and answer appear:

"Q. After the marriage and while the wife and child were living in your family, did Ben Hoover ever attempt to explain to you his failure to provide a proper home and support for the wife and child?

"A. He said it was on account of his father."

This finds striking confirmation in the opposing testimony where it is shown that Emmanuel Hoover, the father of Benjamin E. Hoover, expressed his extreme displeasure on one occasion when this mother and child went to see his sick wife and remained there certainly for two days. Then this question and answer appear:

"Q. Please state whether or not, Mr. Hoover, in any of the conversations which you had with Ben Hoover concerning either the charge of seduction, the marriage, or the support of the wife and child, Ben Hoover ever denied that he was the father of Winnie Hoover?

"A. No, he never denied it."

Now one may recognize his child as well by conduct as by words, and this failure of Benjamin Hoover to deny the paternity of the child when so explicitly charged therewith by the woman involved and her natural protector is certainly conduct which is inconsistent with the claims which are now made. Then there is, in addition, the testimony of another witness, Mrs. Lydia Hoover, the second wife of Hiram Hoover, who before and at the time of the marriage lived in the home of Emmanuel Hoover, the father of Benjamin Hoover. She, too, testifies that he said the reason he did not live with his wife and take care of her was because his father objected to it. And she testifies that he spoke of the child as his child. The conversations with this witness took place after he had been charged by his wife with being the father of her child as well as after the marriage was notorious in the community. So that it seems to us that there was nothing improper or even improbable in such a discussion or conversation between these two. Had it occurred before the marriage, it would have been most unnatural. Her testimony is that Benjamin E. Hoover, in express language, recognized the child as his own. It cannot be discarded without imputing perjury to this witness, who is entirely disinterested, and her opportunities for such conversations are supported by other admitted facts and circumstances. That Hoover, on various other occasions, denied to his relatives and friends that he was the father of the child, is inconsistent but not in conflict therewith. It is not unusual, however, for men overtaken in such a fault as that with which Hoover was accused, to deny their guilt circumstantially, vigorously, and frequently. The question, however, is not how often he denied it, but whether at any time he recognized Winnie Hoover as his child.

Upon further reflection, we are satisfied that by his conduct, by his silence when he should have spoken, and by his words, he has recognized Winnie Hoover as his child. The contrary view will tend to defeat the manifest policy of the seduction statute, and indicate an easy pathway for the seducer who desires to evade his responsibility to the community, his legal duty to his wife, and his obligation to remove the bar sinister from the innocent child of his loins, who is entitled to bear his name.

[4]. Conceding that there are reasons for a fair difference of opinion upon the vital question of fact here involved, every fair presumption should be indulged in favor of legitimacy rather than illegitimacy, and, in doubtful cases, in support of the judgment of a trial court.

For the reasons indicated, we have concluded to affirm the decree.

A. S. WHITE & CO., Inc., v. RYAN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions §195(4)—Burden on plaintiff to prove nonresidence.

In action on contract instituted in March, 1921, where defendant pleaded the three-year statute of limitations and showed that contract was made in August, 1916, the burden was then cast upon the plaintiff to prove the fact of nonresidence of the defendant between such dates.

2. Pleading §339—Plea not waived by failure to call to attention of jury.

Where defendant pleaded statute of limitations, and it appeared on trial that limitations had run, the fact that the question of limitations was not specifically called to the attention of the jury did not change the pleadings, and it cannot be inferred therefrom that defendant withdrew or waived his plea of limitations.

Error to Circuit Court, Nelson County.

Action by A. S. White & Co., Inc., against Thomas F. Ryan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Caskie & Caskie, of Lynchburg, for plaintiff in error.

PRENTISS, J. A. S. White & Co. sued out an attachment against Thomas F. Ryan, alleging him to be a nonresident, setting up a contract for the purchase of certain wheat from him, alleging his breach thereof, and damages resulting therefrom. Ryan filed his answer to the petition, denying the contract or any liability for damages thereunder, and also alleging that, if any liability ever existed, it had been long barred by the statute of limitations, which he thereby expressly pleaded and relied upon.

Under Code 1919, § 6382, the parties are deemed to be at issue upon the petition and answer. The case went to trial, and there was a verdict for the plaintiff, whereupon Ryan moved to set the verdict aside upon the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion was sustained. The case was tried at a later term of the court, apparently upon the merits, without any reference to the statute of limitations, and there was a verdict and final judgment in favor of the defendant.

The only assignment of error relied upon is that the court erred in setting aside the first verdict upon the ground that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. The court certifies that no mention of the statute of limitations was made during the trial of the case, that no instruction was asked on the subject, no mention thereof made in the argument before the jury, and that the attention of the jury was not in any way called to this defense, except in so far as the same was relied on in the answer.

[1, 2] The question presented can be answered by a reference to the elemental principle that he who alleges must prove. The defendant in error having pleaded the statute of limitations, and the evidence clearly showing that the alleged contract was made in August, 1916, whereas this proceeding was not instituted until March, 1920, it appeared that more than three years had then elapsed after the cause of action accrued, and hence, without more, was barred. The plaintiff here, confessing this, seeks to avoid the result by claiming that the action was not barred because the defendant, Ryan, had been a non-resident of Virginia during the whole of the period involved. Of course, if this is true, the action was not barred, but it inevitably follows that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove the fact of such nonresidence. Switzer v. Noffsinger, 82 Va. 522; Miller v. McIntyre, 6 Pet. 61, 8 L. Ed. 320. The statute having been expressly pleaded and relied upon, this was one of the issues involved. The fact that it was not specifically called to the attention of the jury does not change the pleadings, and it cannot be inferred therefrom that the defendant withdrew or waived his plea.

We are referred to the case of Murdock v. Herndon's Executors, 4 Hen. & M. (14 Va.) 203, as authority for a contrary view, and as showing that there is a presumption of law after verdict that the jury passed upon all of the issues. It is shown, however, in that case that the statute of limitations was not pleaded, and this, of course, is a sufficient answer to the contention based thereon and made in this case. If the jury here intended by their finding in favor of the plaintiff to decide that issue in his favor, then their verdict was plainly contrary to the evidence because the fair inference therefrom was that the action was barred. If, on the other hand (as the trial court properly, we think, held), the jury had failed to pass upon this issue only because of the failure of counsel on either side to direct their attention to that issue, then, in either event, the action of the trial court in setting aside the first verdict was not injurious to the plaintiff in error; indeed, it might well have been contended, under Code 1919, § 6251, that in the then state of the pleadings and evidence the defendant was entitled to a judgment notwithstanding the verdict.

In Calvert v. Bowdoin, 4 Call (8 Va.) 217, where it was manifest from the evidence that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, the court set aside the verdict because the jury had not passed upon that issue, and, being of opinion that the evidence did not support either of the counts in the declaration, did not send the case back for a new trial in order to supply the deficiency in the verdict, but reversed the judgment in favor of the plaintiff and entered a nonsuit.

We have no doubt whatever of the correctness of the judgment, and this because it is clear that the burden of showing that the claim was not barred because of the non-residence of the defendant shifted to the plaintiff so soon as it appeared from the evidence that the cause of action arose more than three years before the proceeding was instituted.

LYNCH v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Assault and battery ⇨48—Battery includes assault.

A battery accompanies and includes an assault.

2. Assault and battery ⇨48—Intended injury may be to feelings or mind; "battery."

A "battery" is the unlawful touching of the person of another by the aggressor himself or by some substance set in motion by him, but the intended injury may be to the feelings or mind as well as to the corporeal person, and the elements of rudeness or insult may become a test of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Battery.]

3. Words and phrases—"Willfully" defined.

The word "willfully" is variously defined in legal parlance and may mean, among other things, "designedly," "intentionally," or "purposely" (citing 4 Words and Phrases, Second Series, Willfully).

4. Assault and battery ⇨48—Conviction held warranted.

Where accused knocked at door of prosecutrix and said, "Say, Mrs. M., I want to kiss a white woman; I want to see what it is like to kiss a white woman," and she replied, "No, sir," and he thereupon put his hand upon her shoulder and said, "I didn't mean to insult you," and left when she told him to get out, held, that a conviction for assault and battery was warranted.

Error to Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Frank Lynch was convicted of assault and battery, and brings error. Affirmed.

Harless & Calhoun, of Christianburg, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. The defendant, Frank Lynch, was tried under an indictment containing two counts, the first charging that he broke and entered a dwelling house in the daytime with intent to commit rape, and the second merely charging him with an attempt at the latter offense. He was found guilty of assault and battery, and sentenced to a term in jail and the payment of a fine.

It is conceded by his counsel that under the indictment for felony, as above set out, the defendant could have been lawfully convicted of assault and battery, provided the evidence was sufficient for that purpose. The sole question presented for our decision is whether the trial court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict as being contrary to the evidence.

The conflicts in the testimony were settled adversely to the accused by the verdict of the jury, and the case, as it comes to us upon the facts, is as follows: On the afternoon of March 30, 1920, Mrs. Mary Martin was at home alone with her two small children, the elder of them being only two years of age. She heard a noise or knocking at the back door, and, on going to see what it meant, was met at the door by Frank Lynch, who said to her, "Say, Mrs. Martin, I want to kiss a white woman; I want to see what it is like to kiss a white woman." She replied, "No, sir;" and he thereupon put his hand upon her shoulder and said, "I didn't mean to insult you." At this juncture, she told him "to get out," and he left.

The evidence was certified in narrative form. We have stated it from the commonwealth's standpoint as fully as it appears in the record. Was it sufficient to support the verdict?

[1, 2] A battery accompanies and includes an assault. Various definitions of both offenses are found in the books, all substantially much the same, but, as is well said in 2 R. O. L. p. 525:

"A definition, however carefully drawn or comprehensive in its scope, will furnish no certain or satisfactory solution of the facts in a particular case. While it would seem that there ought to be no difficulty in determining whether any given state of facts amounts to an assault (and battery), the behavior of men toward each other varies by such mere shades that it is sometimes difficult to characterize properly their acts and words."

The surrounding circumstances, such as time and place, the relationship or sex of the parties, the subject-matter of the words used, may have a most important bearing in determining whether a particular act constitutes an assault and battery. The law upon the subject is intended primarily to protect the sacredness of the person, and secondarily to prevent breaches of the peace. The reason of the law is the life of the law, and this maxim often finds useful application in cases of alleged assault and battery. To constitute battery there must be some touching of the person of another, but not every such touching will amount to the offense. Whether it does or not will depend, not upon the amount of force applied, but upon the intent of the actor.

"A battery is the unlawful touching of the person of another by the aggressor himself, or by some substance set in motion by him. * * * The intended injury may be to the feelings or mind as well as to the corporeal person. * * * The law cannot draw the line between different degrees of force, and therefore totally prohibits the first and lowest stage of it." 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. pp. 953, 955, 959.

"Any touching by one of the person or clothes of another in rudeness or in anger is an assault and battery." Engelhardt v. State, 88 Ala. 100, 7 South. 154; Jacobi v. State, 133 Ala. 1, 32 South. 158, 163; Hyde v. Cain, 159 Ala. 364, 47 South. 1014; Seigel v. Long, 169 Ala. 79, 53 South. 773, 774, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1070.

In Goodrum v. State, 60 Ga. 509, a case holding that it is an assault and battery for a man, without any innocent excuse, to put his arm around the neck of another's wife against her will, the court said:

"To touch a virtuous wife in the way of illicit love is a far greater outrage than to touch her in anger, and equally a breach of the peace. It is violence proceeding from lust, instead of violence proceeding from rage. It issues from the passion, which, unrestrained, culminates in rape, instead of from the passion which culminates in homicide."

Mr. Minor defines battery as:

"The actual infliction of corporeal hurt on another (e. g., the least touching of another's person), willfully or in anger, whether by the party's own hand or by some means set in motion by him." Minor's Synopsis Criminal Law, 77.

[3] The above definition by Mr. Minor does not expressly mention rudeness or insult, but by using the word "willfully" clearly implies that those elements, as well as anger, may become a test of the offense. The word "willfully" is variously defined in legal parlance, and may mean, among other things, "designedly," "intentionally," or "perversely." See 4 Words and Phrases, Second Series, 1293 et seq. Its correct application in a particular case will generally depend upon the character of the act involved and the attending circumstances.

[4] Having in view the foregoing definitions and explanations of the offense, we are unable to say that the verdict of the jury in the instant case was not warranted by the evidence. Upon the case as made by the commonwealth, the accused, without invitation or excuse, entered the home of the prosecutrix, grossly insulted her, and almost simultaneously placed his hand upon her shoulder. This was an unlawful touching of her person, and hence, in contemplation of law, a battery.

It is argued that the wrongful intention of the accused in touching the prosecutrix is disproved by his declaration, "I did not mean to insult you," followed almost immediately by his departure from the room. This is perhaps one way, but it is certainly not the only way, in which the jury might under the evidence have fairly weighed his conduct. The exact order of events must here be observed. He entered the house with an evil purpose, which he communicated to Mrs. Martin. She promptly rejected his insulting suggestion. Not stopping with that, he proceeded to place his hand on her shoulder and say, "I did not mean to insult you." Was this a cessation of his overtures and a genuine apology, or was it an impudent experimental attempt on his part to continue the conversation in the hope of overcoming her objection? He had not yet shown any purpose of leaving the house. That followed promptly, to be sure, but only after he had added one insult to another by placing his hand upon her, and after her second rebuff, which assumed the form of an order to get out of the house. If it be conceded that any man, after having thus insulted a woman, could lawfully touch her, even in connection with an apology (and such a concession does not seem to us at all well warranted), there is certainly enough in the case to have justified the jury in finding that what he actually did rendered him guilty of a rude insult and a willful violation of the sanctity of her person, amounting in law to an assault and battery.

Counsel for the accused cited and relied upon section 604 of Wharton's Criminal Law, where the author, in treating of assaults, says that, if a man raise his hand against another within striking distance and at the same time say, "If it were not for your grey hairs, I would tear your heart out," it is no assault, because the words explain the act and take away the idea of an intention to strike. The doctrine as thus stated is sustained by respectable authority, and appears to be good law. It is not in point in this case, however, because, as we have seen, the jury might properly have found that the accused intended to commit a trespass upon the person of the prosecutrix, and did not desist until after he had partially carried out that intention by placing his hand upon her.

The cases of Hardy & Curry v. Commonwealth, 17 Grat. (58 Va.) 600, and Woodson v. Commonwealth, 107 Va. 895, 59 S. E. 1007, are also relied upon by counsel for the accused, but we find nothing in either of them to conflict with the conclusion herein reached. In the former the definition of assault and battery approved in the opinion by Judge Moncure recognizes "an insulting manner" as one of the tests of guilt; and in the latter, the Woodson Case, the court merely held that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a conviction for attempted rape, no question of assault and battery being involved.

The judgment complained of is right and should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

(131 Va. 776)

POPE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Disorderly house §17—Evidence held to show accused knew of disorderly acts.

In prosecution for keeping a disorderly house, evidence held to show that accused knew of disorderly practices on his premises.

2. Disorderly house §17—Evidence held to show habitual disorder on premises.

In prosecution for keeping a disorderly house, evidence held to show, not merely a single occasion of disorder, but habitual disorderly practices.

3. Nuisance §61—Disorderly house "public nuisance."

Generally, the fact that certain things are injurious to public morals is sufficient to render them public nuisances, and, at common law, a disorderly house is a public nuisance.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public or Common Nuisance.]

4. Disorderly house §17—Knowledge of improper practices may be circumstantially proved.

Accused's knowledge of improper practices in his establishment may be established by direct or circumstantial evidence.

5. Disorderly house §15—Proprietor presumed to know of habitual practices.

Actual knowledge of a proprietor of a resort of indecent and immoral practices on his premises need not be shown, in prosecution for keeping a disorderly house; it being sufficient to show such facts, such as recurrence of the practices, that knowledge would be imputed to him.

6. Disorderly house §4—More than a single act of disorder required.

While there must be something more shown, to support conviction of keeping a disorderly house than a single act of improper conduct, there is no particular extent of time prescribed during which the improper practices must continue or recur, or any fixed amount of recurrence of dissolute practices to constitute an establishment a disorderly house.

7. Disorderly house §15—Illicit use may support inference of continuous use.

A building may be so used on a single day as to justify the inference, with but slight additional evidence, that the illicit use has been continuous; the inference being one of fact, not of law, and one to be drawn, if at all, by the trial judge in the light of the circumstances.

8. Disorderly house §17—Positive proof of actual knowledge of disorderly practices not necessary.

In prosecution for keeping a disorderly house, an instruction that positive proof of actual knowledge of accused of the acts and doings of the women he employed was not necessary, since the law required him to use reasonable diligence to ascertain the character of such acts and doings, and that the state was required only to prove facts putting a reasonable man on notice, held not incorrect.

9. Disorderly house §4—"Common and habitual occurrence" of disorderly acts defined.

In prosecution for keeping a disorderly house, an instruction that, before the acts complained of might be regarded as constituting a public nuisance, they must be of common and habitual occurrence, but that the law fixes no definite continuance of time during which such acts must occur to meet the requirements of "common and habitual occurrence," it being sufficient if they occur with such frequency and during such substantial period of time covered by the indictment, as to constitute a continuing menace to public morals, held not incorrect; for the quoted words have a flexible meaning, and are not to be so construed as to impose too weighty a burden upon society when seeking to deal with evils of this character.

10. Criminal law §829(1)—Elision from proffered instruction of matter covered not prejudicial.

Elision from a proffered instruction of matter as to which the jury has already been adequately instructed is not prejudicial.

11. Criminal law §741(1), 829(3)—Proffered instruction held properly refused, weight of negative evidence a jury question.

In prosecution for keeping a disorderly house, where the jury had been instructed as to necessity of common and habitual occurrence of disorderly practices, a requested instruction, that if the jury believed from the evidence that the police and various respectable citizens had visited accused's establishment prior to the night in question and had not seen any improper conduct, then, if there was improper conduct on the night in question, this was insufficient for conviction, as the improper conduct must be habitual, was properly refused, and it was for the jury to determine the value of the negative evidence of the police and various respectable citizens in view of evidence conclusively showing improper conduct on the night in question of such character as to suggest habitual occurrence.

Error to Corporation Court of Norfolk.

John Pope was convicted of keeping a disorderly house, and brings error. Affirmed.

Tomlin & Maupin, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SAUNDERS, J. John Pope was indicted in the corporation court of the city of Norfolk for keeping and maintaining a disorderly house in that city on November 23, 1920, and on divers other days within 12 months preceding that date—that is to say, he was indicted for maintaining a common-law nuisance. It is not necessary to reproduce the indictment in full. Upon the trial under this indictment, the defendant was convicted, and his punishment fixed by the jury at 6 months in jail and a fine of $500. The accused applied for and secured a writ of error to the judgment of the court. His petition assigns various errors:

[1] First. The court erred in giving instructions 4 and 9, at the instance of the commonwealth.

Second. The court erred in amending instructions 5, 6, and 7, prayed by the accused, and giving them as amended, and refusing to grant instruction 10, offered by the accused.

Third. In overruling the motion of the accused to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence, and grant a new trial.

Under this head, the petition says:

"These assignments of error can be argued together, since the real point in issue has a twofold aspect:

"I. Whether under the evidence the accused has been shown to have had any knowledge of any unlawful or disorderly acts.

"II. Whether evidence regarding a single occasion of disorderly acts in the conduct of a lawful business is sufficient under the law to justify a conviction of the offense of maintaining a common nuisance."

In support of his contentions of law, petitioner cites many precedents and authorities from other states, alleging that he can find nothing in point in the law writers, and precedents of this state.

John Pope, the defendant, is a colored man, and the proprietor of the Chesterfield Hotel, in the city of Norfolk, a hotel run by and for colored people. Pope has been engaged in this business since 1918. In connection with the hotel business the defendant conducted a cabaret, in which food and drink were sold to his customers. Dancing by paid performers, as well as patrons, constituted a feature of the entertainment which was provided.

The dances were "shimmy," or "honk-a-tonk" dances, and were indulged in by both white and black persons. It does not appear that the two races were on the floor at the same time, the floor being cleared of colored performers when the white people danced. Nor did the whites and blacks eat together, further than being in the same room, the tables for the white people being on one side of the room and for the colored people on the other. The locality is a colored one.

In September, 1920, in addition to his hotel license, Pope applied for and secured a dance hall license for his cabaret. On the night of November 23, 1920, J. H. Holloman, Keville Glennan, Robert B. Murray, Wm. Jenkins, and Herman Thomas, the last four being members of the staff of the Virginian-Pilot, a Norfolk newspaper, visited the Chesterfield hotel and attended the cabaret performances. These witnesses testify with almost complete unanimity as to what they saw and heard on the occasion of the above visit, differing only in respect of trivial details. The testimony of these witnesses is to the following effect:

They arrived at the Chesterfield Hotel about half past 12, and sent for John Pope, asking him if it would be all right to bring in a party of newspaper men. Pope replied that it would, but that there were some policemen in the place at the time. The party suggested that they could wait, but Pope told them to "come in if they wanted to; that the police would leave in a little while, and things would be livelier after 'the law' left." Later Pope denied that he made this remark. Pope conducted the party to the cabaret. There they found tables around the wall, with a middle space for dancing about 15 feet long, and 8 or 10 feet wide. White and colored people were sitting at the tables eating and drinking, the whites on one side, and the colored on the other. The visiting party remained until about 2, and when they left everything was in full swing. Holloman described what he saw as follows:

Two regularly employed professionals sang and danced, also a colored man. The songs were not suggestive. Between times white persons, male and female, danced. The professionals danced the "shimmy," or muscle dance, and were more expert than other "shimmy" dancers whom he had seen on the "stage, and in other places." The colored man was described as being unusually expert in the art of shaking the various portions of the body. One of the visitors was a white girl, who was under the influence of liquor, and described herself as being as drunk as ——. She wore socks, and when dancing raised her skirts to exhibit her naked legs. This girl danced with another white girl for a minute or two in a disgusting fashion. The two women stood in the middle of the floor and went through motions suggestive of sexual intercourse. When the dance was concluded—ed the girl who was intoxicated took her seat by her escort and leaned back against him, putting her feet on another chair with her dress above her knees, exhibiting her naked legs. There were seven or eight white women present accompanied by men, and about an equal number of colored women and men. The witness (Holloman) states that he was at Pope's place after midnight about two weeks prior to the time in question, and that the dancing of the professional female dancers on that occasion was of the same character as that which took place on November 23d. On both of the occasions described by this witness, the accused was on the premises. The other witnesses confirmed all that Holloman stated, and added other details in their description of the performances of the evening on the part of the dancers, and of others. Describing the dancing of one of the colored women, the witness Glennan says: "She danced an indecent muscle dance, pulling up her skirt within two inches of her crotch." This dance was followed by a dance by a white man, apparently a patron of the place, who attempted a similar muscle dance. Then came a dance by a colored man, which was of the same character, only more exaggerated. The next dance was by two white women, patrons of the place, one of them being intoxicated. It was to Mr. Glennan that one of these girls made the remark about being drunk. The dance by these women is described by this witness precisely as stated by Holloman. Glennan also confirms Holloman's account of the performances of the expert negro male dancer. Continuing, this witness said:

"I had noticed that some of the white patrons at other tables would leave the room, and return after a brief absence with some liquid which I took to be whisky, and poured a small quantity in four or five glasses, and filled them up with ginger ale. Thereafter, the parties seemed to liven up to some extent, but I do not know that it was whisky."

Later witness saw a white man at another table get up and go out of the room, and come back in a few minutes with two pint bottles which looked like whisky. Subsequently, the witness got up, and went out in the hall with Mr. Jenkins, and just outside of the cabaret door he saw a young negro man, and asked him if he could get them some liquor. The negro replied that he could in a few minutes for $7 a pint. Glennan went back to his table, and in a few minutes the negro summoned him into the hall, Jenkins accompanying him. They followed the negro into an unoccupied room immediately across the hall from the dance hall; as they went into this room the light was turned on by some one in the hall, who said: "I'll turn the light on for you." Witness did not know who made this remark, or turned on the light. The young negro produced a pint of liquor, for which witness paid him $7, but the negro insisted that the witness pour the whisky from the whisky bottle into a ginger ale, or Coca-Cola bottle before it was carried back to the table. This was done. Witness "did not know this negro; never saw him before, or since," and could not say that he was an employee of John Pope, but "he seemed to have the run of the place." The whisky was taken back to the dance hall, and most of it drunk by Glennan and his associates. Witness would not say that John Pope was in the room when anything suggestive or vulgar was going on, but he came in several times. Witness and party were at the dance hall about two hours. During that time "no effort was made by any one to prevent the recurring indecency, and drinking described, and it all took place in full view of all present, white men and women and colored men and women."

The witness Murray confirms Glennan's testimony. He heard Pope's statement that things would liven up as soon as "the law" left. He saw the dancing which has been described, and states that the "dancing of the negro women performers and of the negro men was indecent;" that he had seen similar dances on the stage, but the dances at John Pope's place were worse, because more exaggerated. This witness states that, when the expert negro male dancer was performing, he "danced close to the table where the young woman who wore socks was seated, and in reaching distance of her shook his breast in her direction, whereupon she responded by shaking her breasts at him." Going into another part of the building, witness met John Pope, and was asked if he was having a good time. On his answer in the affirmative, Pope said:

"I am glad to hear it; I try to show my white friends a good time; we got the liveliest place in the country, and I'm going to keep it live unless my white friends get me mixed up with the law."

Witness drank part of the liquor which Glennan brought back in the Coca-Cola bottle, and it was whisky. Witness also saw people at other tables pouring liquor from bottles into their glasses, and filling same with ginger ale. He did not know what was poured, but immediately thereafter the parties would liven up, "as if cheered by the drink." He heard one white girl at another table say: "They must have put dynamite in this stuff." To this witness the most shocking feature of the performance was that the dances described took place before negroes and white people of both sexes. When witness left, Pope was on the premises, and things seemed as lively as at any time during the night.

William Jenkins is city editor of the Virginian-Pilot, and was a member of the party on the night in question. His testimony is to the same substantial effect in all respects as that of Mr. Glennan. The last witness in chief for the commonwealth was Herman Thomas, also a member of the staff of the Virginian-Pilot. This witness in the main saw the same things, and testified on the same lines as the other members of the party. He regarded the dancing of the paid performers "indecent." Had seen "shimmy" dancing at other places, and on the stage, and considered it immoral. Regarded the dancing at John Pope's by the negro performers as similar in character, but more exaggerated. He saw the indecent and degrading performance by the negro dancer and the intoxicated white girl, and said that it lasted from a half minute to a minute. He also saw the "highly suggestive and indecent" dance by the two white girls, described by the other witnesses. Witness partook of the liquor brought back by Mr. Glennan, and said that it was whisky, and had a kick in it. Saw other people pouring something from bottles into their ginger ale, and they appeared to be "liveller" thereafter. He thought the dancing of the professionals was "like what is called oriental, or 'hootchy-cootch' dancing."

The testimony for the defendant is voluminous, but in the main does not relate to the occurrences of November 23, 1921, but to conduct in the cabaret on previous occasions. A number of the witnesses for the accused are police officers, and members of the vice squad of Norfolk city. One and all these officers state that they had been in Pope's cabaret numerous times, and while there had never observed any disorder, or indecent behavior, or any conduct justifying an arrest. Some of the officers had seen the "shimmy" dancers, and did not consider their dances "immoral, indecent, or suggestive, or different in character from what is commonly performed at theaters and cabarets." One or more of these witnesses state that they had been at the cabaret at different hours of the night, and by different doors, and had never been able to detect anything which would warrant an arrest, though they made every effort to discover violations of the law.

Without going into details, it may be said that the testimony of these officers gives the cabaret a clean bill of health, so far as their observation went, for the period preceding the night of November 23, 1920. Sergeant Moore states that he consulted Mr. R. B. Spindle, assistant city attorney, with reference to keeping white people out of John Pope's establishment, and was advised by him that he "knew of no law to exclude white people from the place, if their tastes were sufficiently degraded to make association with negroes desirable." This witness also stated that he had "tried particularly to discover whether any whisky had been sold at Pope's establishment, but had been unable to discover any evidence of sales."

Benjamin Vick and William Morrisette were at the cabaret on the night of November 23d, but saw nothing improper in the conduct of any one while there.

The other witnesses for the defendant, several of them being colored physicians, agree in saying that, as visitors at the cabaret, they had never seen anything indecent or immoral, or different from what they had seen at the theaters and other cabarets. Nor had any of the witnesses who testify on this point bought any liquor at the Chesterfield, or seen any sold or drunk there. However, one or more of the witnesses for the accused state that had they seen such dancing as was described by the witnesses for the state, they would have regarded it immoral. Some of the witnesses for the accused state that they would not have visited or taken friends to Pope's cabaret if they had considered the place disreputable.

One of the witnesses for the accused, Priscilla Crump, stated that she thought the opening of the Chesterfield had been a benefit to that part of town; that it seemed to be a nice place. On cross-examination this witness added that she knew 800 Lincoln street (that is, the Chesterfield Hotel) when it was occupied by Jennie Williams, a white woman, and run as a bawdyhouse, and that "she supposed her establishment was a benefit to the community." Witness added that she had never heard any of the neighbors complain of noise or disorder from Pope's place. In this connection it may be stated that the witness Jenkins testified that he did not think the "music was audible to a great distance outside of the cabaret, as the walls were thick and without windows."

The accused testified in his own behalf, denying in toto that he conducted a disorderly house, or was aware of any acts of indecency, impropriety, or illegality on his premises. He insisted that the dances were decent, and the women performers of good character; that he had never had any complaints of impropriety against the conduct of his cabaret; that he had never allowed liquor to be drunk there; that it was possible it was drunk there, as bootleggers were very active in Norfolk; that he had never given an invitation to a white person, other than the police, to visit his premises, and had consulted the police authorities as to whether there was any objection in law to white people visiting his cabaret, and was advised by Sergeant Dudley, as coming from the commonwealth's attorney, that it was not unlawful for white people to come there as long as there was no disorder, or misbehavior; that he had kept the races apart in his cabaret, but had made no effort to exclude white people; that he was about the cabaret at different times on the night of November 23d, but saw no indication that liquor was being served, nor anything improper or indecent in the way of dancing or conduct; that if he had seen such vulgar and suggestive dancing as was described by the newspaper men, or had been told of its occurrence, he would have put a stop to it at once; that the colored performer was a negro actor then playing in Norfolk, who had volunteered to dance that night, and he had accepted his offer (this man was not put on the stand); that he had been raided twice, arrested with other men, and charged with gambling, and acquitted; that there were no signal buttons in his house; that he was willing to refuse white people admittance in the future if the police would support him in that action, but that heretofore he "didn't know how he could stop them from coming"; that he knew nothing of the whisky purchased by Mr. Glennan; that he never had had cause to interfere with "any conduct occurring in his dance hall"; that one Clarence Williams was the floor manager of his dance hall, and was on duty continuously during the visit of the newspaper party; that Williams had been summoned for the commonwealth and was then in the courtroom; that he (Pope) was on the premises most of the time, and in the dance hall from time to time, but most of his work was at the buffet in another part of the building.

Nowitzky, a police officer of Norfolk city, was put on the stand for the commonwealth. He stated that he participated in two raids on the Chesterfield Hotel in February, 1920, when John Pope and other colored men were arrested for gambling; that, while one policeman was reading the warrant to Pope, and witness was on his way to the third floor of the hotel, he could see the lights flickering on and off on said floor, as if a signal was being made; that he found about a dozen negro men in a room on the third floor, who tried to run when he reached that floor; that he traced the electric wire from said room, and found that the lights could be controlled from the telephone booth on the first floor.

There was evidence before the jury, in addition to what has been cited, but the abridgment given is sufficient for a disposition of this case. It will be noted that none of the witnesses for the accused, save John Pope, and possibly a police officer or two, who were present in the cabaret prior to and for a short time after the arrival of the newspaper party testify as to the occurrences of that night. Even the testimony of these officers and of the accused himself is negative in its character. The former saw nothing amiss while on the premises. The incidents of that particular evening, as related by the witnesses for the state, are therefore substantially unchallenged. It needs no argument to establish the conclusion that much of the dancing described was indecent, degrading, and prejudicial to the public morals. The evidence as to the purveying of ardent spirits on the premises is both direct and circumstantial, and convicts the accused of guilty knowledge of and participation in same. The stuff that was brought to the dance hall in Coca-Cola or ginger ale bottles, and added to the ginger ale in the glasses of the patrons was evidently whisky, or some variety of ardent spirits. One or more witnesses identify it as whisky. The comment of one young woman that "they must have put dynamite in this stuff," and the enlivening effect upon the drinkers of this addition to the harmless ginger ale, convincingly indicates that the contents of the Coca-Cola bottles were ardent spirits in some form. The contention of the accused is that he knew nothing of the sale of liquor on his premises; that he was opposed to such sale, and had never authorized or permitted it; that if conducted it was the work of bootleggers who had obtruded themselves upon his premises, and availed themselves of the opportunities afforded to sell contraband spirits to his patrons. The facts related by the witnesses repel and refute this contention. It was not a casual sale, a single incident of an evening, but a continuous performance. The witnesses relate that they saw white patrons of the cabaret going out from time to time, and returning with enlivening fluid in Coca-Cola bottles. Thereupon Mr. Glennan went out and found a young negro just at the door of the dance hall. He arranged with him to procure whisky at $7 a pint. In a few minutes the negro summoned witness to the hall. As they went across the hall into an unoccupied room, some one obligingly turned on the light. The whisky was thereupon secured, and poured into a Coca-Cola bottle, as required, in order to avert suspicion as to its contents upon return to the dance hall. The witness did not know this negro, but stated that he seemed to have "the run of the place." According to defendant this negro and his ally who turned on the light, were organized bootleggers, plying their nefarious traffic upon his premises, using his rooms and lights, and serving his patrons with whisky at $7 a pint, without his consent, and contrary to his wishes.

It would be passing strange, indeed it would tax human credulity to believe that such was the case. It is conceivable that an employee, or employees, of a hotel proprietor, himself firmly opposed to this illicit traffic, and using his best efforts to suppress the same, might make a sale, or sales, of ardent spirits on the premises of such a proprietor without his knowledge. Even an interloper at times might effect such sales. Under these circumstances the owner would be guiltless of any offense. But the case supposed is not the case in judgment. The whisky supplied was as readily secured and as systematically provided as ginger ale or Coca-Cola. The operator was at the door of the cabaret, within Pope's establishment. He used one of Pope's rooms in which to transfer the whisky into the Coca-Cola bottles, and had an ally in the building to turn on the lights. He was apparently on duty during the entire period of stay of the witnesses for the state, which was one and a half hours at least. It would not be reasonably likely that undesired bootleggers, mischievous interlopers, could thus enter without detection upon the premises of a man who was regularly coming and going from his cabaret to his buffet, and without his knowledge, or that of his employees, ply a profitable and illicit traffic in his establishment under the circumstances related. This presumed bootlegger was in evidence whenever whisky was desired, for it is a just inference that other patrons procured their spirits just as Glennan did; but he was apparently invisible to the accused, or to any of his attendants. It is evident that the whole arrangement was a craftily designed, but transparent, scheme to evade the law, and that the sale of ardent spirits was merely one of the illegal practices pursued in the establishment of the accused.

It is a noteworthy circumstance, and one to the prejudice of the defendant, that he introduced no witnesses to repel in direct fashion the specific statements of the witnesses for the commonwealth. If these damaging statements were not true, then their falsity could have been established by other witnesses present on that occasion. Such witnesses were available. There were over 30 visitors, white and black, male and female, in the cabaret after Glennan and his associates arrived. In addition, there was present in the courtroom at the time of the trial the floor manager of the accused, one Clarence Williams, who was "on duty continuously during the visit of the party composed of Glennan and others, on November 23, 1920." If the evidence of the members of this party was true in detail, then Clarence Williams saw the vulgar, immoral, and indecent things described by these witnesses, and either did not consider them indecent and immoral, or, knowing them to be such, did not restrain them, or report their occurrence to the proprietor. In either view, an inference injurious to the character of the establishment may be drawn.

[2] Under the third assignment of error, the petition says:

" * * * The real point at issue has only a twofold aspect:

"I. Whether under the evidence the accused has been shown to have had any knowledge of any unlawful or disorderly acts; and

Apparently the theory of the defense is that they have established by the witnesses for the accused that, prior to November 23, 1920, Pope had conducted a decent, orderly, and unobjectionable dance hall, and that the conduct of the individuals on the night in question, as described by Glennan and his companions, even if taken to be true, was fortuitous and unexpected, contrary to the tenor of the cabaret entertainments, and unknown to and undesired by the proprietor. It will be conceded that, if such was the case, the defendant should be discharged. A single act of vulgarity or indecency by paid performers, interpolated contrary to the instructions or wishes of the owner of a house, or the unexpected indecencies of patrons on a single occasion, or in the course of a single evening, would not constitute an establishment a common nuisance. But if the performances at Pope's place were habitually and uniformly decent, if they were attended normally by decent people, seeking lawful recreation in the form of wholesome and pleasurable entertainment, and the sights witnessed by Glennan and others were abnormal unusual, and fortuitous, the question may well be asked, How did it happen that the evening in question furnished so many varieties of indecency, shocking in themselves, but which apparently did not shock the observers, male or female, or call for warning or rebuke from the floor manager of the accused, who was on duty all of the time? If the performances of that evening, however, were typical and characteristic of the entertainment afforded by the accused, then undoubtedly the house was a "common, ill-governed, and disorderly house" a plague spot in the community, and a menace to decency and good morals. At best, the "shimmy," wherever rendered, is not a refined or elevating dance. Slightly exaggerated, it easily becomes a suggestive and indecent performance.

The testimony of various witnesses for the commonwealth is that on the evening in question the shimmy dancing of these paid performers was "indecent." Holloman states that these dancers were more expert than like dancers he had seen elsewhere, and that the dancing on the evening of the 23d was of the same character as the dancing he had seen in the same cabaret on a prior occasion. Other witnesses describe as indecent the dancing which Holloman calls "more expert" than that of like performers elsewhere, and which is described by another witness as being "more exaggerated." Having in mind that this specific dancing of the evening of the 23d was pronounced "indecent" by several witnesses, the jury doubtless interpreted the terms "exaggerated" and "expert," as used by Glennan and Holloman, to be equivalent to indecent, and concluded that the performances of "like character" on a previous occasion were also indecent. They were justified in concluding from the testimony of Holoman and others, and by derivation from the internal evidence afforded by the character of the entertainment observed by the witnesses for the state during the hours between midnight and 2 in the morning, as well as from the conduct and behavior of the patrons attending this entertainment, that the incidents described were normal, not abnormal—usual, not unusual—and typical of a continuing style of entertainment furnished by the defendant; that is to say the evidence supported the boast of the accused that his cabaret was the "liveliest place" in the country on the night in question, and the further conclusion that it had been "lively" theretofore.

[3] As a general proposition, the fact that certain things are injurious to public morals is sufficient to render them public nuisances. At common law a disorderly house is a public nuisance, and a disorderly house has been defined as follows:

"A disorderly house is a house in which people abide, or to which they resort, to the disturbance of the neighborhood, or for purposes injurious to public morals, health, convenience, or safety." 14 Cyc. p. 492.

[4] The state must prove a defendant's knowledge of improper practices in his establishment, but such knowledge may be established like any other fact by direct or circumstantial evidence. It has been held in some cases that a proprietor is presumed to have knowledge of that which goes on in his house, if it is a continuing practice. See De Forest v. United States, 11 App. D. C. 458.

[5] In Jones v. State, 10 Okl. Cr. 79, 82, 133 Pac. 1134, an instruction was sustained by the appellate court in which the jury was told that it was not necessary for the state to prove actual knowledge on the part of the accused of the character of his place, or of the inmates, or of those who resorted there, but such facts and circumstances may be shown as will convince a jury beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was bound to have cognizance, or knowledge, of the inmates of the house, or of those who resorted there for the purposes set out in the information. The principle embodied in this instruction applies to proof of cognizance by the proprietor of indecent and immoral practices in his establishment, when they are recurrent. A proprietor should be diligent to see that his entertainments are not destructive of morality, or infected with indecency. He is not permitted to shut his eyes to occurrences that it is his duty to prevent, and find safety in a claim of ignorance.

[6] Counsel for petitioner insists that, if a house is not one prohibited by law, the state must show that disorderly conduct in the house was of common and habitual occurrence, with the proprietor's knowledge, before it can convict him. It is true, as heretofore stated, that there must be something more than a single act of improper conduct to support conviction. There must be recurrence; but there is no particular extent of time prescribed during which the improper practices must continue, or recur, or any fixed amount of recurrence of dissolute practices to constitute an establishment a disorderly house.

In Commonwealth v. Gallagher, 83 Mass. (1 Allen) 593, the court said:

"The evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in convicting the defendants. A disturbance of the public peace by the assembly of noisy and dissolute persons, the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and other similar acts which tend to make disorder and injure public morals, and thus to create a common nuisance in a house or tenement, may be proved to have occurred in the course of a few hours (italics supplied) as well as during a number of days, a week, or a month. It is the nature of the acts done, not the length of time during which they are committed, that constitutes the offense."

Petitioner seeks to avert the application of this precedent to the case in judgment, by pointing out that in the case cited the defendant was selling liquor, a thing prohibited by law, and maintaining his establishment for that, and no other purpose. Hence, his establishment was unlawful per se. But, as has been pointed out, while Pope had a license to conduct a lawful establishment, the evidence in the instant case shows that he was selling liquor to his patrons, a prohibited enterprise. The court in its opinion, supra, refers to the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors as one means by which the peace may be disturbed, but it adds: "And other similar acts which tend to make disorder and injure public morals."

"If a man keeps a house open to the public and there sells intoxicating liquor generally to persons who come together, and they, when stimulated thereby, or otherwise, make disturbance, or commit acts of immorality, or in any matter violate public decency and decorum, the place is a disorderly house." 1 Bish. Cr. Law (7th Ed.) § 1113.

[7] In the case of Tenement House Department v. McDevitt, 215 N. Y. 160, 165, 109 N. E. 88, 89 (Ann. Cas. 1917A, 455), it is said:

"It is true, of course, that a building may be so used on a single day as to justify the inference, with but slight additional evidence, that the illicit use has been continuous. But the inference in such a case is one of fact, and not of law, and must be drawn, if at all, by the trial judge in the light of all the circumstances."

Petitioner discredits this authority on the ground that it is dictum, not doctrine. Conceding this to be true, the principle announceed is essentially sound, and, if not law, should be made law.

It has been said that a conviction will be sustained on an indictment for keeping a disorderly house, upon proof of the drawing together of vicious, dissolute, or disorderly persons engaged in unlawful or immoral practices, thereby endangering the public peace, and promoting immorality. Thatcher v. State, 48 Ark. 60, 2 S. W. 343.

On the night in question, there were present in Pope's cabaret whites and blacks, male and female, some of them certainly vicious and dissolute, and engaged in immoral practices. Drinking was prevalent, and one woman at least was drunk. The evidence indicates that the happenings of that evening were not casual, fortuitous, or unexpected. The methodical way in which liquor was sold shows that it was a customary practice, craftily designed, not the work of an intruding bootlegger defying at once the law and the defendant on his own premises. The illegal performances were continuous until long after midnight. The pace was "fast and furious." The dancing described as "indecent" was of the same character as that occurring on a previous evening. Hence, "additional evidence, even if slight," was not lacking, and the jury was justified in drawing the inference of fact, which evidently they did draw, that the occurrences of the night in question were measurably a recurrence of like antecedent illegalities.

Instruction No. 4.

"Positive proof of actual knowledge by the defendant of the acts and doings of the women he employed is not necessary, since the law requires him to use reasonable diligence to ascertain the character of such acts and doings, and all that the state need do is to prove facts which would put a reasonable man on notice; but knowledge on the part of the defendant, either actual or constructive, is an essential element of the offense, and must be proved by the commonwealth beyond a reasonable doubt, either by direct, or circumstantial evidence."

Instruction No. 9.

"The court instructs the jury that, before the acts complained of may be regarded by the jury as constituting a public nuisance, they must be of common and habitual occurrence, but the law fixes no definite continuance of time during which such acts must occur to meet the requirements of 'common and habitual occurrence.' It is sufficient to meet this requirement if they occur with such frequency, and during such substantial period of time covered by the indictment, as to constitute a continuing menace to public morals."

It is not perceived that the instructions complained of announce incorrect principles of law, or were to the prejudice of accused. The defendant in the instant case may complain that the evidence of the state does not justify conviction under the conditions imposed by these instructions, but the principles stated are sound enough. One of the authorities cited by petitioner, to wit, 18 Cyc. p. 1246, says:

"A person, to be criminally responsible for the keeping of a disorderly house, must have knowledge of the disorderly conduct in or about the house, or of improper use to which the house is put. However, actual knowledge of the keeper is not necessary; implied or constructive knowledge is sufficient. Such knowledge need not extend to particular acts, or facts."

"Defendant's knowledge of the character of the house may be sufficiently shown either by direct or circumstantial evidence."

Another court has said, and we agree with its pronouncement, that—

A defendant "cannot shut his eyes to what is going on around him, for the purpose of avoiding knowledge, and then defend on the ground of lack of knowledge."

It is perfectly true, as stated in instruction 9 in effect, that there must be continuance by repetition of improper acts, to constitute a disorderly house; or, to state the same proposition in different language: "There must be some measure, though brief, of continuity and permanence." But this measure of continuity and permanence of operation is a question of fact to be proved as any other fact. Another authority says: "The acts of misconduct should be at least often enough to indicate a manner of keeping."

Instruction 9 advises the jury that the "acts complained of, before they can be regarded as a public nuisance, must be of common and habitual occurrence." But these words, "common and habitual occurrence," have a flexible meaning, and are not to be so construed as to impose too weighty a burden upon society when seeking to deal with evils of this character. The hands of organized authority must not be tied by too great refinement of construction. A killing must be a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing to be murder in the first degree; it must be a predetermined killing upon consideration; but this has not been construed to mean that the design to kill should have existed for a considerable duration of time. It is familiar law that such design may be formed at the moment of the commission of the act. So, in cases of the character of the instant case, the continuance by repetition of indecency and immorality in the house of an owner, with his assent and connivance, necessary to make the house a disorderly house, has no fixed duration or definite time limit prescribed, provided the acts of misconduct are often enough to indicate a manner of keeping. Each case must be adjudged according to its own circumstances. Instruction No. 9 correctly defines for the jury the words "common and habitual occurrence," and left them to determine from the evidence whether the acts complained of were of "common and habitual occurrence," as so defined.

We find no error in these instructions.

Plaintiff in error complains further that the court amended instructions 5, 6, and 7, offered by him, and gave them in amended form. The amendment of 5 and 6 consisted in the addition of the words: "And such knowledge must be actual, or constructive, as defined by instruction No. 4." This amendment was certainly proper.

[10] The court amended instruction No. 7 for the defendant by striking out the concluding paragraph of same, and adding the following words to the preceding paragraph: "But such improper conduct must cover a substantial period of time." The matter stricken out referred to the necessity for a recurrence of unlawful conduct to make an establishment a disorderly house. On this point the jury had been adequately instructed by instruction No. 9 for the plaintiff. Hence, the elision of the concluding paragraph did not operate to the prejudice of defendant. Nor was it to the latter's prejudice that the jury was told in the matter added by the court that the "improper conduct" essential to justify conviction "must cover a substantial period of time."

[11] Instruction 10 offered by the defendant was rejected by the court. This instruction advised the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the police and various respectable citizens had visited Pope's establishment prior to November 23, 1920, and had not seen any improper, immoral, or indecent conduct during that period, then, if the jury believe that there was improper conduct on the part of persons on the night in question, this was insufficient for conviction; that in order to justify conviction, the improper conduct must be customary, common, or habitual. There was no occasion to give this instruction. The jury had already been instructed with respect to the necessity for common and habitual occurrence to support conviction, and advised as to the meaning of the words "common and habitual occurrence." It was for the jury to determine the value to be attached to the evidence of the police, and of the various respectable citizens who had visited the cabaret of the accused prior to November 23, 1920. If instruction 10 was intended to advise the jury that the fact that officers and citizens, on repeated visits to defendant's establishment, prior to November 23d, had not observed anything improper, indecent, or illegal, was in itself conclusive evidence that improper, immoral, and illegal acts had not taken place during that period, then the instruction was manifestly improper. The lack of value of such negative evidence is illustrated in the instant case. At least two police officers were in Pope's establishment on the night of the 23d, and while there saw "nothing out of the way in the conduct of anybody," or "anything like what they (i. e., the witnesses for the state) testified to." Nevertheless, it is conclusively shown that on this very night disgusting and revolting acts to the prejudice of good morals took place, and that ardent spirits were easily procured by the visitors at the door of the dance hall, and within the establishment of the accused.

This case was submitted to a jury under sufficient instructions. They have passed upon the conflict of testimony, such as it is, and reached a conclusion adverse to the accused. There is no reason to interfere with that verdict.

The petition of the plaintiff in error states, referring to the verdict, that—

The "only natural and reasonable inference is that John Pope was convicted, not on the law and the evidence, but in consequence of popular hysteria induced by one of those moral upheavals which periodically occur in nearly every city. The accused in this case is a vicarious sacrifice to the gods of respectability and reform."

This contention, repeated in different terms in other portions of the petition, has caused us to reproduce the evidence in considerable measure, and to discuss it, as well as the questions of law, at no little length, in the effort to ascertain whether in this case there was a miscarriage of justice, as insisted by petitioner. We are satisfied that the jury was sufficiently and correctly instructed as to the law, and that they were justified in their conclusion that the defendant was guilty as charged. The case will be affirmed.

NEY v. HAUN.

1. Carriers ⇐4—Truck driver transporting goods between two cities not a common carrier in transporting goods to third city in one instance.

Truck driver engaged in the transfer business in a certain place under license, but not licensed to engage in such business in another city and not pursuing the business of carrying goods over a route from such other city to a third city, and never having held himself out as undertaking to carry goods for the public generally between them, did not, in undertaking to transport goods between such places in a particular instance, assume the liability of a common carrier.

2. Carriers ⇐4—"Common carrier" defined.

To constitute a person a common carrier of goods in a particular instance the carriage in question must be over a route or within a territory over or within which there has been a general undertaking by the person, a holding of himself out as undertaking to carry goods for the public generally, as a business, over that route or within that territory, which undertaking may be either express or may be implied from conduct by a series of acts by known habitual continuance in such line of business.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Common Carrier.]

Error to Circuit Court, Rockingham County.

Action by Ferdinand Ney against Joseph H. Haun. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

This is an action of trespass on the case in assumpsit instituted by Ney, the plaintiff in error, as plaintiff in the court below against Haun, the defendant in error, as defendant in the court below, to recover alleged damages to a certain victrola and other articles of furniture, which the defendant undertook for hire to carry for the plaintiff from the city of Harrisonburg, Va., to the city of Washington, D. C., by means of an automobile truck, the furniture being badly broken to pieces en route by the overturning of the truck.

There was a trial by jury, and a verdict and judgment for the defendant.

The evidence is conflicting on the subject of whether the accident was caused by the negligence of the defendant, and there was testimony to the effect that the accident was not caused by any negligence of the defendant; so that upon that issue the verdict could not be disturbed by the court.

The plaintiff, however, contended before the trial court, and urges before us, that the defendant was a common carrier with respect to the undertaking of carriage in question, and was therefore liable as an insurer, under the doctrine, applicable at common law, fixing the liability of a common carrier in such case. And upon that subject the plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury, as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe the said defendant, Haun, contracted with the said plaintiff, Ney, to transport his furniture from Harrisonburg, Va., to the city of Washington, and that the said property was injured or destroyed while in the possession of the said Haun, through no fault on the part of said Ney, then the jury must find for the plaintiff such damages as from all the evidence in the case they may believe him entitled to."

The court refused to give such instruction. That action of the court is by the plaintiff assigned as error.

The evidence in the case bearing on the question of whether the defendant was a common carrier with respect to the undertaking of carriage involved is uncontroverted, and is as follows:

The defendant testified:

"That he was a licensed transfer man under the laws of Virginia with his place of business at Bridgewater, Rockingham county; that he had no license to do business in the city of Harrisonburg; that on a former occasion he had hauled a load of potatoes to Washington for a brother of the plaintiff, and that was the only time he ever hauled to Washington until he took the plaintiff's furniture."

In regard to the undertaking of carriage involved in the instant case, the defendant testified:

"That he was called (by the plaintiff by telephone) from Bridgewater to Harrisonburg for the purpose of contracting for the hauling of the load of furniture from Harrisonburg to the city of Washington, and that he (the defendant) agreed to haul the same for the sum of $45."

Chas. A. Hammer, of Harrisonburg, for plaintiff in error.

H. W. Wyant, of Harrisonburg, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The sole question presented for our decision in the instant case is the following:

Was the defendant, Haun, although a common carrier of goods in Bridgewater, such carrier from Harrisonburg to Washington, at the time of the undertaking of carriage involved in this action?

[1] This question must be answered in the negative.

It appears from the uncontroverted evidence in the case that the carriage of goods by the defendant from Harrisonburg to Washington was not the habitual business of the defendant, but a casual undertaking merely. He did not pursue the business of carrying goods over that route as a public employment. He had never held himself out as undertaking to carry goods for the public generally between those places.

[2] By the great weight of authority one of the essential requisites to constitute a person a common carrier of goods in a particular instance is that the carriage in question must be over a route or within a territory over or within which there has been a general undertaking by the person, a holding of himself out as undertaking, to carry goods for the public generally, as a business, over that route or within that territory. Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) §§ 47, 48, 49, 60; 1 Michie on Carriers, §§ 1 and 2; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 251-253; 10 C. J. p. 41; and authorities cited by these text-books, too numerous to be cited here. The dominant and controlling factor, which is the test of the nature of the employment and which fixes the carriage as that of a common carrier, is the public profession, the public undertaking, and that undertaking fixes also both the character of the articles undertaken to be carried and the extent of the territory covered by the business. It is true that the undertaking need not be express. It may be implied from conduct. But, if the undertaking is to be implied from conduct, it must be evidenced, as said in Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349, at page 354, 46 Am. Dec. 393, "by a series of acts, by his known habitual continuance in this line of business."

As said in Hutchinson on Carriers, supra, § 60:

*"Must Undertake to Carry by Customary * * * Route.*—Common carriers * * * undertake to carry * * * only * * * over the route to which their business is confined. Thus common carriers * * * cannot be required to carry * * * by a route to which his business does not extend. And even if a carrier should in a particular instance undertake by a special contract to carry goods by unusual and exceptional * * * routes, his liability would be based upon his contract, and not by the ordinary rules governing common carriers."

(This is, of course, not applicable in cases where the common-law rule has been changed by statute; but there is no such statute bearing upon the case before us.)

As said, however, by the same authority last cited in another place (§ 49):

"What circumstances will be sufficient to invest the employment of the carrier in particular cases with the character of a public one, and what profession or course of dealing on his part will be considered as enough to constitute him a common carrier, instead of a private carrier for hire, is, however, sometimes a question of no little difficulty, and has given rise to a considerable diversity of opinion and controversy. The criterion by which it is to be determined whether he belongs to the one class or the other is generally considered to be whether he has held himself out or has advertised himself in his dealings or course of business with the public as being ready and willing, for hire, to carry perishable classes of goods for all those who may desire the transportation of such goods between places which he professes in this manner his readiness and willingness to carry. If he has done so, he is of course to be regarded as a common carrier; but, if not, he will be treated as a private carrier for hire." (Italics supplied.)

As shown by this authority, such is the rule in England and in a large majority of the American courts. To the same effect, see Carleton v. Boudar, 118 Va. 521, 525-527, 88 S. E. 174, 4 A. L. R. 1480.

The text-book last cited thereupon proceeds, in sections 50, 51, 52, and 53 and notes, with a review of the minority holding of certain cases in Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and New Hampshire, which is referred to as the Pennsylvania rule, and which denies the necessity for any public profession or undertaking in order to impose upon the carrier the character and consequent liability of a common carrier, and which holds that one who has never assumed the character of a public carrier, whose contract to carry may be confined to one particular instance, or pro hac vice, as it is termed, may assume thereby all the responsibilities of a common carrier, if he has occasionally accepted the goods of others for transportation for hire. These holdings are not considered sound by the learned author of the text-book last cited, and we concur in that view. In the leading case of Fish v. Chapman, supra, 2 Ga. at page 355, there is also a disapproval of the Pennsylvania rule, where it is said that there can be little doubt that that holding "is opposed to the principles of the common law and its rule wholly inexpedient"—citing numerous authorities.

The case of Farley v. Lavary, 107 Ky. 523, 54 S. W. 840, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1252, 47 L. R. A. 383, among the authorities relied on for the plaintiff, does not rest upon the Pennsylvania rule. It is, however, peculiar in its facts. In that case the inception of the carriage was within the city, the corporate limits of which were the territorial limits of the usual business of the carrier; almost the whole route of the carriage was within such limits; but the contract of carriage and the carriage involved in that action in fact extended somewhat beyond the limits of the city. The question was whether the carrier was acting as a common carrier and liable as such while carrying the goods outside of the city limits. The court on the single authority of Ireland v. Mobile, etc., R. Co., 105 Ky. 400, 49 S. W. 188, 453, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1586, 1589, applied the doctrine there laid down as applicable to railroad companies, and held that the contract was made by the carrier in his capacity of a common carrier and was in effect a contract to carry for the whole distance in the capacity of a common carrier. We feel that we are not called upon to approve or to disapprove of the holding in that case, as its facts are entirely dissimilar to those of the case before us.

In conclusion we will say that, while we have no disposition whatever to relax the established rules with respect to what undertaking, express or implied, constitutes a common carrier, nor to relieve common carriers from any of the duties or responsibilities imposed upon them by law, we have no disposition to extend those rules so as to embrace within them those who, according to the majority view of the courts on the subject, are not common carriers.

The case will be Affirmed.

(131 Va. 576)

TALBOTT v. SOUTHERN SEMINARY, Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Innkeepers §13—"Ordinary" and "boarding house," within lien statute, distinguished.

In the statutes from which Code 1919, § 6444, was taken, giving a lien to the proprietor of an inn, ordinary, or boarding house, the term "ordinary" means a public house where food and lodging were furnished to the traveler and his beast, at fixed rates, open to whoever might apply for accommodation, and where intoxicating liquor was sold at retail; while "boarding house" was a place of private entertainment, where special contracts were usually made.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Boarding House; Ordinary.]

2. Innkeepers §13—"Boarding house" and "house of private entertainment" in lien statute are synonymous.

Within Code 1919, § 6444, giving the keeper of an inn, boarding house, or house of private entertainment, which as originally enacted and as last amended before codification had no comma between "boarding house" and "house of private entertainment," those terms were intended to be synonymous.

3. Innkeepers §13—Boarding school is not "boarding house" within lien statute.

A corporation authorized to conduct a boarding school is not the keeper of a boarding house within Code 1919, § 6444, giving the keeper of a boarding house a lien on the property of guests therein, so that such school cannot claim a lien upon the trunks of students therein.

Error to Corporation Court of Buena Vista.

Action in detinue by A. L. Talbott against the Southern Seminary, Inc. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

H. S. Rucker, of Buena Vista, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. Dabney Smith, of Buena Vista, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. A. L. Talbott entered his two daughters as students in the Southern Seminary, Incorporated, and a few days thereafter withdrew them. The seminary seized the trunks of the two girls and refused to deliver them to their father, who was the owner thereof. Thereupon Talbott sued out a warrant in detinue for the trunks and their contents before a justice of the peace, which, upon application of the defendant, was removed to the corporation court of the city of Buena Vista for the trial. At the trial before a jury in that court, there was a verdict and judgment for the defendant. The case is brought here upon a writ of error to that judgment awarded to the plaintiff.

The defendant claimed a lien on the trunks and contents by virtue of section 6444 of the Code, and the trial court instructed the jury in accordance with that view. Whether that section is applicable to the facts of this case is the crucial question and the only one we need decide, although others were discussed.

The "Southern Seminary, Incorporated," as its name imports, is an incorporated institution, and, by the terms of its charter, "The purposes for which it is formed are to conduct a private school for girls and young women." As "subsidiary purposes," it is allowed to deal in real or personal property, to make contracts, to issue bonds, to deal in its own stock and that of other companies, to declare dividends, "and to exercise other powers incident to the carrying out of the purposes of this charter of incorporation not inconsistent with the laws of the state of Virginia." These are all of its enumerated powers, and we may assume, for the purposes of this case, that these powers embraced the power to conduct a boarding school.

Section 6444 of the Code is as follows:

"Every innkeeper, keeper of a boarding house, or house of private entertainment, shall have a lien upon and may retain possession of, the baggage and other property of his guest or boarder brought upon his premises, and also upon the property of an employer of such guest or boarder, controlled and brought upon said premises by such guest or boarder in the course of his employment, for the proper charges due from such guest for his board and lodging."

[1, 2] When this statute was enacted in 1879 (Acts 1878-79, p. 76), a lien was given to "the keeper of any ordinary, house of private entertainment or boarding house." There was no comma after the words "private entertainment." This statute was carried into the Code of 1887 as section 2489, and there was some change in the phraseology and punctuation. In that section a lien is given to "every innkeeper, keeper of an ordinary, boarding house, and house of private entertainment." Prior to that time no distinction had been made in the statute between an innkeeper and the keeper of an ordinary. Section 2489 was amended in 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 250). In the amendment a lien is given to "every innkeeper, keeper of an ordinary, boarding house or house of private entertainment." This act restores the punctuation of the act of 1879, apparently making "boarding house" and "house of private entertainment" synonymous. For many years prior to the first enactment, the term "ordinary" had a well-defined meaning in this state. It was used to designate a public house where food and lodging were furnished to the traveler and his beast, at fixed rates, open to whoever might apply for accommodation, and where intoxicating liquor was sold by retail. It was a house of public entertainment and a common designation of it was a "tavern." As it was liable to abuse its privileges, its conduct was controlled by law, and the county courts met annually to fix "tavern rates." For example, prices were fixed for lodging under different conditions. A striking illustration of this is the price of "lodging with clean sheets." The prices of the different kinds of drinks were also fixed, as for instance, "the price of whisky or brandy with loaf sugar," and other things that we now look back upon with curiosity. In contrast with this house of public entertainment, usually designated a tavern or hotel, there was also what was known as a boarding house, which was a place of private entertainment, where special contracts were usually made for a definite time, and the two terms "boarding house" and "private entertainment" were often used interchangeably to mean the same thing. Hence we find both in the acts of 1879 and of 1906 the term "boarding house or house of private entertainment" without any punctuation, showing that they meant the same kind of house. Under the term "boarding house," Black, in his Law Dictionary, says:

"A boarding house is not in common parlance, or any legal meaning either, a private house where one or more boarders are kept occasionally only and upon special considerations, but it is a quasi public house where boarders are generally and habitually kept, and which is held out and known as a place of entertainment of that kind. Cady v. McDowell, 1 Lans. (N. Y.) 486.

"A boarding house is not an inn, the distinction being that a boarder is received into a house by a voluntary contract, whereas an innkeeper, in the absence of any reasonable or lawful excuse, is bound to receive a guest when he presents himself. 2 El. & Bl. 144.

"The distinction between a boarding house and an inn is that in a boarding house the guest is under an expressed contract, at a certain rate for a certain period, while in an inn there is no express agreement; the guest being on his way, is entertained from day to day according to his business, upon an implied contract. Willard v. Reinhardt, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 148."

[3] The term "boarding house" also embraces the idea that the boarder is free to come and go as he pleases, at all reasonable hours, and the landlord has no control over his movements. If a visitor to Lexington were seeking a "boarding house" for his temporary sojourn, it would never occur to any one to suggest the Virginia Military Institute as a boarding house. It is a boarding school where the cadet is subject to control and gets his food and lodging, but it is not a "boarding house."

Ordinary words used in a statute must be given the usual, ordinary, and common meaning unless a different intent is in some way manifested. In order to apply section 6444 to the Southern Seminary, we should have to read into it the words "boarding school," or else hold that "boarding house" embraces boarding schools, and this we cannot do. A boarding school is not a "boarding house" within the meaning of the statute, and the trial court erred in so holding.

The verdict of the jury will therefore be set aside, and the judgment thereon of the trial court be reversed, and, in accordance with section 6365 of the Code, an order will be entered in this court that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the trunks in the warrant mentioned, and their contents, and his costs in this court and also in the trial court.

Reversed.

(131 Va. 623)

WITHROW'S EX'X et al. v. PORTER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Ejectment §119(2)—Equitable defense, good in ejectment, may be basis for injunction against enforcement.

Even if a contract of purchase is an equitable defense to ejectment, permitted under Code 1919, §§ 5471, 5472, that fact does not preclude a bill to restrain the enforcement of the judgment in ejectment under the express provision of section 5473.

2. Ejectment §119(2)—Demurrer held not to attack bill for want of equity.

On a bill to restrain enforcement of a judgment in ejectment, a demurrer on the ground that the subject-matter in controversy had been settled by a judgment at law is not sufficient to put complainant on notice that defendants intended to claim that the bill did not state equities which ought to prevail over defendant's regular title under the judgment in ejectment.

3. Ejectment \S 119(2)—Bill held to state grounds for restraining enforcement of ejectment judgment.

A bill, alleging that complainant had a contract for the purchase of the property involved in ejectment, and that a receipt defeating his rights under the contract was obtained from him by fraud, states sufficient equity to entitle complainant to an injunction restraining enforcement of the judgment in ejectment.

4. Equity \S 263—Demurrer to answer held sufficient as motion to strike.

In a suit in equity a so-called demurrer to the answer, which stated reasons why the answer was insufficient and prayed that it be dismissed and stricken from the record, was a substantial compliance with Code 1919, \S 6123, abolishing exception to answers for insufficiency and substituting therefor a motion to strike out.

5. Appeal and error \S 1040(2)—Filing demurrer, instead of motion to strike answer, held harmless.

Though it is not good practice to demur to the answer to a bill in equity, and the language of a so-called demurrer to the answer was not in compliance with Code 1919, \S 6123, the action of the court in rejecting the answer would be harmless if no opposition was made to the form of the procedure and the answer was insufficient.

6. Equity \S 263—Answer filed by leave cannot be stricken as too late.

An answer to a bill in equity, filed after the expiration of time permitted by Code 1919, \S 6122, cannot be stricken because filed too late, where it was filed with express leave of the court.

7. Vendor and purchaser \S 82—Agreement, changing contract from sale to rental, held valid.

Where a contract for the sale of house and lot on installments expressly provided that if the purchaser defaulted in paying the installments the payments already made should be treated as payment of rent at a vested sum per month, a subsequent agreement, indorsed on the back of the contract and acknowledged by the purchaser, that the payments be accepted as rent, and that the vendor be released from his obligation on the contract, is a valid transformation of the contract from one of purchase to one of rent, which is supported by the original consideration for the contract, and bars the purchaser's right to performance of the contract on completion of the payments, unless his subsequent agreement was obtained by fraud.

Error to Circuit Court, Rockbridge County.

Suit in equity by Ben Porter against J. M. Withrow and others, subsequently revived against J. M. Withrow's executrix. Decree for complainant, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Wallace Ruff, of Lexington, and Curry & Curry, of Staunton, for plaintiffs in error.

Hugh A. White, of Staunton, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This is a suit in equity, originally brought by Ben Porter against J. M. Withrow and others, and subsequently revived against Withrow's executrix, the purpose of which was to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment in ejectment theretofore obtained by Withrow against Porter for a certain house and lot, and to obtain a decree for the specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale thereof by Withrow to Porter. The relief prayed for was granted by the circuit court.

The bill was filed in July, 1919. A satisfactory disposition of the controversy before us will necessitate a somewhat full statement of the principal allegations made by the complainant, which in substance were as follows:

That on the 27th day of August, 1912, the complainant, Ben Porter, entered into a written contract with J. M. Withrow, whereby the latter agreed to sell to the former a certain house and lot situated in the town of Lexington, an unsigned copy of the contract being exhibited and filed with the bill as a part thereof;

That complainant cannot read and write, but believes that Withrow signed a duplicate copy of the contract and kept the same in his possession;

That complainant was to pay $750 for the property, of which $50 was to be paid in cash and the balance in payments of $10 per month, the deferred payments to bear interest;

That the complainant complied with his contract literally for a long time after it was made, but later for various reasons sometimes omitted the payments when due, but that such omissions were fully understood and acquiesced in by Withrow;

That the last payment was on May 2, 1917, at which time Withrow made no claim that there had been any forfeiture of complainant's contract;

That during a large part of the time since the date of the contract Withrow was drunk or incapacitated by a drug habit, and not in a condition to receive money or transact business, and during a part of that time was in an asylum with no committee or other person to whom payments could be made;

That some time prior to July 2, 1917, Withrow employed counsel, and thereupon claimed that complainant had forfeited his rights as a purchaser;

That the complainant also employed counsel, and was advised not to sign any papers without the latter's advice;

That on July 2, 1917, Withrow offered complainant a paper or receipt, copy whereof was exhibited and filed with the bill and made a part thereof, which the complainant thought was for a part payment on the house and lot, but that the words and conduct of Withrow in connection therewith led the complainant to suspect an attempt to deceive him.

That complainant took this paper to his attorney, was advised that it represented a claim on Withrow's part that complainant had forfeited his purchase and was renting the property, and that he was also advised not to make any further payment unless it was received and accepted as a part of the purchase money;

That complainant has made no further payment, although he has been ready, willing, and anxious to pay the balance in full and complete his purchase;

That since complainant took possession of the property he has paid $380 or more on the contract, and has, with the knowledge of Withrow, permanently improved the property to the extent of $103, and has also paid all the taxes thereon except for the year 1918, and would have paid them for that year if he had not found on going to the treasurer's office to make the payment that Withrow had already paid the same;

That on July 14, 1917, Withrow executed a deed of trust on the property mentioned to secure the payment of $1,000 to the Rockbridge Building & Loan Association, the deed of trust embracing other property abundantly sufficient to secure the debt, and complainant avers that Withrow, knowing he had no right to claim a forfeiture of the contract with complainant, placed this deed of trust on the property that he might thereby defraud and defeat complainant by placing the property in the hands of an innocent purchaser; but that neither the trustee in the deed of trust, B. P. Ainsworth, nor the beneficiary, Building & Loan Association, are innocent purchasers, as Ainsworth, trustee, was of counsel for Withrow and was fully cognizant of complainant's rights;

That in October, 1918, Withrow, together with Ainsworth, trustee, instituted an action of ejectment against complainant to recover the property, "and this for the purpose of carrying out his intentions when he made the said deed of trust," and that in said action complainant "under the rules of law pertaining to an action of ejectment was prevented and not allowed to make his equitable defense as hereinbefore set forth, and judgment was rendered against him" in May, 1919;

That after the said judgment in ejectment was rendered, Withrow, through his counsel, stated that all he wanted was his money with interest, and complainant through his counsel offered to pay Withrow all that was due him under the contract, requesting a statement of what was due, and that a statement was rendered which complainant found to be unjust and incorrect, and that Withrow refused to accept settlement upon a correct and legal calculation of the amount of principal and interest due.

The prayer of the bill was that the said Withrow, Ainsworth, trustee, and the Building & Loan Association be made parties defendant; that the execution of the judgment in ejectment be enjoined and restrained until complainant's rights could be determined; that complainant be permitted to complete his payments for the property purchased as set out in the bill; that the balance which he owed thereon to Withrow be treated as a mere lien against the property; that a full accounting of what he owed Withrow be had; and for general relief.

The contract of August 27, 1912, referred to in the bill was as follows:

"Contract, made this the 27th day of August, 1912, by which J. M. Withrow agrees to sell to Ben Porter that certain house and lot situated on the north side of Randolph street in the town of Lexington, Va., and fronting 36 ft. 4 in. on said street and extending back 79 ft. 8 in. to a buggy shed, it being the same property which was conveyed to the said J. M. Withrow by deed from Mrs. Lucy M. Haughwaut of date June 15, 1906, and recorded in Deed Book No. 98 at page 411 in Rockbridge county clerk's office, to which deed reference is hereby made for a more accurate description of this property for the consideration of seven hundred and fifty ($750.00) of which fifty dollars ($50.00) has been paid in cash, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the balance is to be paid in payments of $10.00 or more per month until the purchase price with interest at 6% per year shall have been paid in full, together with any taxes, insurance, or other costs that may have been advanced by said Withrow.

"Said Porter is to keep the taxes paid up on this property, and also keep the property insured, for the benefit of the said Withrow, both of which shall be prorated as of this date.

"On the completion of the payments as called for under this contract said Withrow guarantees to give a good and sufficient deed of general warranty to said property.

"In case of the failure of said Porter to make the payments of at least $10.00 per month then this contract shall become null and void as to the contract of sale, and whatever shall have been paid by said Porter shall be regarded as rent at $6.00 per month."

The paper or receipt of July 2, 1917, referred to in the bill, is as follows:

"Lexington, Va., July 2, 1917.

"Received of Ben Porter in full to January 1, 1918, on house that he now occupies on Randolph street. On January 1, 1918, I agree that, at my option, I will give him $36.00 cash or a receipt in full for rent on this house to July 1, 1918."

A preliminary injunction against the execution of the judgment was awarded which was never afterwards specifically enlarged or perpetuated, but such proceedings were had in the cause as that a final decree was entered in favor of Porter, whereby he was given the right to pay the balance of principal and interest on the purchase money as originally agreed upon, and upon making such payment to have a deed for the property. From that decree this appeal was allowed.

There was a demurrer to the bill which the court overruled, and this action is the basis of the first assignment of error.

The grounds of the demurrer were stated in writing, and were two in number. It is conceded by counsel for appellants that the second ground was not good, and that the validity of the demurrer depends upon the first ground, which was as follows:

"The subject-matter in controversy was heretofore settled by judgment of the circuit court of Rockbridge county pronounced on the — day of May, 1919, in an action of ejectment under the style of J. M. Withrow v. Ben Porter."

[1] This ground of demurrer was clearly unsound. There is a good deal of discussion in the briefs as to whether the bill alleged such a contract as would have entitled Porter under section 5471 of the Code to set it up as an equitable defense to the action of ejectment. The discussion seems immaterial. The bill alleges that the equitable defense as therein developed was in fact not made in the action at law. Whether it was attempted or not is unimportant. If it was not one of the two equitable defenses which under sections 5471 and 5472 of the Code may be set up in an action of ejectment, then, of course, any offer of it would have been futile, and the complainant's only remedy would have been in equity. If it was such a defense, then under the express terms of section 5473 of the Code it is provided that whether a defendant in ejectment "shall or shall not . . . attempt such defense, he shall not be precluded from resorting to equity for any relief to which he would have been entitled" if sections 5471 and 5472 had not been enacted.

[2, 3] Counsel for appellants concede that they are restricted upon the demurrer to the ground thereof above quoted, and admit that this places them upon "a narrow neck of land," but they contend that the language of that ground of demurrer is sufficient to put the complainant on notice that the defendants intended to claim that the bill did not state equities that ought to prevail over the defendant's legal title under the judgment in ejectment. We are unable, however, to accept this view without giving to the language used an unnatural and strained construction. Furthermore, if we could sustain that view, we think that the bill itself substantially stated grounds upon which, if proved, the plaintiff would be entitled to a specific execution of the contract of sale. If there were nothing else in the case except the contract and receipt exhibited with the bill, and if the receipt was given to and accepted by Porter as the result of a fraudulent scheme on the part of Withrow to defeat the former of his rights under the contract of purchase, then the receipt ought to be disregarded as evidence, and the mere fact that Porter was in default as to his payments would not have operated as a forfeiture of the contract, and he would have been entitled to a deed upon the payment of the balance of the purchase money with interest. East v. Atkinson, 117 Va. 490, 494, 85 S. E. 468. There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the bill.

The next assignment of error to be considered involves the action of the court in rejecting: First, an original answer and cross-bill; and, second, an amended answer and cross-bill offered and filed by the defendants.

The temporary injunction above mentioned was awarded in vacation on July 22, 1919. No further order was entered, and nothing else appears to have been done in the cause until May 18, 1920, at which time a decree was entered, reciting the death in February, 1920, of J. M. Withrow, directing that the cause as to him should thereafter proceed in the name of his administratrix (subsequently corrected to executrix), admitting Addie L. Withrow, widow and devisee of J. M. Withrow, to come into the case as a party, noting the demurrer to the bill, authorizing the filing of an answer and cross-bill by the defendants, with "demurrer" thereto by complainant, and continuing the case for consideration and further decree in vacation.

The subsequent action upon the demurrer to the bill has been stated and disposed of. The so-called demurrer to the answer and cross-bill referred to in the above recited decree was in writing, and was as follows:

"The plaintiff in this cause comes and excepts and demurs to the answer of the defendants filed in this court and moves that the same be dismissed and stricken out on the following grounds:

"(1) Instead of being an answer, the paper filed purporting to be an answer, sets up entirely new matter as a defense to the bill, which can only be done by a cross-bill.

"(2) The matters set up in defense in said answer, even if properly presented by answer, are not sufficient in law because the answer admits a written contract between the plaintiff and J. M. Withrow, said contract being a sale and purchase of real estate, and the said answer offers nothing to show that said real estate has ever been sold or transferred back from the plaintiff to J. M. Withrow.

"The plaintiff, therefore, prays that the said answer be dismissed and stricken from the record."

[4] No objection was made to the form of this paper, and it may be regarded as a substantial compliance with section 6123 of the Code, abolishing exceptions to answers for insufficiency, and substituting therefor a motion to strike out.

On the 8th of September, 1920, a decree was entered, overruling the demurrer to the bill (as already stated), but sustaining the demurrer and motion to dismiss the answer, with leave, however, to the defendants "to file an amended or additional answer, or take such other proceedings as this may be advised." That decree further adjudicated that the complainant was entitled to have the amount due by him to the estate of J. M. Withrow on the contract of purchase duly fixed and ascertained, and, when so fixed and ascertained and paid, to have a deed for the house and lot, and referred the cause to a commissioner to make up an account showing the balance due.

On November 19, 1920, the defendants filed their petition, praying that they might be allowed to file an amended answer and cross-bill, and on the same day an order was entered, noting that petition and the objections of complainant to the filing of the amended answer and cross-bill.

On May 18, 1921, the plaintiff filed the following paper, called a demurrer to the amended answer and cross-bill, to wit:

"The plaintiff comes and demurs to the amended answer and cross-bill, and for grounds therefor says: (1) It is too late to file such answer and cross-bill. (2) The answer is not sufficient in law, for the same reasons as set up in the original demurrer to the original bill [meaning answer]."

On the 18th of May, 1921, the court entered a decree, which, so far as material here, contains the following recitals and adjudications:

(a) That the cause came on to be heard upon the papers formerly read, upon the first report of the commissioner filed in November, 1920, and exceptions thereto, on the petition and amended answer and cross-bill "filed by leave of court on the 19th of November, 1920"; (b) that the reasons for the delay in the filing of the amended answer and cross-bill are deemed sufficient and "the court doth formally authorize and approve the filing of said amended answer and cross-bill"; (c) that the plaintiff filed a demurrer to the amended answer and cross-bill; (d) that the demurrer to the amended answer and cross-bill is well taken, and is sustained, but with leave to the defendants to take such further proceedings as they may be advised; (e) that the cause is recommitted to the commissioner to restate at the bar of the court the account appearing in his first report; (f) that the commissioner thereupon, in compliance, with the above direction, appeared and submitted a restatement of the account; (g) that the restatement of the account was correct and ratified and confirmed in all respects; (h) and that when the complainant, Ben Porter, shall have paid off the amount as therein fixed, the executrix of J. M. Withrow shall make to Porter a deed with general warranty for the property.

[5, 6] As shown above, the so-called demurrer to the amended answer and cross-bill was in writing. It was, of course, not good practice to demur to the answer, and the language of the decree and the language of the so-called demurrer were not in compliance with section 6123 above cited, but no objection was made to the form of procedure in the lower court, and if the action of the court in rejecting the answer had been correct in result, the error in the form of procedure would be treated as harmless, and would be disregarded in this court. But, dealing with the objections to the answer in this way, if the first objection, which was that the answer was filed too late, meant to invoke the provisions of section 6122 of the Code, which provides that an answer in equity must be filed within six months from the date of the service of process unless after notice to the adverse party, and for good cause shown, additional time be granted by the court, then the point is not good. The second answer, like the first, was filed by leave of court, and as to the second, as appears from the abstract of the decree last referred to, the court expressly held that the reasons for the delay were sufficient, and expressly authorized the filing of the answer.

We come now to the real point in the case: Did the court err in rejecting the first and second answer and cross-bill, and in proceeding to adjudicate the rights of the parties upon the record without regard to such pleadings?

The chief reason assigned by the complainant for the rejection of the original and amended answer and cross-bill was that the matters of defense set up therein were not sufficient in law, because they "admitted a written contract between the plaintiff and J. M. Withrow, said contract being a sale and purchase of real estate, and * * * offer nothing to show that the said real estate has ever been sold or transferred back from the plaintiff to J. M. Withrow."

We need not set out at any length the contents of the original and amended answer and cross-bill. They were much the same in substance, the amended pleading being in the main a mere amplification of the original, and the following are the admissions, denials and averments therein which we deem material on this hearing:

(a) That the defendants admit that Withrow entered into the written contract with Porter as alleged in and filed with the bill; (b) that Porter failed and refused to comply with the terms of the contract; (c) that his failure to make the payments as provided for in the contract was without sufficient justification or excuse, but due solely to his carelessness and indifference, and in no wise to the sickness or incapacity of Withrow to receive the payments; (d) that finally on July 2, 1917, Porter having at that time defaulted in 33 monthly payments, not including the month of July, 1917, and having failed and refused to comply with the contract, and Withrow having become fully convinced that Porter never intended to comply with the same, Withrow had an interview with Porter at the office of Withrow's counsel in Lexington, at which interview the whole situation was gone into fully with Porter and a settlement made with him in which the whole transaction was fully explained, and in which Porter agreed to the settlement which was then made and evidenced in part by the receipt or paper of July 2, 1917, filed with the bill; (e) that on the same day, July 2, 1917, and at the same time, there was indorsed on the back of the original contract of sale held by Withrow the following agreement, signed and acknowledged by Porter:

"Lexington, Va., July 2, 1917.

"Received of J. M. Withrow a receipt for rent in full on house I live in on Randolph St. to January 1, 1918, with an agreement annexed that on that date he pay me $36.00 in cash or give me a receipt in full for rent on the house to July 1, 1918. In receiving this receipt and agreement as I have on this day done, I relinquish and fully release J. M. Withrow from any claim or liability for money paid in connection with the terms of the writing on the reverse side of this paper.

"Ben Porter.

"State of Virginia, County of Rockbridge, to wit:

"I, John L. Campbell, a commissioner in chancery for the circuit court of the county and state aforesaid, do certify that Ben Porter, whose name is signed to the writing above, dated July 2, 1917, has this day, acknowledged the same before me in my county and state aforesaid, the contents and purport of the writing having been fully explained to him.

"Given under my hand this the 2d day of July, 1917. John L. Campbell."

The answer further denies that Porter made any substantial or permanent improvements on the property, and also denies that Porter is unable to read and write, or that he did not fully understand the nature of his agreement of July 2, 1917, but, on the contrary, alleged that he could read and write, and that he signed the agreement last recited in his own handwriting.

It is to be especially noted that the contract indorsed on the back of the original agreement, and alleged to have been signed and acknowledged by Porter, is not in any way referred to in the bill. Its first appearance in this case is in the original answer and cross-bill. In connection with the proffer of this paper the answer denies that Ben Porter could not read and write, avers that he signed the paper in his own handwriting, and that it, as well as the receipt, were fully explained to him.

[7] The two papers taken together constitute a good defense to the bill. The original contract between the parties was clear and explicit, and was one which they could lawfully make. It was to be a sale if Porter kept up and completed all his payments, but, if not, then it was to be a contract of rental at $6 per month. If there had been no alternative provision in the contract whereby it was to be converted into a rental contract, or even with such provision, the mere failure to promptly pay the installments of purchase money would not have operated as a forfeiture, and under ordinary circumstances the complainant could have entitled himself to a deed by paying the balance of the principal and interest. East v. Atkinson, supra. But the receipt and contract of July 2, 1917, construed together, could only have meant that the parties recognized the termination of the sale feature of the contract and its conversion into a rental. The agreement which Porter signed and acknowledged on the last-mentioned date says:

"In receiving this receipt and agreement as I have this day done, I relinquish and fully release J. M. Withrow from any claim or liability for money paid in connection with the terms of the writing on the reverse side of this paper."

This language may not have been happily chosen, and might have been more explicit, but it could hardly have meant anything other than that Porter was giving up his right to purchase the property. The only obligation which Withrow could possibly have been under to him "for money paid in connection with the terms of the writing on the reverse side" was an obligation to convey the property to Porter, and it was this obligation which Porter by the language used there must be held to have released.

The learned counsel for the appellee says in his brief:

"The only issue raised by the bill and answer is as to whether the two writings constitute an abandonment of the contract by the appellee. If appellant relies upon these papers, as he says he does, then he must stand or fall on these papers."

In this latter statement we concur, but we are further of opinion that these papers set up a complete defense to the bill, and must prevail unless they are tainted with fraud.

It is not necessary for the appellees to claim that there had been a completed forfeiture of the contract of sale, and we do not understand them to rely thereon. The contract was in the alternative, and was to be either a sale or a lease under certain conditions therein stipulated. Whether there had been a forfeiture or not of the sale feature, complainant, according to the answer and cross-bill, was inexcusably in default in his payments, and upon a settlement he and Withrow put into effect the lease feature, and did so in writing. No new consideration was required for this arrangement. It was provided for in the original contract between the parties, and was a part thereof.

It follows from what has been said that the court erred in rejecting and striking out the original and amended answers and cross-bills.

The other errors need not be considered. If the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for specific performance of the contract of sale, that right must be established by setting aside the writing which he signed and acknowledged on July 2, 1917, and this can only be done upon proof that the same was obtained by fraud.

This court will enter an order reversing the decree of the lower court in striking out the answers and cross-bills, and remanding the cause for further proceedings. When it goes back, unless the complainant can show that the papers of July 2, 1917, were executed as the result of fraud on the part of Withrow, then the bill should be dismissed. If, on the other hand, such fraud be shown, then a decree should go in favor of the complainant, providing for a deed substantially upon the terms set forth in the decree of May 18, 1921.

Reversed.

(131 Va. 817)

COMMONWEALTH v. THOMPSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §134(1)—Apprehension that prisoner cannot have fair trial is insufficient to require change of venue.

A mere apprehension by accused that he cannot have a fair trial in the county in which the offense was committed because of prejudice is not sufficient to support a motion for change of venue, but he must establish by independent and disinterested testimony facts which make it probable that his fears are well founded.

2. Criminal law §134(1)—Public attitude requiring change of venue must be that at time of trial.

Testimony in support of a motion for change of venue because of prejudice which would prevent a fair trial must establish the condition in the public mind at the time of trial.

3. Criminal law §121—Court has wide discretion over motion for change of venue for prejudice.

In ruling on a motion under Code 1919, § 4914, for change of venue because of local prejudice, which would prevent a fair trial, the trial court has a wide discretion.

4. Criminal law §134(1)—Proof held not to show abuse of discretion in denying change of venue.

Proof that, after accused was arrested at the time of the homicide, the officers were prevented by mobs from removing him to another place, and that he was struck by members of the mob, and subsequently made his escape, but that at the time there was no attempt to lynch him, and that more than two months since had elapsed, during which time no demonstration had been made against him, though part of the time he was in jail within the county, held not to show abuse of discretion in denying change of venue because of local prejudice.

5. Criminal law §151—Application for continuance is addressed to court's discretion.

A motion for continuance in criminal case is addressed to the sound discretion of the court under all circumstances of the case, and the court's decision will not be reversed unless plainly erroneous.

6. Criminal law §603(2)—Denial of continuance at term of indictment held not abuse of discretion.

The denial of continuance on oral application made the day after indictment was not an abuse of discretion where the application did not show how long counsel represented accused, nor show the impossibility of procuring testimony in behalf of accused, especially in view of Const. 1902, § 8, guaranteeing a speedy trial, and Code 1919, § 4893, enacted to secure such trial.

7. Criminal law §24—Homicide §22(2), 146—Any willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing is "first degree murder" and malice implied therefrom; intent presumed from unlawful act.

Any willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing is "murder in the first degree," and the law infers malice from such a killing, and holds that a man intends that which he does, or which is the immediate or necessary consequence of his act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases; First and Second Series, Murder in First Degree.]

8. Homicide §22(3)—Premeditation does not require existence of intent for definite time.

To constitute murder in the first degree it is not necessary that intent to kill shall exist for any particular length of time, but is only necessary that such intent should come into existence at the time of the killing or at any previous time.

9. Homicide §286(3)—Instruction on deliberation and premeditation held not improper.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the court gave the usual approved instruction that the infliction of mortal wound with a deadly weapon is prima facie willful, deliberate, and premeditated murder, omitting therefrom their usual conclusion that it throws on the prisoner the necessity of showing extenuating circumstances, was not improper, since the expression prima facie shows it was susceptible of rebuttal, which could only come from accused.

Error to Circuit Court, Botetourt County.

Edmond Thompson was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Willis, Adams & Hunter, of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error.

SAUNDERS, J. In this case the accused was convicted of murder in the first degree in the circuit court of Botetourt county, on an indictment charging him with the murder of one William Peck Austin, and sentenced to be electrocuted on May 6th of the same year. To this judgment a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court. From the evidence in the case, giving credence to the testimony for the commonwealth, the material and pertinent facts are as follows:

The homicide occurred in the early part of the night of December 18, 1920, in the public road or street, before Bolton's store in the town of Fincastle. A gathering of white and colored boys, engaged in throwing firecrackers, were grouped in front of the store. Thompson had had no trouble with any of the boys present, and according to his own statement entertained no feeling of ill will against any of them. The defendant came to Bolton's store twice that evening. His first visit was to inquire about an axe. After leaving he returned in 5 or 10 minutes, again going into Bolton's store for some purpose not indicated. After staying in the store "for a right good little while," as stated by one of the witnesses, he came out and stood around with the boys, who were firing pop crackers. There was some bickering, or fussing between some of the white and colored boys, and Peck Austin, the boy who was killed, had taken a rock, or some rocks, from a colored boy named Otey. The boys were all standing in the street talking. The defendant Thompson walked across the street to a tree, and then moved to another tree of a diameter somewhat larger than a man's waist, and about 30 feet high. While he was standing under this tree, Peck Austin threw a pop cracker about 2 inches long into the tree. According to one of the witnesses for the state, this cracker exploded in the branches of the tree about 5 feet above the head of Thompson. Another witness states that the cracker exploded above the top of the tree. As soon as the squib exploded, the defendant stepped behind the tree, and using a 38 Smith and Wesson pistol, commenced to shoot in the direction of the boys gathered at Bolton's store. He fired four or five times, wounding four boys, Jim Bayne, Roy Gee,

Ray Young, and Peck Austin, the latter fatally. There was no shooting by any person save the defendant, and no provocation other than the squib thrown into the tree under which he was standing. Thompson promptly fled from the place of shooting, and later was arrested at his father's house. His captors started with him for the city of Roanoke, evading one crowd which sought to intercept them. Further on they were stopped by another crowd, and forcibly compelled to return to Fincastle, the county seat of Botetourt county. They were met in the town by a crowd of angry and excited men. Some of them struck at the prisoner, or struck him. The officer started to jail with his prisoner. While on his way a shot was fired at the latter, and in the confusion the prisoner escaped. A few days later Thompson was shot and captured by a posse, and taken to Roanoke for medical treatment. He was badly wounded, and his feet were frostbitten, the result of exposure in his efforts to escape. After examination in the hospital at Roanoke, the accused was taken to jail in that city, remaining there until about the middle of February, 1921, when he was returned to Fincastle for indictment and trial. Upon this trial he was convicted of murder in the first degree. There was complete unanimity among the witnesses for the state that no violence was offered to the defendant, or provocation given prior to the shooting, save the firing of a single squib in the tree over his head. Thompson states that some one said, "Let us catch him and run him out of town," but does not claim that any action was taken by the crowd to the above effect. The following questions and answers are taken from the cross-examination of the prisoner:

"* * * Now, you tell the court and this jury that until the time that somebody said 'Let us catch him and run him out of town,' no remark had been made to you by anybody up to that time?

"A. Up until when?

"Q. Until somebody said, 'Let us run him out of town'?

"A. Not any remark to me.

"Q. And absolutely nothing in the world had happened between you and this crowd of white boys up to the time of the shooting?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. And yet one of the white boys hollered, 'Let's run him out of town,' and two or three squibs popped near you, and you took out your gun, and fired immediately into this crowd of white boys?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. So all the justification in the world that you claim for firing these shots into this crowd of white boys was the remark that somebody made, 'Let's run him out of town,' and the popping of two or three firecrackers. That is the only justification you tell this jury you had for firing into this crowd?

"A. That was the only thing I had reference to.

"Q. And that was the only thing that made you shoot, was it?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I believe you told Mr. Willis that you shot because you were scared?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you have to shoot five times because you were scared?

"A. Really I don't know how many times I shot.

"Q. And you tell the jury you shot to scare them, when you were 30 feet away from the boys, and they were not coming near you at all?

"A. One of the boys were coming near me.

"Q. Who was he?

"A. One of them that was in here.

"Q. Which one?

"A. I don't know them by name.

"Q. One of these boys that testified?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Which was it; a good sized boy?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What color of his eyes and hair?

"A. I don't know.

"Q. How far was he from you when you shot?

"A. About as far as from here to that door.

"Q. About 15 feet?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. So, in order to scare him, you shot four or five times into a crowd of white boys?

"A. Yes, sir."

The defendant stated that he "got behind the tree for protection," thinking that perhaps some one of the boys would shoot at him. When asked why he kept on shooting after he fired the first time, he replied that he was "just scared and kept on pulling the trigger." He stated further that his pistol was outside his father's house, and he got it before the shooting when he came up town. Nothing was said to defendant by the boys before he went into Bolton's store. When he came out of the store, according to his testimony, he went across the street because the boys began to throw these squibs. These squibs, he states were 4 inches long, and three or four were thrown at him, coming in 7 or 8 inches of his head. This was in contradiction of all the other evidence on this point, which was that only one squib was thrown, and that one into the tree over defendant's head. This squib, according to a witness for the state, as stated supra, was 2 inches long. The witness was well aware that he was shooting towards a crowd of boys:

"Q. So you started shooting because you were scared?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you immediately pulled your gun and pointed to Bolton's store, and commenced shooting?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you knew there was a crowd of white boys across the street at Bolton's store?

"A. Yes, sir; right there in my sight.

"Q. And there was quite a crowd of them there?

"A. Yes, sir."

The witness, in response to the question, "Why he didn't run down the street towards the picture show, or Thompson's house, if he was afraid of the boys at Bolton's store," replied that he "didn't think that he had any right to run down the street." He added that he "wasn't aiming to shoot anybody; that he shot towards them, but wasn't aiming to hit none of them; that he was shooting above them."

When arrested by Mr. Godwin and Mr. Caldwell, defendant stated that "he had never done any shooting; that he was at the picture show." Later, when brought back from Roanoke for indictment, he stated to Dr. Breckenridge, and repeated this statement to Mr. Caldwell, that he had not done any shooting; "that he was at home at the time." He explained subsequently that he made these statements "because he was afraid of the mob; that he was scared, and thought the mob was coming up there and get him, that they had made an attempt before."

Defendant identified Tom Jones as the boy who had made the statement about running him out of town. The latter was put on the stand, and denied making the statement, or that he had heard it made. The defendant's testimony as to the remark supra was not corroborated by that of any witness either for him or for the state. The witness Jones also denied that he was approaching the defendant, or was in 15 feet of him. For the state it was proved by Ernest Dillon that before the shooting he heard the accused say: "Just let them throw one on me." This was 10 or 15 minutes before the shooting. The same witness heard the defendant say to Charley Hays, a colored boy, some little while before the pistol was fired, "Go on, and keep quiet," and stated that he (Thompson) was "then trying to smooth things over; keep things quiet." It may be added that, while no one heard the remark about running Thompson out of town, Garfield Brown (colored), a witness for the state, testifies that before the shooting, when most, if not all, of the colored boys were on the other side of the street from Bolton's store, some one in the direction of Bolton's store called out in general terms: "You had better go on down the street." That thereupon Thompson stopped. Witness adds:

"Somebody then threwed a squib over there, and it popped pretty close, and I never seen it, but it sounded like it was close to Edmond's head, but I never seen it."

The shooting immediately followed "towards the boys in front of Bolton's store."

For the purpose of a sufficient understanding of the material features of this case, the foregoing is an adequate abridgment of the testimony submitted to the jury on behalf of the state, and of the prisoner. If there is anything in the case in the way of mitigation, or defense of the prisoner's action, it is contained in the foregoing recitals and excerpts from the record. The defendant in his petition assigns four errors:

First: The court erred in overruling petitioner's motion for a change of venue.

Second: The court erred in overruling petitioner's motion for a continuance.

Third: The court erred in giving instructions which permitted the jury to find a verdict of murder in the first degree.

Fourth: The court specifically erred in giving the following instruction for the commonwealth:

"The court instructs the jury that a mortal wound given with a deadly weapon in the previous possession of the slayer, without any, or upon very slight provocation, is prima facie willful, deliberate, and premeditated murder."

The motion for a change of venue was made on the ground that, by reason of local prejudice and excitement against the prisoner, it would be impossible for him to secure a fair and impartial trial in Botetourt county. This motion was brought before the court by a petition sworn to by the defendant. The petition recited defendant's arrest, the excitement and rage engendered in the town of Fincastle by his act, the first attempt to intercept the officers on their way to Roanoke, the second and successful attempt, the crowd that met prisoner and accompanying officers on their arrival at Fincastle, the shot at the prisoner, the prisoner's escape, and subsequent wounding and arrest, his removal to the city of Roanoke, and lodgment in jail in said city, the unsuccessful effort of his father to employ counsel for his son's defense in Botetourt county, though he was able and willing to pay a fee, or fees, and petitioner's inability on account of the alleged public feeling to secure affidavits in support of his petition. In connection with his petition, and to support the allegations of same, the prisoner put on the stand Shelby Caldwell, the deputy who arrested him, Turner McDowell, the clerk of the circuit court of the county, who assisted in the arrest, and Charles Thompson, father of the defendant. The deputy sheriff testified that after the arrest he and others started to Roanoke with the prisoner to avoid mob violence; that they avoided one crowd armed with pistols who fired a number of shots; that they were intercepted about 8 miles from Fincastle by another armed crowd who compelled them to return to Fincastle after one of the crowd had attempted to shoot the prisoner; that one of the crowd returned with them; that they were met at Fincastle on their return by a crowd of people who gathered around with guns and pistols, but that he did not hear any threats, nor was any demand made on the officers to give up the prisoner, though one or more persons struck him; that he started to jail with prisoner, and on the way some one fired a shot at the prisoner, and in the confusion he escaped, to be later recaptured. On cross-examination witness stated that the prisoner was taken to Roanoke "to find out the extent of his wounds" inflicted at the time of recapture; that he had never seen a mob, or anything resembling a mob, since the night of the shooting, or heard of "anything resembling a mob." Further the witness stated that he thought he was familiar with public sentiment about Fincastle; that in his opinion sentiment was that the prisoner could have a fair and impartial trial in the county; that the prisoner was brought back from Roanoke on February 18, 1921, and had been in jail until March 2, 1921; that there had been no "demonstration of anything resembling a mob" since he had been brought back; that he did not think the then public sentiment towards the prisoner was bitter, or that there was any feeling on the part of the white people towards the colored people. On re-examination witness stated that he had not said that "there was no feeling against the prisoner," and that there had been nothing to allay sentiment against him, but "a little time"; that the prisoner was not brought back sooner from Roanoke because the doctor who was with them said that he could not stand the trip.

The father of the prisoner stated that, late in the night of the shooting, after the arrest and escape of the defendant, a crowd came to his house, and threatened to set fire to the house and burn him up "if he did not come clean"; that he did not know where the accused was, and told the crowd so; that about two weeks after the shooting he endeavored to secure counsel for his son at the Botetourt bar; that they told him that "the feelings that had been caused by this occurrence, and widespread relations with the sons who got wounded—I will be frank with you, Charles, I would rather not serve"; that the attitude of a number of white people had not been as friendly towards him since the shooting as before; that he did not know positively what the public sentiment against the boy was; that the people did not talk to him about it; that he had had a colored man summoned to testify as to alleged statements that he had heard as to what would be done with his son if he was not properly dealt with, and that he declined to go on the stand on the ground that he was afraid.

Turner McDowell, clerk of the county, testified to the arrest of the boy, the firing at the car, and the second crowd at Daleville toll gate which compelled them to return to Fincastle; that he reasoned with the crowd against mob violence, and that at their insistence, accompanied with a display of fire-arms, they returned to Fincastle; that they put the prisoner down at the corner, 75 yards from the jail, as they had promised; that 25 or 50 people were there—he did not know how many; that there was a great deal of excitement, though he did not recall that any one said they would lynch him; that the crowd, when asked, said that “they did not know what they were going to do with the prisoner”; that he came into touch with a lot of people from different portions of the county in consequence of his office; that there was a decided feeling about the case; that he consulted about bringing the prisoner to Fincastle for several weeks before it was done, and it was decided that it was safe; that there was a very decided opinion about the prisoner, and possibly that carried some prejudice; that he knew the general sentiment, and that since the shooting everybody was glad that nothing happened to the man; that there had been no mob since the day of the shooting, and no threats against the prisoner, so far as he knew; that the general sentiment was for the law to take its course. The following is from the examination of this witness:

“By Mr. Willis:

“Q. Mr. McDowell, in regard to prejudice, or other feeling, there is a very intense interest in this county in this trial, is there not?

“A. There is in this section.

“Q. Isn't it true that on yesterday, when the grand jury met, and to-day, that the courtroom is absolutely jammed with people from all over the county?

“A. Yes, sir. This is the third case of this kind in the last three terms of this court, and people from all over the county have been here who were interested in these different cases.”

The state introduced several witnesses to controvert the allegations of the petition for a change of venue. Mr. Woodson, an attorney at Fincastle, testified that he had been approached by the father of the defendant to represent his son, and had declined; that he had many reasons for declining; that the state of local feeling entered into his action; that he did not want to defend prisoner either for compensation or by appointment of the court; that—

“His association for years with the people who were connected with the matter, their relatives and friends, and one of the boys being in his Sunday school class, made him feel that he could not take the case and do the prisoner justice.”

E. M. Stull, a citizen of Botetourt, living at Eagle Rock, 13 miles north of Fincastle, stated that his work put him in touch with the people of Eagle Rock and the country intervening between that place and the courthouse; that so far as he knew there was no feeling of prejudice, or resentment on the part of the public towards the prisoner.

Mr. W. G. Noftsinger, a citizen of Troutville, 7 miles south of Fincastle, stated that he was generally acquainted with the people “around in Fincastle”; that there was no “more prejudice or feeling against defendant than there would be in any other section for the same crime with which he was accused”; that there was no particular prejudice against him; that he had never heard of any threats of violence against him in the Troutville section, and that so far as he knew the sentiment in his section was that they were willing for the law to take its course; that there was a good deal of excitement when the crime was committed.

Mr. Lackland, a member of the board of supervisors, testified that he lived near Buchanan, 10 miles from Fincastle, and had lived in that section all his life; that there was no prejudice or ill will on the part of the public towards the accused, and that there was nothing to indicate that the public was not willing for the law to take its course.

Mr. C. M. Lunsford, a member of the Fincastle bar, stated that he had been approached by Thompson, Sr. in the matter of representing his son; that he had declined; that his wife was in bed at the time, and fatally ill; that she had requested him to have nothing to do with the case, and for that reason he had declined employment; that he did not fear violence if he accepted, and that public sentiment would never prevent him from defending a man.

Dr. W. N. Breckenridge, the mayor of Fincastle, testified that he participated in the rearrest of the boy, and, as the boy had been severely shot; that he took him to Roanoke for an X-ray; that the accused had been badly frostbitten, and he went to see him several times in Roanoke in respect of medical treatment; that he believed when the accused was returned to Fincastle that his little boy could have brought him down and put him in jail; that there had been no demonstration since the night of the shooting; that before the prisoner was rearrested every man concerned agreed that the law should take its course; that two months and a half had elapsed since the shooting took place, and that he had talked practically to every man who had a son in the shooting, and they were all agreed to the above effect; that he thinks the feeling against prisoner existing at the time of the homicide had disappeared; that there was now a general feeling for the law to take its course; that there was no disposition so far as he knew on the part of anybody for any action other than for legal and orderly procedure; that the statement of defendant's father that there was feeling against his son was a mistake. On cross-examination witness stated that there was no “feeling of violence” against accused, but that he “did not think there was any love for him"; that the people were very patient, and wanted the negro tried.

[1, 2] This completed the testimony for and against the motion for a change of venue, and the same was thereupon overruled. This motion in the instant case was not made on the ground of difficulty in obtaining jurors in the county free from exception. Hence various cases cited in the brief for the state are not in point, they having been held in the Uzzle Case, 107 Va. 919, 60 S. E. 52, not to apply to a motion for change of venue based on the ground that the degree of prejudice and excitement existing in a community against a prisoner is such that the fairness and impartiality of a trial conducted in the county concerned is endangered. But the mere apprehension of a prisoner that he cannot secure a fair trial in a county is not sufficient to support a motion for a change of venue. He must establish by "independent and disinterested testimony such facts as make it appear probable, at least, that his fears and belief are well founded." Moreover, the testimony should establish the condition of the public mind at the time of the trial. See Bowles' Case, 103 Va. 816, 48 S. E. 527, and Wormeley's Case, 10 Grat. (51 Va.) 672.

The affidavits in the Bowles Case set out a more striking and impressive situation than that relied upon to support a change of venue in the instant case. These affidavits represented that it was impossible for the prisoner to have a fair and impartial trial in Alleghany county; that he had been carried to Lynchburg jail because it was considered unsafe to carry him through Alleghany county; that on account of this feeling it was considered unsafe to carry him to said county, save under the protection of the military forces of the state; that the judge of the court refused to try him in the presence of the military; that then a public meeting was held to give assurance to the officers that the prisoner could be brought to Covington for trial; that this feeling against the prisoner continued to be so bitter and widespread that predictions were then being made and threats uttered that, if the jury should find the prisoner guilty of less than murder in the first degree, the latter would be lynched before he could be carried from the courthouse to the jail. A change of venue was refused by the trial court, and this action was sustained by this court.

The following is taken from the syllabus in Looney's Case, 78 S. E. 625, 115 Va. 921:

"A motion under" the Code "for a change of venue on the ground of prejudice against accused is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed unless it plainly appears that the discretion has been improperly exercised."

In the case ubi supra the motion for a change of venue was based on the ground that great prejudice and ill will existed against defendant throughout the entire county on account of the homicide, and of numerous other difficulties in which accused had been involved. Moreover, that he had been informed of threats to lynch him in the event of his acquittal. The affidavits of 5 persons were submitted in support of the motion, and of 20 persons in opposition. The trial court overruled the motion, and this action was sustained.

[3] A motion for a change of venue on the ground of prejudice against the accused depends on conditions existing at the time of the trial, and the trial court acting on a motion for change of venue must of necessity be allowed a wide discretion. Looney's Case, 115 Va. 921, 78 S. E. 625.

The motion in question was made under Code, § 4914, which empowers the trial court for good cause shown to order a change of venue on the motion either of the commonwealth, or of the accused.

"To support a motion for a change of venue, the accused must show such facts as will make it appear probable at least that his fears and belief are well founded." Wormeley's Case, 10 Grat. (51 Va.) 658, 672.

See, also, Wright's Case, 114 Va. 872, 77 S. E. 503, to the effect that "facts and circumstances should be established satisfying the court that a fair trial cannot be had."

In Uzzle's Case, supra, this court overruled the trial court, and awarded a change of venue on the following state of facts: The military forces had been sent to the scene of the crime in the first instance. When later the sheriff was sent to Norfolk for the prisoners for trial, a posse was furnished him to protect the accused persons from mob violence, and to preserve public peace. The excited state of feeling continued down to and through the trial of the prisoner. After conviction of the accused, he had to be confined in the jail of another county, pending his efforts to have the judgment of the trial court reversed. Under such circumstances, this court considered that good cause for a change of venue had been shown.

[4] In the instant case it appears that on the night of the shooting the public feeling in the town of Fincastle was at high tension, and at different periods of the night the life of the accused was really in danger on the part of some members of the excited crowds. Still there does not appear to have been any agreed, concerted movement to take defendant's life. The crowd at Daleville that caused the automobile containing the prisoner and accompanying officers to return to Fincastle was armed, and large enough to carry out at that point any generally concerted plan of lynching. The same was true of the still larger and more excited crowd that met the automobile on its arrival in Fincastle. The members of that crowd, acting in concert, could easily have taken the prisoner by force from the deputy sheriff, and executed him. Some such purpose may have existed on the part of individuals in the crowd, but it appears to have been an uncertain, half-formed purpose, so far as the aggregate of the mob was concerned. This appears not only from what actually took place in the course of the sheriff's progress with his prisoner from the automobile to the jail, but from a statement made by some one in the crowd that "they did not know what they were going to do with him" (i. e., the accused). The exciting happenings described in the testimony, supra, occurred over two months before the trial, and followed hard upon the killing of one boy and the wounding of three others. Excitement and angry feeling under such circumstances is readily understood, and it may be said to be almost inevitable. The witnesses who testify as to the feeling existing at the time of the trial are agreed that the general sentiment was that "the law should take its course." The prisoner was taken from Roanoke to the Fincastle jail two weeks before his indictment and trial. The mayor of Fincastle testifies that in his opinion his little son would have been a sufficient guard to insure the prisoner's safe delivery on that occasion. Testimony of witnesses outside of Fincastle is to the effect that no threats of violence have been made against the prisoner, and that there was no evidence of prevailing prejudice or ill will. The correct view of the situation was probably given by Mr. McDowell, when he stated that there was an intense interest in the county in the trial, and that the general sentiment was one of relief that nothing "had happened" to the accused on the night of the homicide.

In view of the precedents cited and of the evidence in the instant case, this court is not prepared to say that the trial court exercised its discretion improperly when it overruled the motion for a change of venue. The assignment of error in this respect is not sustained.

The second assignment is to the action of the trial court overruling the motion for a continuance, which was made by counsel for the prisoner, and is in the following terms:

"We wish to move the court for a continuance of this case. The boy was just indicted on yesterday, and we have had great difficulty in getting the names of the witnesses he has given us to talk to, to get information from them. We had hoped the court would see fit to grant a change of venue. We will say further that the defendant has been unable to tell us much about his case. I have been told that he had a shot in the back of his neck that has affected his speech in some way. He gave us the names of certain witnesses, and they seem to be very reluctant to tell us anything at all."

No evidence was submitted in support of this motion. It does not appear when the prisoner had employed counsel, or for what length of time they had been acting for him prior to the time of the trial. Nor does it appear that—

The "prisoner did not have a fair and impartial trial, that he did not have all persons present as witnesses who knew anything that was favorable to him, or that his counsel did not make as good a defense for him as he could have done if his case had been continued."

[5] "A motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and, whilst an appellate court will supervise the action of the trial court on such motion, it will not reverse unless such action was plainly erroneous." Hite's Case, 96 Va. 493, 31 S. E. 896.

The following is taken from the syllabus in Wright's Case, 114 Va. 872, 77 S. E. 503, as pertinent to the motion under consideration in the case in judgment:

"Where the facts" in a case "were few and simple, and public interests demanded a speedy trial, the overruling of a motion for a continuance and proceeding to trial within 48 hours was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion."

[6] Section 8 of the Constitution provides that a man accused of crime shall have a speedy trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage.

Code, § 4893, was enacted to afford the speedy trial guaranteed by the Constitution. This section provides that, when an indictment is found against a person for felony, the accused, if in custody, or if he appear according to his recognizance, shall, unless good cause be shown for a continuance, be arraigned and tried at the same term.

It is not considered that upon the situation presented the action of the court overruling the motion for a continuance was plainly erroneous.

[7, 8] The third assignment of error is that the court gave instructions which permitted the jury to find a verdict of murder in the first degree. The evidence of the commonwealth justified such instructions. Any willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing is murder in the first degree. The law infers malice from such a killing, and holds that a man must be taken to intend that which he does, or which is the immediate or necessary consequence of his act. Moreover, as frequently stated by this court, it is not necessary that the intent to kill should exist for any particular length of time prior to the actual killing to constitute a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing. It is only necessary that such intent should come into existence at the time of the killing, or at any previous time. Many precedents to the above effect might be cited, but see Horton's Case, 99 Va. 853, 38 S. E. 184.

[9] The fourth assignment of error is to instruction No. 2, given at the instance of the commonwealth. This instruction is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that a mortal wound given with a deadly weapon in the previous possession of the slayer, without any, or upon very slight provocation, is prima facie willful, deliberate, and premeditated murder."

The precise error assigned is that this instruction does not include the following, as a concluding sentence:

"And throws on the prisoner the necessity of showing extenuating circumstances."

This instruction is almost invariably given with the foregoing sentence as a conclusion, and it is not perceived why this was not done in the instant case. Indeed, it may be said that the trial courts are not infrequently at fault in failing to give precisely in their usual form approved instructions that in a measure have become standardized. The omissions that are sometimes made and the additions that are sometimes inserted in such instructions are the fruitful cause of trouble in many instances, and of reversals in others. In the case in judgment, the prisoner was not prejudiced by the omission of the words, "and throws on the prisoner the necessity of showing extenuating circumstances." As given, the instruction correctly propounded the law. When the jury was told that a mortal wound given under the circumstances stated was prima facie willful, deliberate, and premeditated murder, they were apprised that this conclusion or derivation from the evidence for the state, being prima facie, was susceptible of rebuttal. Such rebuttal could come from the prisoner alone, and the burden of affording same rested upon him. The failure to insert the omitted clause does not relieve the state from the necessity of affording any evidence that would be required if it had been inserted, nor does its omission deprive the accused of the opportunity to establish extenuating circumstances.

Plaintiff in error cites the case of State v. Hertzog, 55 W. Va. 74, 46 S. E. 792, as authority for the contention that under the circumstances indicated, supra, it was error to omit the words, "the burden was cast upon the accused of proving extenuating circumstances." But such was not the decision in the Hertzog Case. The real vice of the instruction in that case, and the one upon which the decision of the court rested, was the concluding words, "As they appear from the case made by the state, Grant G. Hertzog is guilty of murder in the first degree." The appellate court held that the instruction told the jury that the accused was guilty of murder in the first degree, and was therefore erroneous. "Fairly construed," said the court, "the instruction has no other meaning." Of course, such an instruction was improper.

The instructions prayed by the accused were given as asked. They fully and fairly presented the defendant's theory of the case, correctly stated the burden upon the state, and called attention to the reasonable doubt to which a defendant is entitled on all material points. Instruction 5 for the accused advised the jury of the humane principle of law that a homicide committed in a sudden heat of passion, upon reasonable provocation, and before time is given for the passions thus excited to cool, is not murder, but voluntary manslaughter.

After a careful scrutiny of the evidence, and mature consideration of the questions of law presented in the instant case, we do not find in this record any errors to the prejudice of the defendant, and the action of the trial court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

COFFMAN'S ADM'R v. COFFMAN et al.

1. Wills §488—Extrinsic evidence admissible in aid of interpretation of ambiguous will.

Extrinsic evidence in aid of the interpretation of wills cannot be used if the will is plain and unambiguous, but where the language is susceptible of more than one interpretation, resort may be had to such evidence, subject to certain limitations.

2. Wills §487(2)—Extrinsic evidence of circumstances concerning testator's property, family relationships, etc., admissible, but not his declarations of intention.

Extrinsic evidence of facts and circumstances concerning testator, his property and family, claimants under the will, and their relation to him, etc., is admissible, in cases of disputed interpretation, to ascertain the meaning of the words as used and understood by testator.

3. Wills §487(3)—Evidence of testator's declarations of intention inadmissible, except to identify persons or things.

Evidence of testator's declarations of intention is inadmissible, except to show which of two or more persons or things equally well described was meant by him.

4. Wills §487(2, 3)—Declarations of intention to exclude collateral kindred held inadmissible, but evidence as to family relationships and attitude toward them admissible.

In a suit involving the construction of a will, where testator's sisters and brother, who were not mentioned, claimed, as heirs, property as to which they claimed he died intestate, testator's declarations as to his intent to exclude them from any share in his estate were inadmissible, but evidence showing his situation, particularly the character and value of his property, his family relationships, and his attitude toward claimants was admissible to determine his probable intent.

5. Wills §706—Exclusion of extrinsic evidence as to testator's attitude toward heirs claiming property alleged to have been undisposed of held not prejudicial.

In a suit involving the construction of a will, where testator's sisters and brother, who were not mentioned, claimed, as heirs, property as to which they claimed he died intestate, exclusion of evidence as to testator's declared purposes and intention was not prejudicial to claimants, whether or not the court intended thereby also to exclude evidence as to testator's situation and attitude toward them, where such evidence went no farther than to show his affection for his wife, the principal beneficiary, the number, names, and situation of his next of kin, the amount and kind of his property, and that owned by the other parties to the litigation.

6. Wills §487(2)—Testimony as to testator's ill will toward collateral kindred not relied on, where conflicting.

In a suit involving the construction of a will, where testator's sisters and brother, who were not mentioned, claimed, as heirs, property as to which they claimed he died intestate, testimony as to testator's ill will toward them which was so conflicting as to be of no value in arriving at his intention should not be relied on, since extrinsic facts, when necessary to aid in the construction of a will, should be clearly and satisfactorily established.

7. Wills §449—Presumption against partial intestacy intensified where general residuary clause used.

The legal presumption is that testator intended to dispose of his entire estate, especially where he has used a general residuary clause, the courts being decidedly inclined against adopting a construction which leaves him intestate as to a part of his estate.

8. Wills §449—Will construed to vest all of testator's estate in wife, subject to payment of specific legacies.

Under a will bequeathing to testator's wife, in one sentence his entire interest in the farm on which they lived, and all bonds, notes, and money as long as she lived, and, in the next, $500 to each of her two nieces after her death, and the remainder of his effects to her to dispose of as she thought proper, it was testator's intention to give his entire interest in the farm to his wife, without limitation, and to limit her interest in the money, notes, and bonds for the sole purpose of designating a fund out of which the two legacies were to be paid, the two sentences, when read together, harmonizing perfectly with what testator might naturally have been expected to do, in view of his affection for his wife, the fact that his collateral kindred were already well provided for and advanced in years, and that none of them were referred to in the will, and avoiding the intestacy which would otherwise result.

9. Wills §616(1)—Under absolute power in devisee to dispose of remainder of testator's effects, entire residue of estate passes despite prior devise of life estate.

Where a life estate is expressly given, language of other parts of the will will not be construed to enlarge such estate into an absolute estate, unless it is very clear, but if, by other terms in the same instrument, it is manifest that devisee is vested with absolute power to dispose of the subject at his will, he is not a mere life tenant, but absolute owner, so that, under a will bequeathing testator's entire interest in a farm and all his bonds, notes, and money to his wife as long as she lived, and specific legacies to two nieces, a subsequent provision leaving to the wife the remainder of his effects, to dispose of as she thought proper, expressed in reasonably clear and natural words testator's intention that the entire residue of the estate, real and personal, in possession and in remainder, should pass to his wife.

10. Wills §575—Word "effects" as used in residuary clause of will held to embrace real estate.

Though the word "effects" ordinarily refers to personal property, such term, as used in a will bequeathing to testator's wife his entire interest in a farm, and all his bonds, notes, and money as long as she lived, with legacies to two nieces after her death, and the remainder of his "effects" to his wife to dispose of as she thought proper, may fairly be construed to embrace real estate, the meaning of the term being determined by the context and surrounding circumstances.

Error to Circuit Court, Page County.

Suit between Rebecca S. Coffman and others and H. M. Coffman's administrator, to construe a will. From the decree, the administrator brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Geo. N. Conrad, of Harrisonburg, for plaintiff in error.

Wm. F. Keyser and H. V. Strayer, both of Luray, for defendants in error.

KELLY, P. This suit involves the construction of the will of H. M. Coffman, deceased, which, omitting the formal parts, was as follows:

"I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Rebecca S. Coffman, my entire interest in the farm that we now live on and all bonds, notes, and money that I possess or may be coming to me as long as she, Rebecca, lives. After her death I will and bequeath unto Martha M. Zirkle, Maud O. Zirkle, five hundred dollars each, making $1,000 divided between the two of my nieces for living with us and comforting us during our sad bereavement in losing our dear son, the remainder of my effects I leave with my wife to dispose of as she thinks proper."

The controversy in the case is between Mrs. Rebecca S. Coffman, the widow, who claims the whole estate, subject to the payment of the two legacies of $500 each, and the heirs and distributees of the testator, who claim that he died intestate as to certain of his real and personal property. The lower court sustained the latter claim.

The will was dated May 5, 1900, and the testator died in January, 1920. He left no children or descendants, his only child, a son having died in 1898, but he was survived by his widow, Rebecca S. Coffman, three sisters, Mary A. Coffman, B. Frances Coffman, and Mrs. Martha E. Modesitt, and one brother, David J. Coffman, who were his heirs and distributees.

The testator and his wife were old people. The two unmarried sisters and the brother, a man of unsound mind, were likewise advanced in years, all of them being over 70 years of age. The married sister was considerably younger. The latter, with her husband, S. H. Modesitt, owned and resided on a valuable farm which had formerly belonged to her father, and which she had acquired by deed from her brothers and sisters. The two unmarried sisters and the unmarried brother lived on the same farm, were comfortably situated, and their support was reasonably well provided for.

The testator and his wife had resided for nearly 40 years prior to his death on a farm which had been conveyed to them jointly shortly after their marriage. The consideration for that conveyance was $3,205, $1,000 of which was paid for Mr. Coffman by his mother, $2,000 of which was paid for Mrs. Coffman by her father, and the residue of which, $205, the grantees perhaps paid jointly. Subsequently Mrs. Coffman, out of money realized from her father's estate, contributed $3,000, which went into the place in the way of improvements. Mr. Coffman was a good farmer, and his wife was industrious and frugal. They kept the farm in good condition, continuing to improve it, and that fact, together with the advance in the market price of farming land, made it worth perhaps $20,000 at the time of the testator's death. When the will was written the property of the testator consisted of his interest in the farm and of a considerable amount of personal property, made up of household furniture, farming implements, live stock, money, notes, bonds, and stock in various corporations. At the time of his death his indebtedness was very small, and the amount of his personal property of every kind had been increased to an aggregate amount of something more than $9,000. He had also acquired subsequent to the execution of the will two tracts of mountain land of somewhat uncertain value, but worth perhaps $2,000.

Before undertaking to construe the will, we may dispose of a preliminary question raised by one of the assignments of error, and discussed at considerable length in the oral and written arguments in this case. A good deal of testimony was introduced for the purpose of showing that the testator did not want any of his property to go to his brother and sisters. The evidence relied on for this purpose was of two kinds or classes: First, evidence of a general nature tending to show that he did not feel kindly towards them; and, second, evidence of particular alleged declarations by him that he would exclude them or had excluded them by his will from any share in his estate. Some of this evidence of both classes was objected to, and some of it was introduced without objection. In rebuttal of such evidence, without waiving objection thereto, the heirs produced witnesses who testified to the contrary, some of them being offered to show that the testator was on good terms with his brother and sisters, and others to show that they had heard him make declarations indicating that he intended his estate to go to his own relations in blood.

In a memorandum opinion the learned judge of the circuit court says:

"Declarations of intention, etc., not admissible to aid in the construction of will. Objections of that character sustained."

[1] It is contended that the court excluded "all evidence relating to the situation, and declared purposes and intentions of the testator in the disposal of his property." We do not understand that the court went this far. It excluded evidence of the testator's declarations of intention, but not evidence of his situation, and this ruling was in accord with the law as applied to the facts of this case. The proper use of extrinsic evidence in aid of the interpretation of wills may be regarded as reasonably well settled. It cannot be used at all if the will is plain and unambiguous, for "it is not permitted to interpret that which has no need of interpretation." But there are many different ways of expressing the same thought; there are many varying shades of meaning which a group of words may have; men differ much in their knowledge of lexicography and grammar, and in their facility of expression; and the necessary result is that in many cases language is to be found in a will which appears to be susceptible of more than one interpretation. In such cases resort may be had to extrinsic evidence, subject to certain reasonably well defined limitations.

[2, 3] Professor Charles A. Graves made a valuable contribution to the law on this subject in a paper which he read at the annual meeting of the Virginia State Bar Association in 1893, published in volume 4 of the Bar Association Reports, page 183 et seq.; also published in 14 Va. Law Reg. p. 913 et seq.

He divides the extrinsic evidence which may be offered in aid of the interpretation of a will into two classes, and says:

"Of these the first consists of material facts, and these may concern the testator, his property, his family, the claimant or claimants under the will, their relations to the testator, etc. The second class, on the other hand, is confined to direct evidence of the testator's actual intention, such as his declarations of intention, his informal memoranda for his will, his instructions for its preparation, and his statements to the scrivener or others as to the meaning of its language. And this division of extrinsic evidence not only exists in the nature of the case, but is of the utmost practical importance in the interpretation of wills, as the rules for the admissibility of the two kinds of evidence are not the same. Let us call the first kind the facts and circumstances, and use the expression 'declaration of intention' to describe all extrinsic statements by the testator as to his actual testamentary intentions—i. e., as to what he has done, or designs to do, by his will, or as to the meaning of its words as used by him."

Having made this classification, Professor Graves proceeds to show that evidence of the first kind, "the facts and circumstances," is always admissible in a case of disputed interpretation, saying:

"For the object of interpretation is to ascertain the meaning of the words as used by the testator; what the words represented in his mind; what he understood to be signified by them; and for this purpose it is indispensable that the expositor should know the situation of the testator; the state of his family and property; his relations to persons and things; his opinions and beliefs; his hopes and fears; his habits of thought and of language; in a word, that the interpreter should identify himself with the testator as to knowledge, feeling, and speech, and thus, scanning the words of the will from the testator's point of view, decide as to their meaning as used by him."

In support of this conclusion the learned author cites Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 74, 8 L. Ed. 322, Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 300, 8 Sup. Ct. 1164, 32 L. Ed. 138, Hatcher v. Hatcher, 80 Va. 169, and Miller v. Potterfield, 86 Va. 876, 11 S. E. 486, 19 Am. St. Rep. 919; to which we may add, from a number of recent Virginia decisions to the same effect, Stark v. Berry, 118 Va. 706, 711, 88 S. E. 68, and Penick's Ex'r v. Walker, 125 Va. 274, 278, 99 S. E. 559. In the last-named case we said:

"The primary consideration and rule of construction is to determine the intention of the testator from the language which he has used. If the meaning of that language is plain, the will must be given effect accordingly. This rule is familiar and elementary, and to it all others are subordinate and subservient. If there be doubt as to the meaning, then the auxiliary or subordinate rule to be first applied, and the one of most usefulness and importance, is for the court to place itself as

With reference to the second of the two classes of extrinsic evidence dealt with in the paper by Professor Graves, "testator's declarations of intention," he says:

"There is but one situation in which the judicial expositor has the right to invoke the aid of declarations of intention, and that is where the words in the will describe well, but equally well, two or more persons or two or more things, and such declarations are offered to show which person or which thing was meant by the testator—i. e., by the words in the will as used by him."

This situation he describes as a case of "equivocation," and his conclusion with respect thereto is fortified by citation of authorities, and is followed by a most instructive and interesting discussion and explanation of what will constitute equivocation, and the reasons why the evidence of the testator's declarations, as contrasted with evidence of the facts and circumstances surrounding him is so narrowly restricted in its use.

[4] In the instant case there is no "equivocation" involved, but there is a use of language which fails to make the testator's meaning altogether clear, with the result that the widow on the one hand and the heirs and distributees on the other, represented before us by able and reputable counsel, take diametrically opposing views as to what the testator meant by the language which he used. It follows that his declarations, so far as they purported to describe the intention he meant to express in the will, were inadmissible, but that evidence of facts showing his situation, including in particular the character and value of his property, his family and family relationships, the claimants under the will, and his attitude with reference to them, was admissible for the purpose of determining his probable intent. And this, we think, is just what the lower court held. He expressly excluded the declarations, but it is clear that he did not mean to exclude the other class of extrinsic evidence, the facts and circumstances. Indeed, his memorandum opinion necessarily shows that he did consider these facts and circumstances, for he specifically states that "the beneficiary of the residuary clause (widow) is manifestly the prime object of the testator's bounty," and that "his two sisters and insane brother (are) already well provided for in life and are advanced in years." These statements are necessarily based upon extrinsic evidence.

[5, 6] Whatever may have been the view of the trial court, however, upon the questions we have discussed, the result in this case is the same. The declarations of intention were properly ruled out, and the balance of the extrinsic evidence, when duly appraised and weighed, cannot be held to have gone further than to show his affection and solicitude for his wife, the number and names and situation of his next of kin, and the amount and kind of his property, and of that owned by the other parties to this litigation. As to his alleged ill will for any of his collateral kindred, there was a good deal of evidence on both sides, and it is too conflicting to be of value in arriving at his intention. When the necessity arises to go outside of a will and call in the aid of extrinsic facts, such facts ought to be clearly and satisfactorily established. If the evidence with respect to them leaves the court in serious doubt, they ought not to be relied on, and in this case it does leave the court in doubt as to whether the testator felt unkindly towards any of the parties who are here claiming adversely to the widow.

We come now to the interpretation of the will. The circuit court held: First, that the widow took a life estate in the testator's interest in the farm, leaving him intestate as to the reversion; second, that the widow also took a life estate in the bonds, notes and money, the remainder in which, after the payment therefrom, of the two legacies of $500 each to Martha and Maud Zirkle, would go to the testator's distributees, thus leaving him intestate as to such remainder; third, that the corporate stock did not pass under the description of "bonds, notes and money," but went to the widow as "effects" under the residuary clause; and, fourth, that the mountain land was not embraced in the term "effects" in the residuary clause, and that as to this land also the testator died intestate.

It must be admitted that there is much to be said in support of each of the holdings above outlined, but upon a careful view of the language of the will as a whole, viewed in the light of the material surrounding facts and circumstances, and of the legal presumption applicable to the case, we have reached the conclusion that, as to holdings 1, 2, and 4 above noted, the circuit court was in error.

[7, 8] We start out with the legal presumption that the testator intended to dispose of his entire estate. There is a strong presumption against partial intestacy, intensified where, as here, the testator has used a general residuary clause, and the courts have for a long time inclined very decidedly against adopting any construction of wills which leaves the testator intestate as to a part of his estate, unless that result is absolutely unescapable. Prison Association v. Russell, 103 Va. 563, 576, 49 S. E. 966. It is further to be especially observed that the testator's wife in this case was, as stated by the learned judge below, manifestly the prime object of his bounty. She had contributed largely by her management and frugality, and by the contribution of her own funds, to her husband's success in improving the farm and in accumulating other effects. They had lost their only child. His affection for his wife is apparent both from the extrinsic evidence and from the terms of the will itself. No other beneficiary is named in the will except two of her nieces (not his), who had comforted them in the loss of their son, and to whom he gave $500 each. His married sister was well off, and his two unmarried sisters and his brother, a man of unsound mind, were well provided for, and were advanced in years. None of these were referred to in the will, either by name or by any general designation.

The dispositive clause of the will contains only two sentences. The first is so phrased and punctuated as to indicate a purpose to give the widow only a life estate in his interest in the farm and in the bonds, notes, and money. It is this:

"I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Rebecca S. Coffman, my entire interest in the farm that we now live on and all bonds, notes, and money that I possess or may be coming to me as long as she, Rebecca, lives."

Standing alone, this sentence is perhaps most fairly and naturally to be interpreted as giving only a life estate to the widow in the property therein mentioned, with no provision as to a reversion in any part thereof. There is a contention, however, and we do not think it is altogether without plausibility, that in view of the affection and solicitude of the testator for his wife, and of the history of their ownership and management of the farm, the sentence standing alone might be susceptible of the meaning that the testator was giving to his wife absolutely his "entire interest in the farm," and that the words "as long as she, Rebecca, lives" were intended to place a limitation only upon the bonds, notes and money. Whether this latter view of the sentence, standing alone, is tenable or not, it seems to us quite clear, when both sentences of the will are construed together, that the testator did mean to give his entire interest in the farm to his wife without limitation, and merely to limit her interest in the money, notes, and bonds for the sole and single purpose of designating a fund out of which the two $500 legacies were to be paid. The second sentence is as follows:

"After her death I will and bequeath unto Martha M. Zirkle, Maud O. Zirkle, five hundred dollars each, making $1,000 divided between the two of my nieces for living with and comforting us during our sad bereavement in losing our dear son, the remainder of my effects I leave with my wife to dispose of as she thinks proper."

These two sentences, when read together, can be harmonized perfectly with what the testator might naturally have been expected to do, and with his total omission of any reference, either specific or general, to his brother and sisters, and can, without resort to any strained construction, be made to avoid the intestacy which otherwise results, and which we think the testator clearly did not contemplate.

The will, viewed as a whole, in the light of the facts and circumstances proper to be considered, shows a complete testamentary plan by which Mr. Coffman intended to give everything he had to his wife, subject only to the requirement that at her death the two legacies should be paid out of the money, notes and bonds.

It is earnestly contended, and much authority is cited in alleged support of the contention, that the limitation to a life estate in the widow by the first sentence is not enlarged to an absolute estate by anything to be found in the second sentence; and, further, that the word "effects" in the residuary clause cannot be made to embrace real estate.

[9] The general rule undoubtedly is that, where an estate for life is given in express terms, the language in other parts of the will relied on to enlarge that into an absolute estate ought not to be given such effect unless the language is very clear indeed. See note by Judge E. C. Burks, Farris v. Wayman, 1st Va. Law Reg., p. 219. This, however, is merely the counterpart of, if not indeed an exception to, the equally well settled rule stated by Judge Burks in the note just cited as follows:

"It cannot be doubted that, though property is devised or bequeathed to one for life, even in the most express terms, yet if, by other terms in the same instrument, it is manifest that the devisee or legatee is invested with absolute power to dispose of the subject at his will and pleasure, he is not a mere life tenant, but absolute owner; for there can be no better definition of absolute ownership than absolute dominion."

In this case we are not prepared to say that the testator did give a life estate to his wife in express terms. He did it in express terms, of course, if he did it at all, but can we say that the words as used by him cannot fairly be interpreted as expressing an intention on his part to give to his wife his "entire interest in the farm?"

But if it be conceded that the only fair interpretation is that the language of the first sentence expressly and plainly gave only a life estate in the farm to the widow, then the first rule above mentioned must yield to the second. The will says: "The remainder of my effects I leave with my wife to dispose of as she thinks proper." We think this language in the light of the circumstances, and taken with the context, must be held to express in reasonably clear and natural words just what might have been perhaps more clearly expressed if the will had in more technically correct and accurate language described the entire residue of his estate, both real and personal, in possession and in remainder.

[10] But it is said, and the lower court expressly so held, that the word "effects" does not embrace real estate. We do not take this view of the case. The general rule is that effects means personal property, but that depends on the context, the subject-matter and the circumstances. The definition of the word, as given in Webster's New International Dictionary, is:

"Goods; movables; personal estate; as, the people escaped from the town with their effects; sometimes used to embrace real as well as personal property."

To illustrate: If we should say, "Mr. A. took all of his effects out of his house before it was destroyed by fire," we would, of course, be understood to refer to personal property. On the other hand, if, knowing that Mr. A. owned the house in fee-simple, we should say, "Mr. A. died, leaving all of his effects to his wife, except two legacies of $500 each to his nieces," we would with equal certainty be understood to mean that the house and its contents would go to the widow, notwithstanding the fact that the house was real estate.

A good many authorities have been cited to show that the word "effects" ordinarily refers to personal property, and these authorities go far enough to hold that the term has acquired a certain technical meaning of that kind, but none of them in any way impinge upon the further general rule that, whether the term includes the one or the other or both species of property must be determined by the context, and by the surrounding circumstances. This will appear from the authorities principally relied upon to support the decree complained of. See, for example, note to Andrews v. Applegate, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 661; 8 Words & Phrases, p. 2320; 40 Cyc. 1527, and note; Schouler on Wills and Administration, § 509, and cases cited. We do not deem it necessary to quote from these authorities, or to multiply, as we might do, citations of others to the same effect. No new question or principle of construction is involved.

We have no doubt that the testator, by the general and sweeping residuary clause, intended to give the widow everything he had, except the $1,000 given to her nieces; and this, we think, under the circumstances, may fairly be said to be the meaning of the words used by him.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary for us to discuss certain other questions which would present themselves if we took a different view of the meaning of the testator's will, including in particular the cross assignment of error filed by the appellees.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein not in conflict with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

RICHARDSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law \S 982—Court does not lose control over accused under suspended sentence.

The rule that a court cannot, after adjournment of the term, alter or amend a final judgment or order because it becomes irrevocable upon such final adjournment, has no application to an order suspending sentence of an accused, especially in view of Act March 16, 1918 (Laws 1918, c. 349) \S 2.

2. Constitutional law \S 74—Statutes conferring power on courts to suspend a sentence valid.

Statutes which confer a power on court to suspend sentences, such as Act March 16, 1918 (Laws 1918, c. 349) \S 2, do not contravene constitutional provisions vesting the pardoning power in the executive.

3. Criminal law \S 273, 982—Court cannot by suspending sentence excuse accused from penalty.

The judge of a trial court may not enter into a binding agreement with a prisoner to excuse him forever from the penalties of his crime if he pleads guilty by giving him a suspended sentence, the purpose of a suspended sentence being to afford accused only an opportunity to repent and reform; nor can attorneys for the commonwealth make a contract with an accused which will bind the trial judge, and one who pleads guilty can thereafter only ask for mercy.

4. Criminal law \S 978—Statute permitting suspended sentences liberally construed.

Act March 16, 1918 (Laws 1918, c. 349) \S 2, providing for probation and a suspension of sentences in criminal and juvenile courts, is highly remedial and should be liberally construed.

5. Criminal law \S 982—Trial court may revoke suspension of sentence.

In cases in which court fails to prescribe a period of probation definitely, the alternative clause of Act March 16, 1918 (Laws 1918, c. 349) \S 2, separates and limits the power of revocation of order suspending sentence to "the maximum period for which the defendant might originally have been sentenced to be imprisoned," and after the expiration of such period the court loses jurisdiction.

Error to Corporation Court of Radford.

John Richardson was convicted for violation of the prohibition statute. From an order annulling an order suspending sentence, he brings error. Reversed.

R. L. Jordan, of Radford, and John S. Draper, Jr., of Pulaski, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. John W. Richardson, who was prosecuted under the name of John Richardson, assigns error in the final judgment of the trial court committing him to jail for 30 days for a violation of the prohibition statute.

These facts appear: On November 10, 1919, the accused having pleaded guilty, the following order was entered:

"This day the commonwealth by its attorney and the accused by his attorney, by and with the consent of the attorney for the commonwealth and the accused pleaded guilty to the indictment against him; whereupon the court imposed a fine of $50 and fixed the period of his confinement in this city jail at 30 days. But the court doth suspend said jail sentence, during good behavior of the accused, and upon the payment of said fine and the taxable costs of this prosecution, the accused is discharged from custody until the further order of this court."

Thereafter, he was indicted in the circuit court of the county of Pulaski for unlawfully transporting ardent spirits, to which charge he also pleaded guilty on September 14, 1920, and a fine of $50 was imposed on him therefor. Following this second conviction, a rule was issued in the corporation court of the city of Radford on December 14, 1921, requiring him to show cause why the suspension of execution of sentence under the original conviction of November 10, 1919, should not be revoked and he be required to serve 30 days in jail in accordance with the original conviction. To this rule there was an answer, denying the facts suggested in the rule, and a demurrer to the evidence. Thereupon the court, without passing upon any of the questions thereby raised, entered the following order February 14, 1921:

"This day came again the commonwealth by its attorney, and the defendant John W. Richardson, by his attorney, and the court without passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence submitted by the commonwealth in support of the rule and the motion for commitment thereunder, upon such evidence, and without passing upon the sufficiency of the answer of John W. Richardson to the rule, and without passing upon the demurrer to the evidence offered in support of the rule, which questions and motions were submitted to the corporation court of the city of Radford, Va., at its December, 1920, term, is of the opinion and doth decide that the court was in error in suspending the jail sentence imposed upon the defendant, John W. Richardson, by its order of November 10, 1919, and that the court was without jurisdiction or power to suspend said jail sentence fixed in said order of November 10, 1919; the court, therefore, doth now annul and set aside so much of the order entered November 10, 1919, as suspended the jail sentence provided for in said order; and doth now order, direct and command the sergeant of the city of Radford, Va., to take charge of the defendant, John W. Richardson, and commit him to the jail of the city of Radford, Va., there to serve a period of 30 days, the time fixed and provided in the order of November 10, 1919, to which ruling of the court the defendant excepts."

To this order this writ of error was allowed.

It is certified as a part of the facts that—

Upon the first indictment there was a jury trial at the October, 1919, term of court, at which trial the jury disagreed, and at the succeeding November term the accused "agreed by and with the commonwealth's attorney, and the consent of the court to be obtained, that if the court would suspend the jail sentence attached to a conviction under said indictment, and would impose only the minimum fine of $50, that he, the said John W. Richardson, would plead guilty to the indictment. This agreement was in good faith entered into between the defendant and the commonwealth's attorney, and the agreement was approved by the court, in that the court consented to impose the minimum fine and suspend the said jail sentence. Upon the agreement and upon those conditions, the said John W. Richardson withdrew his former plea of 'not guilty' and pleaded guilty to the indictment upon which he had once been tried, and upon which trial a jury had disagreed as to whether he was guilty or not."

It is observed that in the judgment of February 24, 1921, committing the accused to jail, the court bases its action upon the opinion that it was without jurisdiction or power to suspend the execution of the jail sentence imposed by the order of November 10, 1919, and for that reason only annulled and set aside the suspending order.

[1] Our attention is directed to the lack of power or authority in a court, after the adjournment of the term, to alter or amend a final judgment or order, because it becomes irrevocable upon such final adjournment, and it is claimed that, for this reason the court had no jurisdiction or power to revoke the suspending order and commit the accused to jail under the original conviction. This assignment is without merit, not because the doctrine is not fully recognized and enforced in Virginia, but because in this case there was no final judgment, and the execution of the sentence was suspended and the accused discharged from custody until the further order of the court. When the execution of a sentence is thus suspended, under the Virginia statute, the case remains pending and the court does not thereby lose its control over the accused or his case. Indeed, the statute presently to be quoted expressly confers upon the court in such cases ample jurisdiction over the accused and control over such orders, with power to revoke them, and to require such suspended sentences to be fully executed, if exercised within the period prescribed by law.

The question presented depends upon the proper construction of section 2 of the act approved March 16, 1918 (Laws 1918, c. 349), providing for probation and suspension of sentences in criminal and juvenile courts. This section reads thus:

"After a plea or a verdict of guilty in any court having jurisdiction to hear and determine the offense with which the prisoner at the bar is charged, if there be circumstances in mitigation of the offense, and if it appear compatible with the public interest, or in any case after a child has been declared delinquent or dependent, the court may suspend the imposition or the execution of sentence, or commitment and may also place the defendant on probation under the supervision of a probation officer, during good behavior, for such time and under such conditions of probation as the court shall determine. The court may subsequently increase or decrease the probation period and may revoke or modify any condition of probation. While on probation the defendant may be required to pay in one or several sums a fine imposed at the time of being placed on probation, or may be required to make restitution or reparation to the aggrieved party or parties for actual damages or loss caused by the offense for which conviction was had, or may be required to provide for the support of his wife or others for whose support he may be legally responsible.

"The court may revoke the suspension of sentence and cause the defendant to be arrested and brought before the court at any time within the probation period, or within the maximum period for which the defendant might originally have been sentenced to be imprisoned, whereupon, in case the imposition of sentence has been suspended, the court may pronounce whatever sentence might have been originally imposed; and in case the execution of the sentence has been suspended, the original sentence shall be in full force and effect, and the time of probation shall not be taken into account to diminish the original sentence. In the event that any person placed on probation shall leave the jurisdiction of the court without the consent of the judge, or having obtained leave to remove to another locality violates any of the terms of his probation, he may be apprehended and returned to said court and dealt with as provided above."

[2] The power of courts to suspend sentence, this phrase being frequently employed as meaning either delay in the imposition of a sentence for crime or the staying of execution of the sentence imposed, has been much discussed. The weight of authority appears to be that, under the common law, courts do not possess the power to delay the imposition or execution of sentences for crime, except temporarily, as, for instance, in order to give time for motions for new trial, writs of error, or to determine the precise sentence to be imposed. It is, however, generally held that statutes which confer such power are valid, and that they do not contravene the constitutional provisions vesting the pardoning power in the executive. Among the cases upholding the validity of such statutes are People ex rel. Forsyth v. Court of Sessions, 141 N. Y. 288, 36 N. E. 886, 23 L. R. A. 856; People ex rel. Sullivan v. Flynn, 55 Misc. Rep. 639, 106 N. Y. Supp. 925; People v. Stickle, 156 Mich. 557, 121 N. W. 497; State v. Mallahan, 65 Wash. 287, 118 Pac. 42; Ex parte Glannini, 18 Cal. App. 166, 122 Pac. 831; Belden v. Hugo, 88 Conn. 500, 91 Atl. 369; 8 R. C. L. 247 et seq.; note to State v. Abbott, 87 S. C. 466, 70 S. E. 6, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 116; Fuller v. Mississippi (Miss.) 57 South. 6, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243; note to Re Hart, 29 N. D. 38, 149 N. W. 568, L. R. A. 1915C, 1171.

In Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 37 Sup. Ct. 72, 61 L. Ed. 129, L. R. A. 1917E, 1178, it is held that in the absence of statutory authority, the federal courts have no power to suspend the execution of sentences indefinitely, but the power of Congress to confer that authority by statute is expressly recognized.

In this state the matter is regulated by statute, and nothing has been suggested which leads us to doubt the constitutionality of such statutes. Code 1919, § 4925, expressly recognizes the power of the General Assembly to enact them in this language:

"Except where authorized by statute, no court, judge or justice shall suspend the entry or execution of a judgment in any criminal case."

Possibly the idea that such statutes constitute an invasion of the pardoning power of the governor is based upon an erroneous view of the true effect of suspending execution of a sentence. By the very term used it is not a pardon, excuse, immunity, or relief, from the punishment, but a mere suspension, or postponement, of its execution.

[3] Much of the argument in this case is based upon the assumption that the judge of a trial court may enter into a binding agreement with the prisoner to excuse him forever from the penalties of his crime. We think this a misconception, and that if judges are in the habit of making such contracts or bargains with convicted persons, the practice should be discontinued. The commonwealth, in the administration of the criminal law, desires the reformation of the criminal, and in the promotion of that purpose authorizes the probation of certain criminals and the suspension of the imposition or execution of their sentences, so that they may not be deprived of their liberty and the power to earn their subsistence, or be morally corrupted by association with hardened criminals frequently found in the jails, but may take their places and perform some useful work in the community. When a trial judge suspends a sentence, however, he does not make a contract with the accused, but only extends to him the opportunity which the state affords him to repent and reform. It is the free gift of the commonwealth, and not a contract to relieve him from the punishment which fits his crime. In such cases the attorney for the commonwealth may properly confer with the accused and his attorney, and in appropriate cases agree to recommend to the judge the exercise of such leniency, but the appropriate action must be at last determined by the judge himself, though he will generally adopt such recommendation as satisfying the ends of justice. By this statute the commonwealth, in its benevolent effort to reform its criminals, extends, through the trial court judges, to those overtaken in their faults, a mercy which is free, but which does not rest upon contract. Courts ordained to administer justice, and charged with that duty, cannot properly make terms with crime, though under this statute they may, as a matter of grace, postpone or withhold the imposition of the prescribed penalty for the reasons indicated in the statute and upon conditions thereby prescribed. The attorneys for the commonwealth can make no contract with an accused person which will bind the judge, and the judge can make no agreement which will bind either himself or his successors in office. When the accused pleads guilty, he can thereafter only ask for mercy, and if he receives it, it comes to him as a gift and not by purchase.

It is also urged in this case that the commitment of the accused to jail in this proceeding is invalid because the maximum period for which he might originally have been sentenced had elapsed before the rule was issued, and that therefore the court had no power under the statute to revoke the suspension of sentence. This presents a more difficult question.

[4, 5] The statute is highly remedial and should be liberally construed, but it is most important that the General Assembly shall clarify it by amendment. Clarifying its obscurities as best we can, it is manifest that the authority either to suspend the imposition or the execution of sentence is committed to the trial court judges. The draftsman of the act appears to have had in mind that in the discretion of the judge there might be two alternatives: (1) That the convicted person might be placed on probation; that is, discharged on condition that he would be of good behavior, either with or without supervision and without any express limitation of the period during which this probation should continue. (2) There might be such a suspension of the sentence either with or without the supervision of a probation officer for a definite period until the further order of the court. The court is thereby given ample power, not only to determine the conditions to be imposed in each case, but is expressly given power to revoke the suspension and cause the defendant to be arrested and again brought before the court for punishment. This ample power of revocation, however, with its limitations, are expressed in the statute in these words:

"The court may revoke the suspension of sentence and cause the defendant to be arrested and brought before the court at any time within the probation period, or within the maximum period for which the defendant might originally have been sentenced to be imprisoned."

While the precise meaning of this clause is not perfectly apparent, its purpose to limit the period within which the suspension order can be revoked is manifest. It is clear that within such limited period the court is expressly authorized to revoke the suspension and impose the penalty, but not thereafter. This prescribed and limited period is expressed in the alternative; that is, the court may revoke the suspension either at any time within the probation period, or within the maximum period for which the defendant might originally have been sentenced to imprisonment. The clause would more clearly express its meaning if the word "or" were followed by the words, "if no probation period has been prescribed then." With this interpolation the meaning of the statute would be perfectly clear. The Legislature clearly could not have intended to make the jurisdiction of the trial court to revoke the suspension a matter of uncertainty in any particular case. The intention was to prescribe and limit the power of the court. As in this case the trial court did not prescribe a definite period during which the suspension of the sentence should continue, unless we adopt the conclusion suggested, we would be driven to conclude that the court might retain its jurisdiction over the defendant and hold him subject to its order indefinitely. While the court may fix the period of probation, a careful consideration of the language used leads us to the conclusion that in those cases in which the court fails to prescribe such period of probation definitely, the alternative clause of the statute operates and itself limits the power of revocation to "the maximum period for which the defendant might originally have been sentenced to be imprisoned."

The maximum period for which the accused could be imprisoned for this crime appears to be six months. In this case it appears that more than six months had elapsed after the original suspension of the sentence, November 10, 1919, and before the date of the issuance of the rule, December 14, 1920. As this maximum period had expired before the rule was issued, we are of opinion that the court exceeded its power in assuming further jurisdiction of the case. At any time within six months, under the statute, the court had plenary power to revoke the order of suspension and impose the penalty of imprisonment, but not after the expiration of that maximum period.

If the court fails to prescribe the period of probation in the suspending order, then the statute operates, determines the period, and limits the jurisdiction of the court to revoke the suspension to the maximum period for which the accused could originally have been imprisoned.

It follows therefore that we think the court erred in taking jurisdiction of this case after the expiration of the six months from the date when the sentence was suspended. The order will therefore be reversed, and the rule dismissed.

Reversed.

FOLTZ v. CONRAD REALTY CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 21, 1921.)

1. Judgment \S 184—Essentials of notice in proceeding by motion stated.

Great informality is allowed in proceeding by motion for judgment, and the notice need only give the opposing party a sufficient idea of the grounds of action relied on and state a good cause of action with requisite certainty.

2. Judgment \S 184—Notice of motion need state only legal effect of part of contract relied on.

Notice of motion for judgment need not set out the contract relied on, but only the substance and legal effect of so much of it as is required for statement of plaintiff's case.

3. Contracts \S 324(2)—Recovery sought for misconduct rendering complete performance impossible is one growing out of contract.

Recovery of damages sought for defendant's misconduct rendering impossible complete performance by plaintiff of his contract with defendant for performance of which plaintiff was to receive certain payments is a recovery growing out of the contract.

4. Brokers \S 40—Paragraphs of contract not inconsistent as to commissions.

Two paragraphs of a contract between broker and owner of lots as to commissions held not inconsistent; one being applicable if all the lots are sold by the broker; the other where part are sold by the owner.

5. Contracts ¶143—To be construed as a whole.

In construing a written contract the entire instrument is to be considered.

6. Brokers ¶87—Amount of recovery under contract where after sales of part of lots owner refuses to complete them stated.

Where contract between lot owner and broker places a price on each lot, the sum aggregating $5,000 and agrees to pay the broker as commission the amount obtained in excess of that sum, and provides that, if any lots remain at the close of the sale, the owner will take them back at the price placed on them, the broker having made contracts of sales of over a third of them, each for more than the price fixed, and not being in fault, and being wrongfully prevented by the owner from completing the sales, is entitled to recover of the owner an amount equal to the excess of the prices in the contracts of sale over the prices fixed by the owner.

7. Evidence ¶448—Conversations of parties before executing contract as to its meaning not admissible.

A written contract may not be varied by evidence of conversation between the parties before its execution as to its meaning.

8. Brokers ¶63(1)—Generally entitled to commissions where sale negotiated by him falls through owner's fault.

Generally a broker is entitled to commissions where a sale negotiated by him in conformity to the agreement falls through by fault of the owner only.

9. Brokers ¶61(4)—Owner not relieved of liability for commissions because of defect in title not known by broker.

That the owner's reason for refusal to complete sales negotiated by a broker, by giving the stipulated good warranty deed—that is, one with general warranty—is that he had discovered his title to be defective, being a special warranty deed only, does not relieve him of liability for commissions, provided the broker proceeded in good faith to secure purchasers, not knowing of the defect when he contracted with the owner or when he performed the work.

10. Brokers ¶61(4)—Not entitled to commissions where not telling customers of information of defect in title unless showing title good.

Where a broker, employed to sell building lots into which his principal's tract was divided, was before doing any work told by a reputable lawyer whom he had consulted, that the deed to his principal omitted parts of the tract, he was put on notice, which he was bound to communicate to prospective purchasers, and not having done so, he could not recover commissions, though he made contracts of sale, unless he showed the title was good; the principal having refused to give a general warranty deed on discovery that his deed contained only a special warranty.

Error to Circuit Court, Page County.

Proceeding by motion for judgment by the Conrad Realty Company against R. P. Foltz. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Will A. Cook, of Madison, and H. V. Strayer, of Luray, for plaintiff in error.

John H. Downing, of Front Royal, and Wm. F. Keyser, of Luray, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is a controversy concerning commissions on a sale of land by the Conrad Realty Company for R. P. Foltz a citizen of Page county, in this state. The sale is alleged to have been made pursuant to the authority of a written contract between the parties, whereby it was agreed that the realty company should offer for sale for the plaintiff in error (defendant below) a tract of about 12 acres, situated in the suburbs of Stanley, a small village in above county. The contract provided that the realty company should put the property in first-class condition at its own expense, thoroughly advertised the sale, and furnished an experienced auctioneering force, and a band of music on the day of sale. Other features of the contract will be referred to in the discussion of the questions in issue.

After subdividing the tract into building lots, 65 in number, and incurring in this respect, and for advertising and other preliminaries, considerable expense, the realty company advertised the lots for sale on November 1, 1919. Twenty-one lots were sold on that date. At that stage, and on account of the interruption caused by a heavy and protracted rain, it was agreed that the sale of the remaining lots should be postponed. The purchasers paid one-third of the purchase money for their respective lots, and executed bonds or notes as required for the deferred payments. An agreed price had been placed upon these lots before sale. After the sale of said lots, aggregating $3,342.50, defendant was called upon to accept the amount of the agreed price of the lots sold. He refused to do this, and declined to give receipts, execute deeds, or to sanction a sale of the remaining lots, although the realty company advised him that they were ready to go ahead and complete the sales according to the terms of the contract. Being unable to make further sales, or effect a settlement of sales actually made, owing to the attitude of the defendant, the plaintiff (the realty company) filed a notice of motion in the circuit court of Page county against the defendant for $1,067.50, the same being the difference between the sales price of the lots sold ($3,342.50) and the contract price ($2,285) agreed on between the parties. The motion was demurred to, and the demurrer sustained in part and overruled in part. An amended notice was then filed, which was also demurred to, but this demurrer was overruled. Thereupon issue was joined, evidence taken, and under the instructions of the court the case was submitted to the jury, which returned a verdict for the full amount claimed. At the instance of the defendant, a writ of error was awarded by one of the judges of this court. The plaintiff in error will be hereafter referred to as the defendant, and the defendant in error as the plaintiff.

The defendant assigns several errors:

First. "The court erred in not sustaining the demurrers to the original, and the amended notice of motion, respectively."

Second. "The court erred in striking out the evidence of Cane, Foltz and Pool, relating to conversations between these witnesses and the plaintiff in reference to the meaning of the contract of employment both before and after its execution, and in giving plaintiff's instructions."

Third. "The court erred in striking out the evidence of R. F. Leedy, and the letter introduced as a part thereof."

Fourth. "The court erred in refusing defendant's instructions Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6."

Fifth. "The court erred in allowing Chas. Conrad to be recalled 'after all but one of the instructions were in, and permitting him to testify that the plaintiff was a duly licensed land broker.'"

Sixth. "The court erred in overruling defendant's motion to set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial on the grounds that said verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence."

The grounds of demurrer assigned to the first notice of motion were: (1) That the notice "did not set forth the contract of employment"; (2) that it did not aver facts showing a full performance of the plaintiff's duty, and a performance of all it undertook to do under the contract.

The grounds assigned to the second notice were the same as the foregoing, and the following additional ground:

"The amended notice is not sufficient in law in this, that the said notice on its face, shows that the plaintiff did not perform the contract alleged."

[1-3] The court sustained the first demurrer in so far as to require allegations of performance, but refused to require the plaintiff to set out the contract in full. The procedure in this case was by motion for judgment, a procedure destitute of formalities. All that is required in the notice is to give the opposing party a sufficient idea of the grounds of action relied on, and to state a good cause of action. Great informality is allowed, but the notice must state a case, and must have the requisite certainty. Burks' Pleading and Practice (2d Ed.) pp. 223, 224.

It is not necessary to set out in a notice, in hæc verba, the instrument relied upon, but so much of the same as is essential may be set out according to its legal effect. This principle is stated in Buster v. Wallace, 4 H. & M. (Va.) 82, as follows:

"In declaring on a covenant, it is sufficient to set out the substance and legal effect only of such parts of the deed as are necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover."

See, also, Reynolds v. Hurst, 18 W. Va. p. 654, and cases cited, and 9 Cyc. Contracts, p. 714.

In the instant case the notice sufficiently advised the defendant of the amount claimed, the nature of the claim, and the ground on which it was made, and of the instrument under which the claim was asserted. While the notice does not set out the contract, it does set out according to its legal effect so much of the same as is required for a statement of the plaintiff's case. The objection that the notice was "insufficient in that it shows on its face that the plaintiff did not perform the contract alleged" is not well taken. Recovery is not dependent in all cases upon a complete performance of a contract. The defendant's misconduct may render a complete performance impossible. In such a case the party not in fault is entitled to recover damages. This will be a recovery growing out of the contract. The notice afforded the following details: (1) That the plaintiff claimed a specific sum of money; (2) that it was due as compensation for selling certain lots for the defendant; (3) that the work was done under, and pursuant to, a designated contract between the parties, giving the legal effect of that portion of the contract relating to compensation for sales made by the plaintiff. If more details were required, a bill of particulars should have been demanded. The demurrers were properly overruled.

[4] Defendant insists that clauses 4 and 5 of the contract are conflicting, rendering that portion of the instrument "ambiguous or uncertain, and on that account the evidence of the defendant and his witnesses, Cane and Pool, relating to conversations between these witnesses, and the plaintiff, before and after its execution," should have been admitted on the trial. These clauses are as follows:

"Fourth. The party of the first part does agree to pay to the party of the second part at the close of the sale all excess above $5,000.00 in cash of the gross receipts of the sale, as evidenced by contracts signed by the purchaser arising from the sale.

"Fifth. The party of the first part agrees to place a minimum price on each lot or tract, so that the sum total will aggregate $5,000.00, and agrees to pay to party of the second part — per cent. commissions in cash at the close of sale, and 100 per cent. of excess over and above the price placed on any particular tract or lot."

There is no conflict between sections 4 and 5, and no ambiguity patent, or latent, nor do these sections "mutually destroy each other, and render the instrument void." Section 4 contemplates a complete execution of the contract, and a sale of all the lots. In that event the party of the first part is to receive the agreed price on the lots—that is $5,000—and the party of the second part is to receive the excess over the agreed aggregate. Should the aggregate sales price be equal to or fall below the agreed price, the party of the second part would receive nothing. In that respect the contract was one of hazard, quoad the realty company. Section 5 is not altogether clear with respect to the 100 per cent. of the excess over and above the price paid to the party of the second part. Manifestly, however, it does not mean that in event the lots were completely sold the realty company should receive the excess, if any, over the agreed values of $5,000, and in addition the full amount of the excess of the sale price of each lot over the agreed valuation of same. Conceivably the lots might bring over $5,000, say, for illustration, $7,000. This would give the realty company $2,000 as commissions. Some of the individual lots might bring more, others less, than the agreed valuation. The aggregate excess of the lots selling above the agreed valuation might be, say, $2,500. Manifestly, as stated supra, the realty company would not be entitled to this $2,500, in addition to the $2,000, of excess over the agreed aggregate valuation of $5,000. The explanation of the provision for the payment to the realty company of the excess over the price placed on any particular tract will be found in the following extract from section 7 of the contract:

"Sec. 7. * * * In the event the party of the first part sells, or conveys any part of the lots hereinbefore mentioned before the expiration of the agreement, then the party of the first part agrees to pay to the party of the second part, the commission as set forth in this agreement."

Should the party of the first part exercise his right under section 7 to sell a lot or lots before the expiration of the agreement, selling the same for an amount exceeding the valuation price, the realty company would be entitled to the excess, since in such case the said company is to receive "the commission as set forth in this agreement," and obviously this could not refer to anything but the provision for "100 per cent. of the excess over and above the price placed on any particular tract or lot" contained in section 5.

[5, 6] It is the function of the court to construe a written contract, looking to the entire instrument in the discharge of that function. In the case in judgment the trial court appears to have properly construed the instrument in question, when in view of the facts relating to the breach of the contract it instructed the jury that the amount of recovery to which the plaintiff was entitled, in the event they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff sold certain lots embraced in the contract, and the purchasers executed the bonds, and paid the cash payment required by the contract, was such a sum as would equal the aggregate of the excess realized on the sales, over and above the prices placed on the lots. The contract did not in express language provide the terms of compensation of the party of the second part in the event that a complete sale under the contract was made impossible of execution by the improper and illegal conduct of the party of the first part. But it would seem to follow from the contract, and particularly from the provisions of sections 4 and 8, when a sale of the lots was in progress, and the party of the second part was not at fault, and the lots already sold, constituting about one-third of the lots listed, had brought one and all a price in excess of the agreed valuation (a considerable number of them as much as 50 per cent. in excess of such valuation), and under such circumstances the sale was not completed by reason of the untenable attitude of defendant, that the proper amount to which the plaintiff would be entitled in an action for compensation would be the amount indicated by the instruction of the trial court. The valuation of the lots sold was $2,285, and of the unsold lots $2,715. Section 8 of the contract provides that, should any lots remain at the close of the sale, the party of the first part should take them back at the price placed upon them. This section would apply both when some of the lots offered were not taken by the bidders, and in a case in which the failure to complete a sale was due to the party of the first part. Hence in the case in judgment, under the ruling of the court, the defendant would take back 44 unsold lots, valued at $2,715 so that he would have these lots, and, if he allowed the sales made to stand, bonds and cash aggregating $3,342.50, subject to a deduction in favor of the plaintiff for the excess amounting to $1,057.50. The trial court properly construed the contract in the respect complained of.

[7] The defendant claims that prior to the execution of the contract of employment with the realty company he had a conversation with Chas. Conrad, president of said company, in relation to the meaning of same. He sought at the trial to prove this conversation, and thereby establish said meaning by his own testimony and that of the witnesses Cane and Pool: in other words, he sought to give a meaning to the contract other than that to be derived by legal construction. This was an impingement upon the rule forbidding the use of parol evidence to vary a written instrument. Subsequent to the alleged conversation, the parties entered into a valid written agreement. The well-established principle is that, where there is such an agreement, the whole sense of the parties is presumed to be contained in it, and parol evidence is not admitted to vary or contradict same. There are some definite exceptions to this rule, but, upon the facts presented in the instant case, this is not one of them. It is not considered that the court erred in excluding the testimony of Foltz and others relating to the above conversation with Conrad.

[8] The plaintiff rests his claim to commissions in the instant case upon the ground that it had discharged its undertakings under the contract, fulfilling the same in all respects, and that the failure to complete the sale and sell all of the lots was due to the misconduct of the defendant.

Conceding that this was all of the case, it would undoubtedly be true that the default of the defendant would not defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery. The general principle is that, if a broker performs his part of a contract empowering him to sell the lands of a principal, and does all that he is required to do, and the sale is not consummated by reason of the default of the principal, the broker is entitled to his commissions, as the principal cannot wrongfully interfere with the broker and escape liability. See 43 L. R. A. note p. 606.

When a broker has effected a bargain and sale by a contract which is mutually obligatory on the vendor and the vendee, he is entitled to his commission whether the vendor chooses to comply with, or enforce the contract, or not. Love v. Miller, 53 Ind. 294, 21 Am. Rep. 192.

If the testimony adduced on behalf of the broker shows that he produced a purchaser acceptable to the owner, able and willing to purchase on the terms offered by the owner, and that the failure to consummate the sale was due entirely to the failure of the owner to enter into a binding contract with such purchaser, the broker will still be entitled to his commissions. Woodall v. Foster, 91 Tenn. 195-197, 18 S. W. 241; Chatham v. Yarbrough, 90 Tenn. 77, 15 S. W. 1076.

To the same effect is the following: The refusal of a principal to accept a purchaser found by the broker will not defeat the broker's right to commissions where such purchaser is ready, willing, and able to purchase on the principal's terms. Wright v. Brown, 68 Mo. App. 577-583; Chipley v. Leathe, 60 Mo. App. 20.

The effect of the foregoing rulings is that, once a broker negotiates a sale which conforms to the agreement of the parties, it rests with the vendor to complete the transaction and make the deed, and if he fails to do so, and the sale falls through by reason of the failure of the principal, the broker, being without default, is entitled to his commissions. The precedents are in full accord with reason in respect to the plaintiff's right of recovery upon the facts supposed supra.

[9] The defendant, however, insists that he did not arbitrarily refuse to carry out the contract between him and the realty company, but declined to do so in good faith, for the reason that he had discovered his title to be defective. Even that defense, if supported by the facts, was not sufficient to defeat the broker's right to his commissions, provided the latter had proceeded in good faith to secure purchasers who were willing and able to purchase the property, upon the terms of the contract. When a vendor undertakes to make a good title to prospective purchasers, and a broker in conformity with the contract proceeds to secure purchasers, and tender them, but the vendor, in consequence of supervening information as to his title, ascertains that the same is bad, and on that account declines to make conveyances, such action on his part will not defeat the broker's right to compensation, the latter being in nowise at fault.

When the title of the principal is defective, so that the sale cannot be carried out, the general doctrine is as follows:

"If the broker has acted in good faith, performed his contract, and done all that he was bound to do, and the sale with the purchaser procured by the broker is not carried out, or falls through owing to the defective title of the principal (the vendor), the broker will be entitled to his commissions in the absence of evidence showing that the broker had knowledge of such defect." (Italics supplied.) See cases cited in note 1, 43 L. R. A. 609.

When the broker has done all that he is bound to do under the contract, and secured purchasers, he is entitled to his commissions, and his right to compensation does not depend upon the validity or invalidity of the principal's title. The broker is not responsible for the condition of the principal's title, and it is no part of his duty, as a general proposition, to look to the same.

If the broker does not know of defects in the principal's title at the time he enters into the contract, or at the time he performs the work, he has the right to assume that the title to the property is free from infirmity, and in such case he is entitled to commissions. Berg v. San Antonio Street R. Co., 17 Tex. Civ. App. 291, 42 S. W. 647, 43 S. W. 929; Gibson v. Gray, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 646, 43 S. W. 922; Peet v. Sherwood, 43 Minn. 447, 45 N. W. 859.

The agent by his agreement to negotiate a sale assumes no obligation or responsibility in reference to the title, and his right to commissions is not dependent upon the contingency of the principal's title being good. Gerhart v. Peck, 42 Mo. App. 644, 651; Davis v. Morgan, 96 Ga. 519, 520, 23 S. E. 417.

Hence defendant's refusal to make general warranty deeds to the purchasers who complied with the terms of the sale conducted by the plaintiff, on the ground that he had discovered that his deed was a special warranty deed, and that "he could only give the kind of deed he had, i. e., all the right and title the boom company had," was a failure on his part to carry out the written contract, which provided for "a good warranty deed to all purchasers complying with the terms of the sale." Defendant's default in the above respect would not relieve him from liability to the plaintiff for commissions on account of sales made. To permit him to do so would be to allow him to take advantage of his own wrong to the prejudice of another who was without fault.

So far we have found no contentions of the defendant sufficient to constitute a defense to the plaintiff's claim.

[10] But there is another assignment of error, which presents a more serious question, to wit: That the plaintiff was aware that the plaintiff's title was defective, or at least had information which would put him, or any intending purchaser, on inquiry, and, with this information in his exclusive possession, had proceeded to conduct the sale and receive bids.

On the trial of the case the defendant put Col. R. F. Leedy, a lawyer of Luray, Page county, on the stand. This witness was allowed to testify as follows:

"Am a practicing lawyer at Luray. Conrad, not less than six days, nor more than ten days, after the contract in question was entered into, asked me to advise him as to the title of the 12 acres of land mentioned in these proceedings. I advised him by letter October 23d, giving my opinion of title, that it was bad, and gave reasons. Conrad had asked me to be present at the sale, and, as I was a candidate for nomination in the primaries at that time, make a speech, but I didn't attend the sale."

The defendant asked the witness to produce and read to the jury the letter or report on the title of the 12-acre tract, of date October 23d, referred to in his evidence. Said letter is as follows:

"Oct. 23, 1921.

"C. C. Conrad, Harrisonburg, Va.—Dear Charley: I have looked into the R. P. Foltz land title, and find that his conveyance, while prescribing a boundary of some 14 acres and 125 poles, giving the metes and bounds, only attempts to convey certain lots within the same, viz, blocks 29, 30, and 33, and lots 501, 502, 503, 508, 507, 509, and 510, in block 31, and lots 201 to 206, 207, 208, 209, in block 36 in section 1, upon a certain map entitled 'Plan of Stanley, Page County, Va.' It will be seen, therefore, that while Mr. Foltz holds the entire inclusive survey in possession, there are a number of lots within it to which he took no title. They are so interspersed through the survey that there are bound to be many lots in a new layout as to which there would in some cases be part, and possibly in some cases all, without title in Mr. Foltz. It is easy to see, therefore, that I could not be present at such a sale, as my presence would be construed as some sort of sanction of the validity of the title. I am sorry that such is the case, as I should be very glad to serve you at any time.

"Sincerely yours."

The court refused to permit this letter to be read. Later, on motion of the plaintiff, the court struck out Col. Leedy's evidence. To this action of the court, and also to its action refusing to allow the letter to be read, the defendant duly excepted.

The court refused to admit the letter of Col. Leedy, and ordered his testimony to be stricken out, doubtless upon the theory that neither his testimony or report established that the title of the defendant to the lots in question was bad. The determination of that point was a question for the court. It might well be that, after all, the judgment of Col. Leedy in respect of Foltz's title was at fault, and upon a judicial determination such title would be ascertained to be valid. But this was not the precise question intended to be raised by the testimony of Col. Leedy and the introduction of his letter. This evidence was designed to affect the plaintiff and its right to commissions by showing that it had obtained information which, as a matter of propriety and good faith, it should have submitted to intending purchasers. It was not matter that necessarily established the invalidity of defendant's title, but it was matter that would give any intending purchaser pause. Indeed we may feel assured that, if this report had been divulged on the day of sale, there would have been no purchasers. In the judgment of a reputable attorney, the title of the defendant was so defective that "there were bound to be many lots in a new layout, as to which there would in some cases be part, and possibly in some cases all without title in Mr. Foltz." So impressed was the attorney with the invalidity of the title that he was unwilling to be present at the sale, lest his presence would be construed as "some sort of sanction of the validity of the title."

The general rule stated supra that a broker is not deprived of his right to commissions by the supervening ascertainment of defects in a principal's title does not apply when the broker has notice of the defective title. If at the time a broker makes sale of property he has knowledge of or information of defects in the title, and by reason of those defects the sale cannot be made effective, he is not entitled to his commissions. See Hoyt v. Shipherd, 70 Ill. 309, 311. Once in the possession of such information, it is the broker's duty to submit same to an intending buyer, and, before offering him as a purchaser to ascertain if the latter would take a possibly defective title. If upon communication of such information the purchaser would still be willing to buy and take the title agreed to be given by the principal's contract, for instance, a deed with general warranty, the broker would be entitled to his commissions from the principal, if the subsequent failure to make a deed is the fault of the latter.

"Where * * * the broker brings to the principal a customer who is ready, able, and willing to purchase the land upon the principal's terms, and no sale be effected, the broker is entitled to his commissions, provided the failure to make sale result from the fault of the principal." Brackenridge v. Claridge, 91 Tex. 527, 44 S. W. 819, 43 L. R. A. 600.

It is essential to the broker's right of commission in such cases that he himself is not at fault, and that he does not know of the defect at the time of finding a customer, but he is under no implied obligation to find out whether the owner actually has the title which he claims. 9 C. J. p. 629.

When brokers undertake to sell land with knowledge of defects in title, or reason to believe that such defects exist, it is their duty to disclose the fact to the prospective purchaser.

"A broker is not entitled to a commission on the purchase price of land when the sale fails because of a defect in the title of which defect the broker had notice, or was charged with notice at the time he entered into the contract to sell the land." Montgomery v. Amsler, 57 Tex. Civ. App. 216, 122 S. W. 307.

See, also McKinnon v. Hope, 118 Ga. 462, 45 S. E. 413.

In the case in judgment the realty company undertook to investigate the state of the defendant's title. In the course of this investigation it secured information which was certainly sufficient to put it on inquiry, and which it was as much its duty to make known to the bidders on the day of the sale as it was the duty of the broker in the case supra to communicate to a prospective purchaser the broker's knowledge of an outstanding lease. Honesty and fair dealing required that the knowledge which the realty company had secured by its independent inquiry, and which certainly would have seriously affected the bidding, should have been promulgated for the benefit of prospective bidders. The realty company claims that it is entitled to commissions on the ground that it has secured purchasers ready and willing to purchase the principal's lots on the principal's terms, as set out in the written agreement, and that any failure of consummation was the fault of the principal. But the broker has not secured such purchasers as the law contemplates. The purchasers were entitled before bidding to the knowledge that the broker possessed, whether that knowledge was of an actual defect of title, or information that would put a bidder on inquiry before proceeding further.

In the instant case the court rejected the testimony relating to the broker's information touching the defendant's title, refused all the instructions prayed by the defendant, and gave a single instruction, practically directing the jury to find for the plaintiff. The court should have received the testimony of Col. Leedy and his report on the title in question to his client, the realty company, and, if no further evidence was submitted in that connection, should have instructed the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the company possessed such knowledge relating to defendant's title as would have put a reasonably prudent man on inquiry, and had failed to communicate such knowledge to the bidders, it could not recover the commissions claimed. Of course, it would have been competent for the plaintiff to submit further evidence on the above line, and undertake to secure a ruling from the court that upon the whole the title which was the subject of the adverse report was a good and valid one. Such a ruling from the court would have left the broker in a position to recover commissions in spite of its failure to communicate the information in its possession. For the error of the court in respect of rejecting the testimony of the defendant, submitted to show that the plaintiff at the time of sale had information of the state of defendant's title which it should have submitted to the bidders, and in giving a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the plaintiff, this case must be reversed, and remanded for a further trial to be had by the plaintiff, if desired, upon the principles announced and conclusions reached in this opinion. There are other assignments of error which have not been formally disposed of, but they are without merit.

Reversed.

BAILEY v. HINES, Director General of Railroads.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. United States ⇨125—Action against Director General of Railroads against railroads under federal control is in effect a suit to which the United States is a party.

An action against a Director General of Railroads and his successor in office, as agent designated by the President against whom suits against railroads should be brought is, in substance and effect, a suit against the United States.

2. United States ⇨125—Conditions prescribed by government for bringing suit against it must be complied with.

Federal government had power to deny the right of suing it for acts growing out of its management of railroads or to prescribe terms and conditions for such suits, and when so prescribed they must be complied with.

3. Railroads ⇨5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Director General suable without naming him.

Under General Order No. 50A, issued by the Director General of Railroads concerning suits against railroads, an action against the Director General of Railroads in his official capacity may be directed against the Director General of Railroads without naming him personally.

4. Railroads ⇨5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Federal agent appointed under Transportation Act suable without naming him.

In a suit to subject to plaintiff's claim the revolving fund set apart by the government for that purpose, the designation of the defendant as Director General of Railroads and his successor in office as the agent provided for in section 206 of the Transportation Act Cong. Feb. 28, 1920 and designated under the proclamation of the President of the United States, is a sufficient designation, and the name of the incumbent of the office may be properly omitted or, if inserted, stricken out.

5. Railroads ⇨5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Procedure not affected by federal control.

The Federal Control Act Cong. March 21, 1918, § 10 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 3115½j), providing that carriers under federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers except in so far as might be inconsistent with such control, preserved to the public the benefit of bringing actions in the same courts, by the forms of procedure and practice in force before the roads were taken over by the government.

6. Railroads ⇨5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Declaration amendable by correcting name of federal agent.

Under Code 1919, § 6104, allowing liberal rights of amending pleadings, in a suit against an agent designated by the President to defend actions against railroads under federal control, plaintiff may amend the declaration by correcting the name of the agent.

7. Pleading ⇨230—Statute allowing amendment liberally construed.

Code 1919, § 6104, providing for amendment of pleadings, should be liberally construed.

Error to Circuit Court, Clarke County.

Action by Bailey against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Charles & Duncan Curry, of Staunton, and W. T. Lewis, of Berryville, for plaintiff in error.

Wm. F. Keyser, of Luray, and W. R. Staples, of Roanoke, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. This action was brought on August 17, 1920, for a personal injury alleged to have been inflicted upon the plaintiff on August 21, 1919, by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, while the same was under federal control. The defendant named in the writ was Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and his successor in office, as the agent provided for in section 206 of the Transportation Act, approved February 28, 1920 (41 Stat. 461), and designated under the proclamation of the President of the United States of America, March 11, 1920. The defendant, designating himself as "sometime Director General of Railroads and agent designated by the President under section 206 of an act of Congress entitled the 'Transportation Act,'" appeared at rules, in proper person, and pleaded in abatement that, before the institution of the action, he had resigned as such Director General of Railroads and agent, and that John Barton Payne had been appointed in his room and stead, and was at the time of the institution of said action and at the time of the filing of said plea such Director General and agent. The defendant at the same time moved the court to quash the writ in said cause on the same grounds stated in his plea in abatement and because said writ was without authority of law and was hence invalid. The plaintiff thereupon asked leave to amend his declaration and writ by substituting the name of John Barton Payne for that of Walker D. Hines, and also moved the court to reject the defendant's plea in abatement, and to dismiss his motion to quash, which request the court declined, and also overruled said motions. The plaintiff then tendered a special replication that the action was not against Walker D. Hines in his individual capacity, but against the presidential agent under the transportation act, but the court declined to receive it. It having developed since the filing of defendant's plea that John Barton Payne had resigned as such Director General of Railroads and presidential agent, and that James C. Davis had been appointed in his room and stead, the plaintiff moved the court for liberty to amend his declaration and writ by substituting the name of James C. Davis for that of Walker D. Hines, and that the cause be remanded to rules for that purpose, but the court overruled said motion and entered judgment that the action of the plaintiff be dismissed. It is manifest from these proceedings that no relief is asked against the defendant, Hines, in either a personal or official capacity; that he has no interest in this litigation; and that the relief sought is against the presidential agent with a view to obtaining compensation from the fund set apart by the government of the United States for that purpose.

[1, 2] The plaintiff's objection to commencing a new action is that it would be barred by the statute of limitations. The action is in substance and effect a suit against the United States. Such suits are controversies to which the United States are a party. "Though in name against an officer, in fact they assert a liability of the government, and a judgment will be paid out of its funds." Westbrook v. Director General (D. C.) 263 Fed. 211, 213, and cases cited.

The federal government, like all other sovereign powers, had the power to deny the right to institute any suits against itself for acts growing out of its management and operation of the railroads, or to prescribe the terms and conditions under which such suits might be brought. When so prescribed they must be complied with, whether reasonable or unreasonable, or else the suit will be dismissed. Hans v. State of Louisiana, 134 U. S. 1, 17, 10 Sup. Ct. 504, 33 L. Ed. 842, and cases cited.

During the great World War, the United States, in the exercise of its war power, took control of practically all of the transportation companies in continental United States, including the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. This control was taken pursuant to a proclamation of the President of December 28, 1917, under authority of an act of Congress of August 29, 1916 (U. S. Comp. St. § 1974a). This action of the President was confirmed by an act of Congress of March 21, 1918 (known as the Federal Control Act [U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½p]), by which it was provided, amongst other things:

"That carriers while under federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such federal control or with any order of the President. Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the federal government. * * * But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such federal control." Section 3115½j.

The President's proclamation of December 28, 1917, also declared:

"It is hereby directed that the possession, control and operation of such transportation systems hereby by me undertaken shall be exercised through William G. McAdoo, who is hereby appointed Director General of Railroads."

The Director General was given authority to direct how suits should be prosecuted against the carriers under his control, and by General Order No. 50 he directed that actions at law and suits in equity for causes of action arising under the federal control should be brought directly "against William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, and not otherwise." After a brief service, Mr. McAdoo resigned, and Walker D. Hines was appointed in his room and stead, and soon after his appointment issued General Order No. 50a, by which he directed that all such actions at law and suits in equity should be brought against the "Director General of Railroads and not otherwise," omitting the name of the incumbent.

So matters continued until federal control was terminated by the act of Congress of February 28, 1920 (known as the Transportation Act). Section 206, paragraph (a), of that section is as follows:

"Actions at law, suits in equity and proceedings in admiralty, based on causes of action arising out of the possession, use, or operation by the President of railroad or system of transportation of any carrier (under the provisions of the Federal Control Act, or of the act of August 29, 1916) of such character as prior to federal control could have been brought against such carrier, may, after the termination of federal control, be brought against an agent designated by the President for such purpose, which agent shall be designated by the President within thirty days after the passage of this act. Such actions, suits, or proceedings may, within the periods of limitation now prescribed by state or federal statutes but not later than two years from the date of the passage of this act, be brought in any court which but for federal control would have had jurisdiction of the cause of action had it arisen against such carrier."

Pursuant to this section, the President by proclamation bearing date March 11, 1920, designated and appointed "Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and his successor in office, as the agent provided for in section 206 of said act, approved February 28, 1920." The two positions of Director General of Railroads and of agent were thus united in the same person, although such union was not required. Not only so, but the Director General of Railroads, not named, but whoever he might be, and his successor in office, was to be presidential agent under the act, so that in future the Director General of Railroads would also be agent, unless a different person was designated and appointed as such agent. Thereafter, Walker D. Hines, by separate resignations, resigned as Director General of Railroads and as agent, effective May 18, 1920. These resignations were accepted, and the President, by one proclamation, dated May 14, 1920, appointed "John Barton Payne, of Illinois, Director General of Railroads in the stead of said Walker D. Hines as Director General of Railroads"; and by another proclamation of the same date appointed the said "John Barton Payne, Director General of Railroads, and his successor in office, as the agent provided for in section 206 of said act, approved February 28, 1920." Thus matters stood on August 17, 1920, when the present action was brought, not against John Barton Payne, in his official capacity, but against "Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and his successor in office, as the agent provided for in section 206 of the Transportation Act approved February 28, 1920, and designated under proclamation of the President of the United States of America, dated March 11, 1920."

[3] In an action against the Director General of Railroads under the Federal Control Act it was unnecessary to name the incumbent under the provision of General Order No. 50a, for the "Director General of Railroads is not here sued as an individual, or even by name, but as an officer, and stands for the United States." Westbrook v. Director General, supra. Relief was not sought against the incumbent of the office either personally or officially, but against the government. In Blevins v. Hines (D. C.) 264 Fed. 1005, 1006, it is said:

"It should also be said that the intent of General Order No. 50a is that the defendant shall be the official, and not the individual, who happens to be in office at the time of suit."

In that case the name of Walker D. Hines, preceding the words "Director General of Railroads" was stricken out as surplusage.

[4] The object of this action has been from its inception, and is still, to subject to the plaintiff's claim the "revolving rund" set apart by the government for that purpose, and the action has been and is in effect a suit against the United States to accomplish that purpose. The office of Director General of Railroads was permanent, the incumbent temporary and changeable, and in the vast extent of territory subject to the Federal Control Act it could not be expected that the citizens could be promptly apprised of the changes in the personnel of these temporary incumbents, and hence the wisdom of the provision of General Order No. 50a dispensing with the name of such incumbent. This regulation had doubtless been found to work well, and so when the Transportation Act was enacted, it required suits brought thereafter to be brought against "an agent designated by the President." Nowhere is there any requirement that the name of the agent should be given in the pleadings. "The agent designated by the President" was a permanent position or office, while the incumbent would be temporary and changeable, and so by analogy to suits against the Director General of Railroads, it would seem that a suit or action against "The agent provided for in section 206 of the Transportation Act, approved February 28, 1920, and designated under the proclamation of the President of the United States of America, March 11, 1920," is a sufficient designation of the proper defendant, and that the name of the incumbent for the time being might be properly omitted, or, if inserted, stricken out as surplusage. Counsel for the defendant in error, in discussing the method by which the presidential agent should be designated, says:

"Such designation can be made in only one of two ways—by the proper name of the individual so designated, or possibly by descriptive matter clearly identifying some individual."

Strike out the name of Walker D. Hines in the declaration and writ, and there remains the description used by the President in this proclamation making the appointment, and in his language. What more could be needed? "The agent designated by the President under section 206 of the Transportation Act, approved February 28, 1920," as accurately describes the presidential agent as "Director General of Railroads" does the appointee to that position.

The government, in taking over the transportation lines for war purposes, manifestly intended to interfere with the rights and remedies of citizens against said lines as little as possible. Hence the comprehensive provision with reference to suits and actions contained in section 10 hereinbefore quoted.

"The plain purpose of the above provision was to preserve to the general public the rights and remedies against common carriers which it enjoyed at the time the railroads were taken over by the President, except in so far as such rights or remedies might interfere with the needs of federal operation. The provision applies equally to cases where suits against the carrier companies were pending in the courts on December 28, 1917, to cases where the cause of action arose before that date and the suit against the company was filed after it, and to cases where both cause of action and suit had arisen or might arise during federal operation. The government was to operate the carriers, but the usual immunity of the sovereign from legal liability was not to prevent the enforcement of liabilities ordinarily incident to the operation of carriers. The situation was analogous to that which would exist if there were a general receivership of each transportation system. Operation was to be continued as theretofore with the old personnel, subject to change by executive order. The courts were to go on entertaining suits and entering judgments under existing law, but the property in the hands of the President for war purposes was not to be disturbed. With that exception the substantial legal rights of persons having dealings with the carriers were not to be affected by the change of control.

"This purpose Congress accomplished by providing that 'carriers while under federal control' should remain subject to all then existing laws and liabilities and that they might sue and be sued as theretofore."

[5] The conditions produced by the federal control of railroads were anomalous, and it seems fairly plain that Congress did not intend to interpose technical difficulties in the way of the general public in the assertion of their rights, at least so far as the establishment of the liability was concerned, but to leave the general public free to sue in the same courts, in the same forms of procedure and to have the benefit of the same rules of pleading and practice it enjoyed before the roads were taken over by the government, even though the suit was in effect against the United States. Except as to the enforcement of the judgment after it was obtained, "the substantial legal rights of persons having dealings with the carriers were not to be affected by the change of control." Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Ault, supra.

[6, 7] As already stated, this action is and has been ever since its institution substantially a suit against the United States, and the defense here made is that there was error in using the name of Walker D. Hines instead of that of John Barton Payne, as the agent designated by the President to be sued. If this change had been made, the defendant would have been described in the exact language of the President's proclamation appointing John Barton Payne as the President's agent. The defense is purely technical. The suit is none the less a suit against the United States for an injury alleged to have been inflicted by the Norfolk & Western Railway Company while under federal control, whether the agent to be sued was correctly named or not. The process was served on the identical person who would have been served if the agent had been correctly named, and the same counsel who filed the plea for Walker D. Hines in the trial court appeared and argued this case before us, although no relief against Hines, personally or officially, is asked. This can only mean that the defense is made on behalf of the real defendant, the government, which has in this guise appeared and made defense both in this court and the court below. Even if it were necessary to give the name of the agent designated by the President who was to be the defendant in this suit, on discovery of the fact that a wrong name had been used, the trial court should have permitted the plaintiff to amend his declaration by inserting the correct name. This should have been permitted under the very liberal practice with reference to amendments prevailing in this state, but the cases need not be cited, for the Legislature has made it statutory by declaring that—

"In any suit, action, motion or other proceeding hereafter instituted, the court may at any time in furtherance of justice, and upon such terms as it may deem just, permit any pleading to be amended, or material supplemental matter to be set forth in amended or supplemental pleadings. The court shall, at every stage of the proceedings, disregard any error or defect which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties. If substantial amendment is made in pursuance of this section, the court shall make such order as to continuance and costs as shall seem fair and just." Code, § 6104.

This statute we have declared should be liberally construed. Standard Paint Co. v. Vietor, 120 Va. 595, 91 S. E. 752. It could make no difference to the government of the United States, when it had due notice of, and full opportunity to defend the action, whether the agent to be sued was rightly named or not. It was clearly "in furtherance of justice" to permit the amendment to be made, and it was error to refuse it. The substantial rights of the government are not affected by permitting the amendment to be made, but the claim of the plaintiff will be barred by the statute of limitations if it is denied. A refusal to allow the amendment would be a practical nullification of section 6104 of the Code.

After the case was argued and submitted, but before final judgment was entered, John Barton Payne resigned as Director General of Railroads and as presidential agent, and James C. Davis was appointed in his stead in each capacity, and the plaintiff asked to have his name substituted for that of Walker D. Hines in the writ and declaration, but the trial court refused to do so. Between March 10, 1920, and March 27, 1921, three different persons held the position of Director General of Railroads and presidential agent, showing how transitory was the position of incumbent, and the wisdom of permitting suits or actions against the officer or agent without the necessity of designating the name of the incumbent. No difficulty appears to have been encountered in suing the "Director General of Railroads" without naming the incumbent, and it is not apparent how any difficulty should be encountered in suits against the agent designated by the President in like manner.

We have carefully considered the pertinent authorities cited in the briefs and in the opinion of the learned trial judge, but have not deemed it necessary to review them here, and have cited only such cases and statutes as seemed needful in support of the reasoning of the opinion. The authorities referred to in the cases we have cited, especially the Ault Case, furnish satisfactory reasons for the conclusions we have reached. The case of Mason v. Bank, 12 Leigh (39 Va.) 84, so confidently relied on for the defendant in error, we do not regard as applicable to the facts of this case. There certain persons were sued as a corporation who had not been incorporated, and the court very pertinently observed that—

"The essential error is that the suit is brought against defendants, who have no corporate character, and yet not against them in their individual characters."

No such question is here involved. Here a claim against the United States is sought to be enforced against it through the medium provided by it, but a mistake is made in giving the name of the agent it has designated to defend the suit. Process was duly served on the agent of the proper defendant, and the sole question is, Shall the plaintiff be allowed to amend his declaration and writ by giving the correct name of the agent in office at the time the action was brought. The amendment would seem to be fully authorized by section 6104 of the Code (first enacted in this state in 1914), if, indeed, it is necessary that the name of the agent should be stated in the pleadings. The substantial rights of the plaintiff would not be left "unaffected by the change of control" if the amendment requested were refused.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the trial court will be reversed, and, in order to meet any possible view that may be taken of the case, and any change that may take place in the incumbent of "the agent designated by the President," the trial court will be directed to permit the plaintiff to amend his declaration by striking out the name of Walker D. Hines, and, if he shall so desire, to substitute in lieu thereof the name of whoever may at the time be the incumbent of the position of "agent designated by the President," and to make such other amendments as the plaintiff may desire and to the court shall seem proper, and also with leave to the plaintiff to sue out new or additional process, if he shall be advised that the same is necessary or proper. Reversed.

EWING et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF NELSON COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Eminent domain §262(4)—Finding of damages in condemnation proceeding not disturbed.

Where the reviewing court is unable to say that finding as to amount of damages in eminent domain proceeding is without substantial support, it will not interfere.

2. Highways §41(4)—Proceedings to establish road held not erroneous because viewers were permitted to give opinion as to proper width.

Proceedings to establish a road were not erroneous because viewers appointed under Code 1919, § 1977, were directed to report on the question as to how wide the road should be, the width of the road as finally fixed representing the independent judgment and action of the supervisors.

3. Highways §33—County supervisors, proceeding under general law to establish road, held not required to file map or plat.

Though in proceedings under the General Road Law (Code 1919, §§ 1977-1980) commissioners appointed to condemn land are directed by section 1980 to comply with the eminent domain law so far as applicable, and section 4385 provides that the proceedings to condemn a right of way shall be according to the provisions of the eminent domain chapter, county supervisors, in proceedings to establish a road under the general law, wherein the viewers returned with their report a map or diagram contemplated by section 1978, were not required to file a map or plat showing the cuts, fills, trestles, bridges, etc., pursuant to section 4364, the direction in section 1980, relating to the oath, procedure, and report pursuant to sections 4366 to 4368, and it being evident that the viewers in such case had, and that commissioners in every case under the general law will have, the benefit of such surveying as may be necessary to determine the location, width, and grade of the road, and thus be able to determine approximately the amount of work to be done, and fix the damages accordingly.

Error to Circuit Court, Nelson County.

Proceeding by the Board of Supervisors of Nelson County to establish a road through the lands of H. and E. N. Ewing. From an order establishing the road and fixing the compensation, the landowners bring error. Affirmed.

J. T. Coleman, Jr., of Lynchburg, for plaintiffs in error.

S. B. Whitehead and L. Grafton Tucker, both of Lovington, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This is a case in which the board of supervisors of Nelson county have undertaken to establish a county road through the lands of H. and H. N. Ewing in accordance with the provisions of the general road law of the state, as found in sections 1977 to 1980, inclusive, of the Code of 1919.

The proceeding was pending for more than two years prior to the date of the judgment here complained of. During that time a number of orders were entered by the supervisors, and a number of reports were made by various boards of viewers and commissioners. There was some irregularity in these orders and reports, but in the ultimate outcome of the proceedings there was a substantial compliance with all of the requirements of the general road law applicable to the case. From an order of the board of supervisors making a final adoption of the road through the premises, and allowing $500 for compensation and damages to the Ewings, the latter appealed to the circuit court of Nelson county. That court, having heard the evidence of witnesses and the arguments of counsel, entered the order here complained of, establishing the road and fixing the compensation and damages in like manner as had been done in the final order of the board of supervisors. Thereupon the Ewings applied for and obtained this writ of error.

The appellants, in their petition for the writ, assign errors as follows:

"First, the action of the court in overruling the motion to dismiss; second, in establishing the road at the location in question; third, in not allowing the landowners or petitioners sufficient compensation for the land taken and the damages to the residue; and, fourth, the failure to comply with the provisions of the Virginia statute on the subject of establishing and constructing roads and on the power of eminent domain; the result of which noncompliance is very material to the landowners."

Following these assignments the petition says:

"These assignments of error present questions that can and will be discussed together, or as one question. The principal question and the question most material to the petitioners is: Have they received just compensation for the land taken and the damages to the residue?"

[1] 1. The evidence was conflicting as to what amount should have been allowed by the court for compensation and damages to the landowners. Several boards of view had fixed it at various amounts, none of them in excess of $500. The court, upon a hearing de novo, saw and heard the witnesses, and fixed the amount at the latter sum. Upon a careful consideration of the evidence which was before the trial court, we are unable to say that its finding in this respect was without substantial support, and upon familiar principles we ought not to interfere unless we should find error in some of the other rulings complained of.

[2] 2. It is insisted that the proceedings by the board of supervisors were erroneous, and ought to have been dismissed, because the viewers appointed under the provisions of section 1977 of the Code were directed to report upon the question as to how wide the road should be. That section provides that—"the right of way for any public road shall be thirty feet wide, * * * unless the board of supervisors order a different width."

It is manifest from the provisions of the section as a whole that the purpose of the appointment of viewers is to furnish the supervisors with satisfactory information as to the advisability of establishing or altering roads, and there was no impropriety whatever in directing the viewers to report, as was done in this case, "what, in their opinion, should be the width of the proposed road or any part thereof." The record discloses that at a former stage in the proceedings the circuit court had reached the conclusion that a portion of the road in question ought to be less than 30 feet wide, but was of opinion that the authority to make this change rested solely with the board of supervisors, and the matter was accordingly referred back "to the board of supervisors of Nelson county, with recommendation that the width of said roadway or right of way be reduced to 15 feet as to a portion thereof." It was after this action by the court that the last board of viewers was appointed in the case, and directed, among other things, to report with reference to the width of the road. A report by the viewers was accordingly made, and thereafter the board itself finally fixed the width of the road, not following, however, the report and recommendation of the viewers in all respects. It thus appears that the width of the road, as finally fixed, represented the independent judgment and action of the board of supervisors, and was in literal compliance with the statute.

[3] 3. The real question in the case, and the one to which the argument of counsel for the landowners was chiefly directed, is whether the board of supervisors was bound under the law to file a map or plat showing cuts, fills, trestles, and bridges, etc., as required by section 4364 of the Code, being a part of the chapter concerning the exercise of the power of eminent domain. The map or diagram contemplated by section 1978 of the general road law, under which this proceeding was taken, was returned with the report of the viewers, but it is contended that, before they acted upon the question of damages and compensation, they should have been provided with such a map or plat as is required by section 4364.

In presenting this view, it is pointed out that section 1980, a part of the general road law, requires that "the commissioners, in the discharge of their duties, shall comply in all respects with the provisions of the chapter concerning the exercise of the power of eminent domain, so far as applicable;" and that section 4385, a part of the general law with reference to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, provides for the condemnation of a right of way for a public road by the board of supervisors of any county, and adds that "the proceedings in all such cases shall be according to the provisions of this chapter, so far as they can be applied to the same;" the contention apparently being that the county could only condemn the right of way after a compliance with the provisions of section 4364, supra.

This contention is settled adversely to the plaintiffs in error by the effect of the decision of this court in the case of the Board of Supervisors v. Proffit, 129 Va. —, 105 S. E. 666. In that case the board of supervisors of Louisa county had undertaken to condemn a right of way for a public highway under the provisions of the eminent domain law, and, while that proceeding was pending, instituted a new proceeding for substantially the same purpose under the general road law, and then dismissed the former proceeding and established the road and the compensation and damages under the latter. The landowners filed an injunction bill in the circuit court of Louisa county, which resulted in a final decree awarding a perpetual injunction restraining the supervisors from proceeding under the general road law. The case then came to this court on appeal, and was reversed, the court holding that any county has the right to acquire lands for public highways under either of the two general statutes above referred to. In that case we said:

"There are two methods, then, in Virginia, as the law now is, by which the boards of supervisors may acquire lands for public highways. They may at their election either proceed in the circuit court under the general statute authorizing the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or under the general road law, vesting jurisdiction in the boards of supervisors to exercise that power in proceedings for the establishment of highways, subject to appeal to the circuit court and ultimately to this court."

It seems clear that the reference in section 1980 of the general road law to the provisions of the chapter on eminent domain, quoted above, does not contemplate a compliance with section 4364, for the latter section directs the applicant to file the petition and accompanying map and profile, while the former (1980) merely directs the commissioners, in the exercise of their duties, to comply with the eminent domain law so far as applicable, which of course relates to their oath, procedure, and report. Code, §§ 4366, 4367, 4368.

It is contended that, if viewers or commissioners are called upon to fix damages without a survey and plat, as provided for in section 4364, they will have insufficient information as to the cuts and fills which may be made upon the road as contemplated at the time, and, further, that if the county should, after the first location and establishment of the road, subsequently change the grade, the landowner would, in violation of the present Constitution of the state, be left without remedy for any damage resulting from such subsequent change.

It is evident that the viewers in the instant case had, and that the viewers and commissioners (if there be commissioners) in every case under the general law will have, the benefit of such surveying as may be necessary to determine the location, width, and grade of the road, and thus be able to determine approximately the amount of cutting, filling, and other construction work to be done, and fix the damages accordingly.

The physical situation in the present case is such as to render it highly improbable that any change of grade upon the road in question will ever be considered desirable. If such a change should be made, however, and the landowners should claim damages on that account, the question which we left open in Nelson County v. Loving, 126 Va. 283, 101 S. E. 406, would arise. It does not arise here because the compensation and damage has been fixed upon the present location and grade in the manner authorized by valid statutory proceedings. Whether the effect of this is to cut off claims for damages arising from possible future changes we do not now decide.

It may be that the general road law would be improved by a provision more nearly in conformity with section 4364 than anything now found therein; but this is a question for the Legislature.

The foregoing discussion has disposed of all the questions which were specifically adverted to or discussed in the assignments of error. It is true that the motion to dismiss, referred to in the first assignment, was accompanied by numerous grounds set out in the record of the proceedings in the circuit court, but none of these grounds was argued or adverted to in the petition for the writ of error, except those hereinbefore discussed. With respect to the residue of those grounds, we deem it sufficient to say that they have been duly considered, and are overruled.

We find no error in the judgment complained of, and the same is accordingly affirmed.

Affirmed.

BRYAN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Homicide \S 151(1), 254—Every homicide prima facie murder in second degree; defendant has burden of proving excuse.

Every homicide is prima facie murder in the second degree, and the burden is upon defendant to establish any justification or excuse relied upon by him.

2. Homicide \S 145, 146, 147—Law presumes malice, but not willfulness, deliberation, or premeditation.

The law presumes malice from the fact of killing, but it does not presume that the act was willful, deliberate, and premeditated.

3. Homicide \S 254—Verdict for murder in second degree sustained.

Evidence held to sustain a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree.

4. Homicide \S 181—Previous unchastity of defendant's wife admissible.

In a prosecution for murder committed by defendant after his wife had confessed illicit relations with deceased, it was not error to admit evidence of the previous unchaste character of the wife.

5. Homicide \S 181—Proof of truth of wife's confession of illicit relations with deceased held properly excluded.

In a prosecution for murder committed by accused after his wife had confessed to him that she had been guilty of illicit relations with deceased, it was not error to exclude proof of the truth of such confession.

6. Homicide \S 181 — Defendant's esteem for his wife held proper subject of proof.

In a prosecution for murder, committed by accused after his wife had confessed to him illicit relations with deceased, evidence of suspicions entertained by accused of his wife's fidelity prior to the homicide held proper on the issue of the probable effect of the confession upon accused's mind.

7. Criminal law \S 866—Quotient verdict as to punishment for murder held not reversible error.

That the jury in a murder trial arrived at the number of years' imprisonment to be imposed by a quotient verdict held not reversible error.

8. Criminal law \S 957(1)—Evidence of jurors as to mistaken idea of punishment they could inflict properly excluded.

In a prosecution for murder, it was not error to refuse to admit testimony of jurors on the question of whether or not some of them were mistaken as to the punishment they could inflict for murder in the second degree.

9. Homicide \S 308(2)—Omission of word "premeditated" in defining first degree murder held not error.

In a prosecution for murder, an instruction held not erroneous because it omitted the word "premeditated" in defining murder in the first degree under Code 1919, \S 4393.

10. Homicide \S 340(4)—Error in instruction as to murder in first degree held immaterial on conviction of murder in second degree.

In a prosecution for murder, that an instruction omitted the word "premeditated" in defining murder in the first degree held not error, where defendant was found guilty of murder in the second degree.

Error to Circuit Court, Botetourt County.

E. B. Bryan was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Haden & Haden, of Fincastle, and Wm. R. Allen, of Buchanan, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. This case is here upon a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Botetourt county, sentencing the defendant, E. B. Bryan, to a term of 20 years in the penitentiary upon a conviction of murder in the second degree.

About noon of the 28th day of October, 1920, Bryan walked into the office of the Virginia Western Power Company in the town of Buchanan, and, practically without warning, shot to death W. F. Headrick, an electrician employed by that company.

The evidence produced by the commonwealth, standing alone, makes a case of murder in the first degree. The defense relied upon is that the act was committed in the heat of passion, engendered a few minutes prior to the killing by a confession made to the defendant by his wife of an illicit intimacy between her and the deceased. The testimony tending to support this defense may be stated in abbreviated form, but with substantial accuracy and completeness, as follows:

The defendant and his wife had been married for 25 years. Their children were grown and away from home. The defendant was 45 and his wife 42 years of age. They lived in a second floor apartment over a restaurant in Buchanan. The night before the killing, while the defendant's wife was on a visit to her father's home in the country, he found certain letters in her room which aroused his suspicion, and which, upon some further investigation, he concluded were probably written by the deceased. He says he was greatly troubled and worried by this discovery, and spent a sleepless and miserable night. The next morning he hired a car, went to see his wife, and asked her about the letters. She said she would go back home with him, and, after arriving there, would tell him all about them. They returned together, went immediately to their room, and, according to the testimony of both of them, they sat together on the side of the bed, with their arms around each other, while she related to him all the details of an illicit relationship and intercourse, seductively brought about by the deceased, which had existed between her and him for some weeks. The particulars of her confession may be omitted. Suffice it to say that, if the jury believed that the confession, as testified to by both of them, was made, that the defendant was actuated by no other and independent grievance against the deceased, and that the natural and normal effect of such a confession by the wife to the husband was not affected by any previous similar misconduct on the part of his wife, and known to him, then the jury would have been entirely warranted in finding (as no doubt they would have found) that he gave way to rage and indignation, caused by the confession, and killed the deceased in hot blood. The confession included the statement that the deceased had first secured complete control over the sexual passions of the defendant's wife by the surreptitious use of a certain drug, administered in wine, and that thereafter she had been wholly unable to resist him. They both testified that during the confession the defendant made only one remark, and that was, "Did he do that, darling?" and that her reply was, "He did." The commonwealth produced rebuttal evidence which will be mentioned later.

At the conclusion of this interview with his wife, the defendant immediately got his pistol, walked through the kitchen, which was on his way out, picked up in that room an electric flatiron, or smoothing iron, which he had bought from the deceased and which will be mentioned again later, and, with the pistol in his right hand, and the iron in his left, went out on the street in search of Headrick. The distance from Bryan's house to Headrick's office was about 125 yards, and he went almost immediately there, entering a drug store on the way to inquire about Headrick, saying that he was "going to kill his damn soul," and also telling Dr. C. W. Barker on the way, in answer to a question as to what he was going to do, that he was "going to kill the damned s—of a b—." On entering the Virginia Western Power Company's office, he saw Headrick sitting at a desk inside of a compartment or pen surrounded by a railing, and thereupon he pitched the electric iron into the compartment and opened fire on Headrick, saying at the same time "God damn you, I will kill you." He fired three shots, the first two failing to take effect, the third entering Headrick's temple and producing death a few hours thereafter.

[1, 2] The first assignment of error complains of the action of the trial court in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury as being contrary to the evidence. We are unable to say that the court erred in this respect. Every homicide is prima facie murder in the second degree, and the burden was upon the defendant to establish to the satisfaction of the jury any justification or excuse relied upon by him. Minor's Syn. Crim. Law, p. 57, and cases cited. The effect of the verdict in this case was to determine: (1) That the commonwealth did not successfully carry the burden of proof resting upon it to raise the grade of the offense to murder in the first degree by showing that the killing was "willful, deliberate and premeditated" (Code, § 4393); and (2) that the defendant failed to successfully carry the burden of showing that the killing was without malice on his part, and therefore a lesser crime than murder in the second degree. The law presumes malice from the fact of the killing, but it does not presume that the act was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. The sufficiency of the evidence on the one hand to establish the willful, deliberate and premeditated character of the act, or, on the other, to rebut the presumption of malice, is generally a question which lies peculiarly within the province of the jury. In this case the trial court, by refusing to interfere with the verdict, held, in effect, that the evidence was such as to warrant the jury in finding that the defendant had failed to successfully rebut the legal presumption against him as to the grade of his crime. In this finding we concur.

The books abound in cases in which convictions of even first degree murder have been sustained when the killing followed the alleged provocation more quickly than in the present case. If the evidence disclosed no circumstance at all to discredit the defendant's claim that he acted solely under the propulsion of hot blood and frenzy, engendered by his wife's confession, it is, to say the least, not at all certain that the court would not have improperly invaded the province of the jury if it had set aside the verdict as being insufficient to show that the killing was malicious. That was for the jury to decide. Shepherd v. Commonwealth, 119 Ky. 931, 85 S. W. 191, cited with approval in Shipp v. Commonwealth, 124 Ky. 643, 99 S. W. 945, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 335, 339.

Moreover, there were, as a matter of fact, certain circumstances in the case, as shown by the evidence, entirely proper for the consideration of the jury, and which may have influenced them in attaching less weight to the effect of the confession than was claimed for it by the defendant. These circumstances will now be mentioned.

The alleged letters from Headrick to defendant's wife were not produced at the trial. He claimed that they had been lost, but his testimony as to their contents and as to their loss was vague and unsatisfactory. As they were alleged by him to be the beginning and basis of his original suspicion and subsequent anger, they would naturally be regarded as of much importance, and it is not entirely easy to understand the uncertainty of the testimony with respect to them.

With reference to his own account before the jury as to the details of his wife's confession, while that account is corroborative of and harmonious with practically all that his wife had previously testified to in his presence, it can hardly be characterized as a connected and convincing narrative. Due allowance must be made for the effect which the jury may have given to his manner and bearing on the stand.

Some importance may have properly been attached by the jury to the fact that the defendant carried the electric iron along and pitched in into the office by the side of the deceased before opening fire upon him. There was evidence tending to show that the iron had not been paid for; that the defendant had received one or more bills for it; that there had been some misunderstanding on the part of the bookkeeping department of the Virginia Western Power Company as to the terms upon which he was to make payment therefor; and that this misunderstanding had subsequently been the subject of an interview between him and the deceased, resulting in what seems to have been a satisfactory adjustment of the matter. The transaction and its incidents were gone into very fully in the testimony on both sides, and the jury and the trial judge were in much better position than we are to estimate the bearing of these incidents on the mental attitude of the defendant toward the deceased. We are frank to say that, as the evidence appears in type, we see nothing in the account of what had passed between the defendant and the deceased to indicate bad feeling on account of the purchase of the iron; but when the defendant undertook to explain why he had carried it with him when he started out to wreck vengeance on the deceased, his testimony is not satisfactory. Upon this latter point he was asked the following question and gave the following answer:

"Q. Now, why was it that on the morning after your wife had related these horrible relations between her and Mr. Headrick that you took your electric iron from your home to the office of the Western Electric Company? A. I thought maybe that might be some inducement for him to come around my house, and I just thought I would take the iron; I never paid for it, and I thought I would take it back and get rid of it."

And again:

"Q. You said you took the iron to keep Mr. Headrick from coming to your house any more? A. I thought maybe it might keep him from having some excuse to come back or something. I just don't know hardly exactly how it was. I was so shocked and nervous and tore all to pieces I don't know."

When it is recalled that he was then starting out with the expressed purpose and determination to kill Headrick, his explanation, made long after the killing, that he was taking the iron along for the purpose of removing any excuse for further visits from Headrick to his wife, is not very convincing. He was carrying a firearm with which to kill Headrick, and certainly, therefore, there was no need for a return of the iron to prevent Headrick's further visits. The jury might have accepted the theory that the picking up and returning of the iron was the irrational act of the frenzied man, or, on the other hand, that he had more than one grudge and grievance against the deceased when he started out to take the latter's life. Whether the one or the other was the correct theory was a question lying solely in the province of the jury.

Far more significant than the circumstances above adverted to, however, was the rebuttal evidence of the commonwealth, tending to show that Mrs. Bryan was, and had long been, a woman of unchaste character, and that the defendant knew that fact. A vital question for the jury to decide was as to the effect of the alleged confession on the defendant's mind, and, if they believed that she had previously, with his knowledge, had improper relations with other men, this fact may very naturally and properly have been given weight by them in determining the extent to which his feelings were shocked and overwrought by the revelation of her intimacy with the deceased.

[3, 4] Juries are not given to dealing lightly with the violation of the sanctity of a man's home and the destruction of his wife's virtue, and they may usually be depended upon to do full justice to any husband who takes the life of another upon that score. The learned and able judge who presided at the trial of this case, and who, like the jury, observed and heard the witnesses, saw no reason to disturb the verdict. We cannot say that this conclusion was against the evidence, and we ought not to interfere unless we find error in some of the other rulings complained of.

The second assignment of error challenges the action of the trial court in allowing evidence of the previous unchaste character of the defendant's wife. What we have already said indicates our views upon this question. Many authorities are cited to sustain this assignment, but nearly all of them relate to the rule forbidding such evidence for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of a witness. It is, of course, well settled that, as a general rule, a witness can only be impeached by evidence of general bad character for truth and veracity in the community in which the witness resides; but the evidence here complained of was neither offered nor admitted for purposes of impeachment. It was introduced and allowed solely for the purpose of enabling the jury to properly appraise the probable effect which Mrs. Bryan's confession actually had upon the mind of her husband. The trial judge, upon the first offer of any evidence of this kind, said:

"I think the evidence is admissible. Of course I desire to state distinctly that I understand the commonwealth's attorney intends to undertake to prove that the prisoner here had knowledge of this reputation which his wife sustained in the community."

By Instruction I, he told the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the defendant did not know that the general reputation of his wife for virtue was bad on the 28th of October, 1920, then they should disregard all the evidence introduced by the commonwealth tending to show her bad character in this respect, and, further, that they must believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did know of this general reputation of his wife before they could consider it. And, by Instruction H the jury were told that, even if they did believe that the defendant knew of his wife's bad reputation for virtue on or before October 28, 1920, they could only consider such bad reputation and the defendant's knowledge thereof in determining to what extent he was enraged and lost his power of self-control by his wife's confession of her relations with the deceased, and that they could not consider her alleged bad reputation for any other purpose whatever.

In the case of Garlitz v. State, 71 Md. 293, 18 Atl. 39, 4 L. R. A. 601, the accused, on trial for murder of his wife, undertook to excuse his act on the ground that he was so shocked and overcome by her confession of infidelity that his mind became frenzied, and that he lost reason and control of himself and, while in this condition, committed the crime. The state was permitted to prove that the accused had had improper relations with other women, the court holding that the evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing the prisoner's esteem and appreciation of the marital relation and the improbability that he was shocked and overcome in the manner described in his testimony. See, also, State v. Holme, 54 Mo. 153, 165; Fox v. State, 71 Tex. Cr. R. 318, 158 S. W. 1141.

We find nothing in the case of Shipp v. Commonwealth, supra, cited and relied upon by counsel for the accused, in conflict with the views we have hereinabove expressed. In that case the trial court, strange to say, refused to permit the defendant to prove the confession of his wife as to her intimacy with the deceased, and yet, still stranger to say, allowed the commonwealth to prove that the reputation of the wife of the accused for virtue and chastity was good. The appellate court held that the former testimony was admissible, but that the latter was not, chiefly on the ground that the truthfulness or falsity of the confession had nothing to do with the defendant's conduct, and was immaterial.

[5] Under the third assignment of error it is insisted that the court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to introduce proof of the truth of his wife's confession. We have already seen that the question of the truth of her confession was in no way a material issue in the case. The question was not whether the confession was true or false, but what effect it had upon the mind of the accused. The court correctly stated the law applicable to this phase of the case by instruction G, which was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that Mrs. Bryan told the defendant on the 28th day of October, 1920, of the alleged wrongful relations between herself and Headrick, as detailed by the defendant in his testimony, and that the defendant believed said account of said alleged wrongful relations to be true, then it makes no difference, so far as this case is concerned, whether or not Headrick and Mrs. Bryan did in fact have said wrongful relations."

Under the fourth assignment of error, which embraces a number of rulings, it is insisted that the court erred: (1) In admitting testimony of the witness Shank, who was permitted to relate a conversation had with the defendant prior to the 28th of October, 1920, in which the latter stated that he suspected his wife of improper relations with a man named Harvey; (2) in permitting the witness Vaughan to testify as to a conversation which he had with the defendant prior to October 28, 1920, in which the latter expressed doubt about the virtue and chastity of his wife, and said she was doing things which he could not stand for; (3) in permitting the witness Rogers to testify as to a conversation which he had with the defendant prior to the 28th of October, 1920, in which the latter said that he could not put up with the way his wife was doing, and intended to leave her; and (4) in permitting the witnesses Mr. and Mrs. Manly to testify as to a conversation which they overheard between the defendant and his wife prior to October 28, 1920, in which he accused her of intimacy with another man.

[6] There was no error in the admission of this testimony. It was proper for the jury to know exactly in what esteem the defendant held his wife in order to determine the probable effect of the confession upon which the defendant claims to have based his action on the day of the killing.

It is insisted that the admission of such evidence tends to put a premium on immorality and to discourage a husband whose wife has been unchaste from defending his home against further violation. The argument is pressed upon us in this connection that a wronged husband has a right to cling to his erring wife and try to reform her, and that he might under certain circumstances feel as much outraged by a second or third invasion of his home as by the first one. This is an argument the force of which will depend in every case upon the particular circumstances, and should be addressed, as it doubtless was in this case, to the jury. It falls entirely within their province.

The next assignment arises out of this state of facts: The verdict of the jury was as follows:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, as charged in the indictment, and fix his punishment at 20 years in the penitentiary."

It appears from the affidavit of the defendant filed in the cause shortly after the verdict was rendered, that after the jury retired to their room to consider the verdict their first step was to determine the grade of the offense, two or three members in the outset being in favor of murder in the first degree, but all finally agreeing to fix the grade of the crime as murder in the second degree. After this was done, they, for the first time, began a consideration of the extent of the punishment, and this was fixed at 20 years as the result of an agreement by which each juror was to set down the number of years which he thought the defendant should receive as a punishment, the sum of these figures to be divided by 12 and the quotient written into the verdict. In carrying out this agreement, several of the jurors wrote down more than 20 years as the number of years of confinement in the penitentiary which they respectively believed the defendant should receive. The affidavit further states that the jurors who used figures in excess of 20 did so under an honest mistake as to the number of years fixed by the statute as the maximum punishment for second degree murder.

The court was asked to set aside the verdict on the ground that the method of arriving at the same had been plainly prejudicial to the defendant, and had been the result of an innocent mistake on the part of some members of the jury. It was conceded that the conduct of the jurors in arriving at their verdict could not be established except by the testimony of the jurors themselves, and the court held that their evidence would not be admissible for the purpose of impeaching their verdict. The motion for a new trial on this ground was accordingly denied, and it is alleged that this was error.

stated to warrant an interference with the ruling of the trial court. It is unnecessary for us to say that there are no conceivable circumstances under which the testimony of jurors themselves may be resorted to in order to impeach their verdict. This court said in Bull's Case, 14 Grat. (55 Va.) 613, 632:

"In view of all the authorities, and of the reason on which they are founded, we think that, as a general rule, the testimony of jurors ought not to be received to impeach their verdict, especially on the ground of their own misconduct; and, without intending to decide that there are no exceptions to the rule, we think that even in cases in which the testimony may be admissible, it ought to be received with very great caution. A contrary rule would hold out to unsuccessful parties and their friends the strongest temptation to tamper with jurors after their discharge, and would otherwise be productive of the greatest evils."

As showing the extent to which the rule against the admission of testimony by jurors to impeach their verdict has been carried in Virginia, see, also, 4 Min. Inst. (3d Ed.) 935; Read's Case, 22 Grat. (63 Va.) 924; Thompson's Case, 8 Grat. (49 Va.) 637, 650; Washington Park Co. v. Goodrich, 110 Va. 692, 697, 66 S. E. 977; Manor v. Hindman, 123 Va. 767, 777, 97 S. E. 332.

The decision of the question, as it arises and as it is presented to us in this case does not call for any extended discussion or review of the authorities. It seems to be conceded by counsel for the prisoner that under the rule as established in Virginia the testimony of jurors cannot be received to show their misconduct, the claim being that the same rule does not apply where there has been a mistake. The mistake here alleged could only have been due to the misconduct of the jury in ignoring the written instructions of the court, in which they were plainly told that murder in the second degree "is punishable by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than five nor more than twenty years."

The general rule, as approved by the United States Supreme Court and by the courts of some of our sister states, permits more latitude in the admission of evidence of this character than has generally been permitted by the rule in Virginia. Burks' Pl. & Pr. (2d Ed.) 554, and cases cited; United States v. Reid, 12 How. 361, 366, 13 L. Ed. 1023; Mattox v. United States, 146 U. S. 140, 147, 13 Sup. Ct. 50, 36 L. Ed. 917. But even under this more liberal application of the rule, the evidence offered in the present case was properly rejected by the trial court. In Hendrix v. United States, 219 U. S. 79, 90, 31 Sup. Ct. 193, 196 (55 L. Ed. 102), the court said:

"On the motion for new trial affidavits of four jurors were offered, stating with some detail that they did not understand the legal effect of the verdict. Only one of the affidavits is in the record. The maker states that, by finding the defendant guilty, as charged in the indictment, without capital punishment, 'he did not understand what the punishment would be on such a verdict, and agreed to it on the understanding that the punishment would only be 2 years in the penitentiary.' He further states that he was in favor of a verdict for manslaughter, and would never have consented to the verdict had he thought or believed it 'would carry with it a life penalty.' The motion for new trial, as we have said, was denied. We see no error in the ruling."

[8] In the case last cited, the jury might have failed to understand the effect of their finding, because in the federal courts the punishment is fixed by the court and not by the jury, but they were not allowed to say so for the purpose of impeaching the verdict. In the instant case they necessarily understood the exact effect of their verdict. With a written instruction in their hands as to the minimum and maximum punishment, they fixed the grade of the offense as murder in the second degree, and the punishment therefor at the maximum term of imprisonment. In view of these facts, the court was clearly right in refusing to admit the testimony of the jurors as offered.

[9, 10] One other assignment of error remains to be considered Instruction A, the main purpose of which was to advise the jury as to the effect which they should ascribe to the confession made by the defendant's wife, in the concluding paragraph, said that if the killing was done "with malice, deliberate and willful, it is murder in the first degree." It is insisted that this instruction was erroneous because it omitted the word "premeditated" in defining murder in the first degree. It is true that the statute, section 4393 of the Code, does say that murder in the first degree is a "willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing"; but there are two answers, either of which is satisfactory, to the assignment of error here under consideration. The first is that instruction K, given by the court, and intended for the primary purpose of defining murder in the first degree, expressly told the jury that, to constitute murder, the killing must have been willful, deliberate, and premeditated, and we think therefore that the omission of the word "premeditated" in the former instruction could not have misled the jury. The second and conclusive answer to the alleged error here complained of is that the jury, as a matter of fact, found the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, not of murder in the first degree; and, even if the omission of the word "premeditated" from the first instruction was error, it was plainly harmless.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS v. BLUE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Railroads ⇨313, 317—Violation of ordinances negligence.

Violation of ordinances limiting speed and requiring the ringing of a bell on an engine approaching a crossing is negligence.

2. Railroads ⇨327(3) — Pedestrian crossing tracks held negligent.

A pedestrian crossing double tracks in clear view for 1,200 feet who was struck by a backing engine running at an unlawful speed without signal held guilty of contributory negligence in failing to observe the engine on the second track.

3. Railroads ⇨338—Last clear chance doctrine held applicable to pedestrian's injury.

Where the lookout man on a backing engine merely whistled through his teeth to warn a pedestrian approaching the danger zone line, who failed to notice the warning or hear the engine, then far enough away for blowing the whistle or tapping the bell and slackening the speed, which would have prevented injury, the railroad company was liable under the last clear chance doctrine.

Error to Corporation Court of Charlottesville.

Action by J. L. Blue against the Director General of Railroads. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

In this case (an action for damages by the defendant in error as plaintiff in the court below against the plaintiff in error as defendant in the court below) there was a trial by jury, a demurrer to the evidence by the defendant, and a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, subject to the demurrer. The trial court overruled the demurrer and entered judgment in accordance with the verdict. This action of the trial court is the sole assignment of error.

The evidence, not the facts, are certified. The defendant introduced no evidence. Considering the evidence under the rule applicable upon the demurrer of the defendant thereto, the material facts are found to be as follows:

On the evening of July 4, 1919, after supper, but in full daylight, the plaintiff, a man between 65 and 66 years old, was struck and injured by an engine of the Southern Railway (being operated at the time by the Director General) at a grade crossing of a considerably used street in the city of Charlottesville. The railroad in this locality runs approximately north and south, and consists of two main line tracks, the north-bound track to the east, and next to that the south-bound track, to the west, those tracks being a distance of about 25 feet between the inner rails, and of about 20 feet between the tracks themselves. The street crosses these tracks somewhat obliquely in an approximately northwesterly and southeasterly direction. The plaintiff was struck on the southbound track by the engine of the railroad, running backwards, going north on that track, as the plaintiff was walking along the street from the southeasterly going in the northwesterly direction. The plaintiff was very tired from a hard day's work and was walking very slowly. He was in full possession of all of his faculties, except that he was somewhat deaf, but could at the time hear the whistle or the bell of an engine very distinctly. As he came to a point about 15 feet from the north-bound track he stopped and looked south to see if any train was approaching from the south and saw none. Both tracks were in clear view of the plaintiff from that point for a distance of about 1,200 feet, if he had looked that far south along the tracks. From the physical facts shown in evidence we must conclude that the engine was plainly within sight of the plaintiff when he stopped at the point last named and would have been seen by him had he looked as far south as he could have done. How far away from the crossing the engine then was the evidence does not definitely show, nor its exact speed, but it was some considerable distance south of the crossing, more probably at least 250 yards or 750 feet away, and was running approximately about 15 miles an hour, according to the preponderance of the evidence. The engineman was in his place, the fireman in his place, and a brakeman was standing on the lookout on a step on the end of the engine nearest to the crossing; but none of them testified in the case. There were ordinances of the city of Charlottesville which fixed the speed limit of the engine at 10 miles an hour, and which required that the engine bell should be rung continuously while the engine was approaching the crossing. The speed of the engine exceeded such speed limit, and no bell was rung at any time while the engine was approaching the crossing; nor was any whistle blown. When the engine came in sight of the crossing, about 1,200 feet away, and from that time until the engine reached the crossing and struck the plaintiff, the fireman, standing as a lookout man on the step of the end of the engine approaching and nearest to the plaintiff, was whistling through his teeth, evidently adopting that as a method of alarm in lieu of the ringing of the bell required by the city ordinance. Not observing the engine approaching from the south, the plaintiff, after stopping at the place aforesaid, then started on, looking toward the north as he crossed the north-bound track, to see if anything was approaching from that direction, and, after crossing the north-bound track, continued on, with his gaze turned northward along the south-bound track, as he was not accustomed, as he testified, to seeing any train moving north on the south-bound track, and so felt safe from trains going north after he had crossed the north-bound track. He continued, without again stopping or again looking south, without hearing the engine or the whistling of the lookout man, steadily walking on, until, just as he came upon the south-bound track, the engine, without slackening its speed at all until the impact occurred, struck him, causing the injuries complained of. The engine knocked the plaintiff along the track only about 22 feet, however, throwing him to the east of the track, and not upon it, and the engine passed partly beyond where he lay on the ground and was stopped within its own length (which was 184 feet), after it struck the plaintiff. During the whole time that the plaintiff was walking steadily onward from the place at which he stopped, as aforesaid, until he came within 2½ feet of the eastern rail of the south-bound track, which the testimony shows was the line of overhang of the engine, and hence the zone of danger from it (a distance of 40 feet), the failure of the plaintiff to notice the alarm of the whistling through the teeth, or the noise of the moving engine, and the continuous looking of the plaintiff toward the north as he moved, with his face turned practically entirely away from the approaching engine, obviously absorbed in looking for any train which might be coming from that direction, and obviously unconscious of the noise of the engine and the whistling of the lookout man, and also obviously intending to continue on crossing the south-bound track, unless some louder warning were given him, was all in plain view of the lookout man aforesaid. And there is no evidence that any duty of the latter engaged his attention at the time, other than that of keeping a lookout and signaling to the engineman and fireman if a man was on or apparently was about to go on the track. The evidence further shows specifically that when the plaintiff had come within the danger zone aforesaid and was still walking on, and it became certain that he would be struck unless some louder warning was given him so that he might step back out of the zone of danger, the engine was still at least 184 feet away from him. The irresistible inference of fact which must be drawn from the above-mentioned circumstances shown in evidence is that the lookout man saw the plaintiff at the time, and that the plaintiff was obviously in peril before he actually crossed the danger zone line, when he was a few steps therefrom, and that the engine was then amply far enough away for a tap of the bell or a sound of the whistle to have been given and for the engine to have been then stopped, or at least its speed slackened, before it reached the plaintiff. And yet the lookout man gave no warning to the engineman or fireman of the perilous position of the plaintiff, no bell was rung or attempted to be rung, nor whistle blown or attempted to be blown, the engine was not then stopped nor attempted to be stopped, its speed was not slackened nor attempted to be slackened; only the obviously unheard whistling through the teeth continued as the sole warning given the plaintiff until he was run down by the engine and injured as aforesaid.

Robert B. Tunstall, of Norfolk, and Perkins, Walker & Battle, of Charlottesville, for plaintiff in error.

Fife & Pitts and F. C. Moon, all of Scottsville, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court.

[1, 2] In the view we take of the case the defendant was guilty of primary negligence in running the engine at a speed in excess of the lawful speed limit and in failing to ring the bell as the engine approached the crossing as required by the ordinances of the city; and the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in failing to observe the approach of the engine before he went upon the track where he was struck and injured. That leaves for our sole consideration the following question:

Is the last clear chance doctrine applicable to the case?

[3] This question must be answered in the affirmative.

This case is ruled by the holding and principle laid down in Gunter v. So. Ry. Co., 126 Va. 565, on page 595, 101 S. E. 885, on page 894. The following is there said:

"* * * *Whatever may have been the prior holdings, we are of opinion that when the engineman or other person in charge of a moving engine or car sees a person in apparent possession of his faculties on the track, or so near thereto that he will probably be injured or killed unless he changes his position, he has the right to assume that he will change his position in time for his own safety until the approach is so close that an engineman of ordinary care and prudence would be admonished of his peril, and if he then gives no evidence of consciousness of his peril, it is the duty of such engineman or person in charge to give timely and suitable warning of the approach of such engine or car, and if the warning appears to be unheeded to use all other means within his power, consistent with his higher duty to other persons, to avoid injury to one who has thus exposed himself. The failure to exercise this degree of care * * * is negligence for which the master is liable.*" (Italics supplied.)

Indeed, the instant case is stronger for the plaintiff than the Gunter Case, in that in the present case there was the obvious failure to notice the signal of the whistling of the lookoutman through his teeth, as a superadded fact showing the obvious unconsciousness of the plaintiff of his peril, in addition to the other superadded facts, stated above, showing such unconsciousness. And we are of opinion that upon the facts of the instant case, before it was absolutely certain that the plaintiff would be struck, when the plaintiff was yet a few steps away from the danger zone—i. e. from the line of the overhang of the engine—it was obvious to the lookoutman on the engine that the plaintiff had not heard the noise of the engine or of the whistling through the teeth signal, and that the engine was then so close that the lookoutman, if he had exercised ordinary care and prudence, would have been admonished that the plaintiff was, under the circumstances, obviously in grave peril; that thereupon, the plaintiff having given no evidence of consciousness of his peril, it was the plain duty of the lookoutman to have notified the engineman of such peril, so that a louder alarm, by whistle blast or tap of the bell, might have been given, and, if that had been unheeded, that the engine might have been stopped or its speed slackened; that the engine was then amply far enough away for all of these things to have been done by the exercise of reasonable diligence; and that the engine was moving so slowly that if any of them had been done, the preponderance of the evidence is that the plaintiff would not have been injured.

We are therefore of opinion that the case must be affirmed.

COLLEY v. CALHOUN. (No. 4206.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 1, 1921.)

1. Executors and administrators §29(2) — Appointment in county where deceased did not die or leave estate cannot be collaterally attacked.

An appointment of an administrator in a county in which the intestate left no estate, and did not reside at the time of his death, is not void, and cannot be collaterally attacked. Although voidable, it is treated as valid and allowed full operation, until vacated or otherwise abrogated.

2. Executors and administrators §450—In administrator's action to recover debt, evidences of appraisal required by statute are properly admitted in evidence.

In the trial of an action by an administrator to recover money due the estate of the decedent, evidences of debt bearing the appraisal indorsement required by section 12, c. 85, Code 1913 (sec. 8999), are properly admitted, and constitute sufficient proof of appraisal, even though the appraisers may have been appointed in a county other than that contemplated by law. The place of appraisal is not of the essence of the statutory requirement.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by Alex Colley, administrator, against A. L. Calhoun. Verdict for plaintiff was set aside, a new trial awarded, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and judgment for plaintiff on verdict.

Cecil H. Riley, of Northfork, and Litz & Harman, of Welch, for plaintiff in error.

G. L. Counts, of Welch, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The argument submitted on this writ of error tacitly, if not expressly, admits that the order setting aside the verdict found for the plaintiff and awarding the defendant a new trial, of which complaint is made, stands upon the assumption of invalidity of the plaintiff's letters of administration and consequent lack of right to maintain the action brought by him for recovery of money due the estate of Wise Robinson, his intestate.

He took out his letters of administration in the county in which Robinson died, Mercer county, but it is urged that the permanent residence of the intestate was in McDowell county. Being a resident of McDowell, he went to Bluefield, in Mercer, for treatment in a hospital, and there died two or three weeks later. After his death and the appointment of his administrator, the documentary evidence of indebtedness, constituting the basis of this action, was found in his trunk at the place of his residence at the time of his departure for Bluefield.

[1] Permanent or legal residence of the decedent in McDowell county being conceded for the purposes of this inquiry, the appointment was not void, but only voidable, and cannot be collaterally attacked or assailed. For the correctness of this holding, it suffices merely to cite the following decisions applying the principle in cases dependent upon strikingly similar facts and circumstances. Tomblin v. Peck, 73 W. Va. 336, 80 S. E. 450; Wells v. Simmons, 61 W. Va. 105, 55 S. E. 990; Findley v. Findley, 42 W. Va. 331, 26 S. E. 433; Starcher v. South Penn Oil Co., 81 W. Va. 587, 95 S. E. 28; Cicerello v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 65 W. Va. 439, 64 S. E. 621; Allen v. Linger, 78 W. Va. 277, 88 S.

E. 837. An appointment of an administrator by the county court of a county in which the decedent left no estate is merely voidable, not void, and not open to collateral attack. Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh (Va.) 119, 33 Am. Dec. 227; Andrews v. Avory, 14 Grat. (Va.) 229, 73 Am. Dec. 355. These two decisions stand upon facts of exactly the same nature as those involved in this case. It is manifestly both unnecessary and improper to inquire now whether the appointment is voidable. Being unvacated, it must be treated as valid, for the purposes of this case.

[2] The evidence of the indebtedness sued for consists of three receipts for $160, $50, and $100, respectively, signed and delivered by the defendant, as evidence of the receipt of said sums for "safe-keeping." All of them were appraised and indorsed agreeably to the requirements of section 12, c. 85, Code (sec. 3999), by appraisers appointed in Mercer county. As the object of these requirements is recorded disclosure of the personal estate of the decedent, for state taxation and other general purposes, the place of the appraisal is not an essential element of the statute. Such disclosure in any county, whether the one in which the property is or not, accomplishes the legislative purpose. If a note, bond, or other evidence of debt sued upon is shown to have been appraised by appraisers appointed in the county of appointment of the administrator, the trial court cannot consistently be required to enter upon a collateral inquiry as to the regularity of the appraisal. The statute itself in express terms, dispenses with necessity of proof of listing beyond the indorsement of the appraisers.

Payment was relied upon as the defense, and some evidence thereof was adduced, but, in the opinion of the jury, it was insufficient. It included what purported to be a receipt in full, signed by Robinson, but the genuineness of the signature was denied, and a letter proved to be in the handwriting of Robinson was put in evidence for comparison. As the jury found for the plaintiff in the sum of $300, they evidently found the receipt was not genuine. All of the apparent errors committed in the course of the trial were to the prejudice of the plaintiff, not the defendant, wherefore they afforded no ground for setting aside the verdict.

For the reasons stated, the order complained of will be reversed, the verdict reinstated, and judgment rendered thereon.

STATE v. MEADOWS. (No. 4346.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 8, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Forgery §26—Indictment for forging deed held fatally defective.

An indictment for the forgery of a deed purporting to convey land, which does not allege the existence of the land and that the grantor named in the deed actually owned the land described, nor describing the deed as containing some covenant, or showing on its face that the grantor could have been injured or prejudiced thereby, is fatally defective, and should, on motion of the defendant, be quashed.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

George W. Meadows was convicted of forging and uttering a forged instrument, and he brings error. Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded.

C. J. Vanfleet, J. F. Cork, and J. W. Kennedy, all of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MILLER, J. The indictment is in two counts. The first charges defendant with feloniously and intentionally forging, and the second with uttering and attempting to employ as true, a certain paper writing commonly called a deed, purporting to have been made on October 9, 1915, between the Rosin Coal Land Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of West Virginia as party of the first part, and Clara Meadows, wife of Geo. W. Meadows, party of the second part, and purporting to convey to her a certain lot of land situate west of Brooks' Hollow and north of the county road, in Malden District, Kanawha County, West Virginia, a short distance above the city of Charleston, and described as containing twenty-one acres, for a certain cash consideration and ten negotiable notes of the grantee, payable to said corporation, and negotiable and payable at a certain bank, and purporting to bear the corporate seal of said company, and to have been acknowledged before a certain notary public, with intent to defraud against the peace and dignity of the state.

Defendant's demurrer and motion to quash the indictment were overruled, and this action of the court is the first point of error relied on to reverse the judgment of imprisonment against him, founded upon the verdict finding him guilty.

The indictment does not describe the deed in hæc verba, and contains no averment that the Rosin Coal Land Company, the grantor named, in fact owned the land described, nor any land, nor that the deed alleged to have been forged contained any covenant, which on its face and unaided by extrinsic facts, not averred, would render the said grantor liable thereon, nor any averment showing that the said grantor would have been injured or prejudiced thereby.

We recently decided in State v. Davis, 87 W. Va. 184, 104 S. E. 484, that when the fraudulent character of an alleged forged writing does not appear on its face, but can only be made to appear by innuendoes introducing extraneous facts and circumstances necessary to show the fraudulent character of the writing so as to give it a proper setting with relation to that which it purports to affect not otherwise discernible, the indictment will be regarded as fatally defective, and should be quashed. In that case the subject of the forgery was an alleged release of a deed of trust, described but averring nothing to show the existence of any such deed of trust, nor how nor in what way the parties to any such deed would have been injuriously affected by such release if it had been genuine, wherefore the indictment was held to be fatally defective and insufficient to support a verdict, and that the judgment thereon should have been arrested on motion of the defendant.

So in this case, the instrument not setting out in full the deed alleged to have been forged, which, when introduced in evidence, disclosed that it contained covenants of general warranty, and, if it had been fully set out in the indictment, might have shown on its face that the purported grantor might have been prejudiced and injured thereby, was defective in the same particular as that in the case of State v. Davis. It was lacking in averment of such outside facts as would show prejudice or injury to the rights of either party to the alleged deed.

In many cases, perhaps in most, the forged instrument, when described, will disclose on its face that it is capable of being used to defraud. Bonds, notes, checks and other instruments for the payment of money or creation of other duties or obligations, are of that character. Goodman v. People, 228 Ill. 154, 157, 81 N. E. 830; Arnold v. Cost, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 219, 22 Am. Dec. 302, and note 314. And such was the character of the order involved in State v. Tingle, 32 W. Va. 546, 9 S. E. 935, 25 Am. St. Rep. 830. But such is not the character of the instrument—the deed—described in the indictment in this case. In People v. Wright, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 193, 197, the court says:

"Now although the mortgage, which is set out in hæc verba, purports to embrace a part of lot No. 21, in Dryden, yet for aught appearing in the indictment, there may not be such a lot or tract of land in existence; it may be wholly imaginary, and for that reason its existence ought to have been averred and proved upon the trial, in order to show that the instrument purported to be a charge upon the land within the meaning of the section. If it was not, it was wholly inoperative. Neither is it alleged in the count that Shafer, the mortgagor, whom the prisoner intended to defraud, had any interest in the land the mortgage purported to affect; and if he had not, it is difficult to discover how he could be defrauded."

Some cases are cited by the attorney general from code states where the forms of indictment for forgery are prescribed by statute, and which are for this reason inapplicable.

Our conclusion is that the indictment in this case is fatally defective and should have been quashed on defendant's motion. We therefore reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case to the circuit court.

INDIAN REFINING CO. v. CHILTON.
(No. 4338.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 8, 1921.)

1. Damages ¶208(1)—Where plaintiff is shown entitled to nominal damages, it is error to direct verdict for defendant.

Where, upon the trial of an action for damages, the competent evidence shows that the plaintiff is entitled to recover nominal damages, it is error for the court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant.

2. Appeal and error ¶177(7)—Where plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages and procurable evidence may show substantial damages, directed verdict for defendant set aside.

Where, upon the trial of a suit for damages, the trial court directs the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, when the competent evidence shows that plaintiff is entitled to recover nominal damages, and it appears in the case that substantial injury has been inflicted resulting in damages amounting to more than $100, competent evidence of which was not produced because the plaintiff misjudged the character of the evidence offered, or from some other adventitious cause, and that in all probability competent evidence can be introduced upon another trial to prove such damages, this court will take jurisdiction to reverse the judgment of the trial court denying the plaintiff any recovery.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by the Indian Refining Company against W. E. Chilton in the justice court, and upon appeal to the intermediate court of Kanawha county, a verdict was directed for the defendant, and on appeal therefrom, the circuit court refused to review said judgment, and plaintiff brings error. Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

Morgan Owen, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

Townsend & Bock, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. On a trial of this case in the intermediate court of Kanawha county, upon an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace, the court struck out the plaintiff's evidence, and directed a verdict for the defendant, which verdict being accordingly returned, a judgment of nil capiat was rendered thereon. The circuit court of Kanawha county refused to review said judgment, and the plaintiff prosecutes this writ of error for that purpose.

The purpose of the suit is to recover for an injury to an automobile truck owned by the plaintiff, caused by a collision between said truck and a touring car of the defendant. Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced evidence to show that its truck was being driven east on Kanawha street on the right side thereof when the driver observed the automobile of the defendant coming west on said street, at a very high rate of speed, and on the wrong side thereof. Plaintiff's driver testifies that in order to avoid the collision, if it were possible, he immediately applied his brakes and stopped the truck, but notwithstanding this defendant's automobile ran into the truck, and so injured it that it had to be shoved out of the street to prevent interference with traffic. This state of facts testified to by the driver is corroborated by other witnesses. The local manager of the plaintiff then went on the witness stand and testified that the books of the company showed that the sum of $95.36 had been paid by the company for the repairs necessary to the truck, and the sum of $84 as rent for another truck to take the place of the injured one while it was being repaired. He did not know anything about the injury to the truck. In fact, he knew nothing except that there were entries in the book as above indicated. The book itself was not produced, nor was there any testimony that these entries were correct and based upon the facts. The defendant thereupon made a motion to exclude the evidence and direct a verdict in his favor, which motion was sustained, and the judgment complained of rendered upon the verdict so directed.

[1] The plaintiff's contention is that this action of the court in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant was error, for the reason that under the facts proven, and which were not at all denied, it was entitled to recover at least nominal damages, conceding that the evidence as to the cost of the repairs and the amount paid for hiring a truck to take the place of the injured one was not competent. Manifestly this contention is correct. The evidence as it stood at the time the motion was made showed a clear right in the plaintiff to recover in the case. The only difficulty was that there was no competent evidence showing the extent of the injury inflicted and the damages suffered thereby. This failure, however, did not justify the court in directing a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiff was entitled to recover at least nominal damages. If the defendant at this stage of the proceedings had, instead of moving for a directed verdict, rested his case and moved for an instruction to the jury to find for the plaintiff nominal damages, and the jury had so found, and judgment had been entered upon such verdict, there would have been no error.

[2] The defendant contends that, even though the plaintiff was entitled to recover nominal damages, this court cannot review the judgment for this error, for the reason that the jurisdictional amount is not involved. If it appeared in this case that no injury had been done to the plaintiff's truck, and that no more than nominal damages could be recovered in any event, of course this contention would be correct. It must be borne in mind that the plaintiff is seeking to get rid of a manifestly erroneous judgment. What is the amount involved so far as the plaintiff is concerned? It is true that, under the competent evidence introduced upon the former trial, only nominal damages could have been recovered, but it is equally evident that a substantial injury was inflicted, and that competent evidence exists as to the extent of this injury, and the amount of damages suffered by the defendant therefrom. The test of the jurisdiction is, What amount will be involved upon a retrial? and if it is apparent that an amount will be involved sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of this court, then plaintiff's writ of error will not be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. It sufficiently appears in this case from the evidence of the driver that the truck, as a result of the collision, was so damaged that it would not run, for it is shown that it had to be shoved out of the street to prevent obstruction to traffic. It also appears from the evidence of the local manager that the books of the company show that an amount was paid out by the company for repairs to the truck due to this injury, and as rent for another truck to take its place while it was being repaired, in excess of $100. It is quite apparent that competent evidence exists to establish these items, and to properly connect them with the injury done to plaintiff's truck in the collision. Where an erroneous judgment has been entered denying the plaintiff even nominal damages when the evidence clearly warranted the same, this court will not refuse to take jurisdiction of a writ of error to reverse such erroneous judgment where it appears that the plaintiff in all probability is entitled to recover, if at all, more than $100, but by inadvertence, or by misconceiving the nature of the evidence necessary to establish his rights, failed to properly present the case at the hearing. 1 Sutherland on Damages, § 11; 1 Joyce on Damages, § 79; Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Durant Land Improvement Co., 144 N. Y. 34, 39 N. E. 7; Morris v. Vulgamott, 158 Ill. App. 434; Harman v. Washington Fuel Co., 228 Ill. 298, 81 N. E. 1017.

In this case, however, it appears that the failure to properly present the case to the jury in the first instance was due to the fact that the plaintiff either misconceived the force of the evidence presented by it, or by neglect or inadvertence failed to produce the evidence which it is patent exists, and can be produced. In such case it cannot be said that it substantially prevails in this court so as to entitle it to recover costs.

We will reverse the judgment complained of, set aside the verdict of the jury, and remand the cause for a new trial.

NESBEN v. JACKSON. (No. 4303.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 8, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 94(2)—Fact issue involving conflicting evidence and witnesses' credibility is for the jury.

An issue of fact involved in conflicting oral evidence, and dependent upon the credibility of the witnesses, lies clearly within the province of the jury for determination.

2. Appeal and error \S 1003—Evidence held not sufficiently preponderative to take disputed question from jury.

Upon an issue as to whether an innkeeper had statutory notices posted in his office, lobby, and guest chambers, his testimony, and that of a clerk and two guests, that they were posted and in position before and after the loss, contradicted by that of a guest whose money had been stolen, to the effect that he had seen no notice in the room he had occupied, the positive testimony of plaintiff's attorney that, upon careful investigation, made a few days after the loss, he had found none, and the testimony of the same witness to admissions by the defendant that he had relied solely upon a notice printed in his register, and had no other, is not sufficiently preponderative to take it from the jury.

3. Innkeepers \S 11(10)—Guest with actual notice to deposit property at office or be personally responsible is negligent barring recovery in keeping it in his room.

If a guest of a hotel has actual notice of a requirement that he deposit his money and jewelry at the office, or be personally responsible for its safety, his failure to make such deposit is negligence barring recovery for loss of such property by theft from his room in the hotel.

4. Innkeepers \S 11(12)—Guest depositing money and jewelry on previous occasions, and presence of printed notice on hotel register, held not conclusive evidence of his knowledge of rule.

But such deposits made by him on several previous occasions, and the presence of a printed notice of such requirement in the hotel register, not shown to have been brought to his attention, are not conclusive evidence of such knowledge; wherefore a finding of a jury against it cannot be disturbed by the court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by Alexander Nesben against E. F. Jackson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morgan Owen and E. B. Dyer, both of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

B. J. Pettigrew and J. Raymond Gordon, both of Charleston, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The judgment under review on this writ of error is one recovered against an innkeeper by a guest, for money stolen from the latter while he slept in his host's hotel. The case went to a jury upon the evidence and without instructions. Reversal is sought upon the theory of a finding contrary to the law and the evidence.

Section 33 of chapter 145, Code (sec. 5236), absolves the keepers of hotels, inns, and lodging and boarding houses from liability for loss of the jewelry, money, and other valuables of their guests, if and when they have posted in the rooms of their guests, and boarders, and in their offices and reception rooms, notices requiring such articles to be deposited in their offices, except in the case of loss from such offices after deposit therein. Compliance with the requirements of this statute is asserted by the defendants and denied by the plaintiff, and as to it there is conflict in the evidence.

[1, 2] On or about October 12, 1919, the plaintiff registered at the hotel of the defendant, and was assigned to an improvised room in a hall, known as room No. 110. Although he had been a guest at the hotel on several previous occasions, and had sometimes deposited money in the office, he said nothing about his money on the occasion in question. The room consisted of the end of a hall cut off by a partition lower than the ceiling, wherefore it was susceptible of access over the partition. While the guest slept, a thief took from his coat pocket $210, and carried it away.

He does not claim he inspected the room to ascertain whether it contained a posted notice. Interrogated as to whether he had seen a notice in it, he said he had not. Being asked whether there was one in it, he replied:

"No, I see no notice like that in my room—no sign of paper; no kind of paper."

The defendant testified that he had kept the lobby and rooms of his house posted, but was unable to say there was a notice in room No. 110, on the night of the theft, although he was in it the next morning. He stated positively, however, that he had personally placed a notice in that room and most of the others, before the loss. He also testified that, before and after the theft, he had maintained a notice on a partition by the side of a door in the lobby, the door opening into the baggage room. His clerk at the time of the occurrence testified that there was a notice in room No. 110, on the morning after the loss, and also that there was one in the lobby and in every room and bathroom in the house. L. C. Dills testified that he had roomed in the house in October, 1919, and had seen notices in the lobby and the rooms he had been in, both before and after the occurrence in question. Ed Perkins, a cook, swore he had slept in room No. 110 one day in the summer of 1919, and had then seen a notice posted in it, and that there was one in the lobby. A few days after the loss, one of plaintiff's attorneys visited the hotel, in company with him, inspected it to some extent, and claims to have interviewed the proprietor. He testified that he had looked "at what is called the office or public reception room," and had found no notice in it. Though he did not say he had been in room No. 110, he said there was no notice in it. He asked the defendant, on cross-examination, if he had not testified in a justice's court in which the case was first tried that a notice printed on each page of the hotel register was the only notice he had, and that he had depended solely upon it. A negative answer having been given, the attorney took the stand and said such an admission had been made in the testimony before the justice and in conversations with himself on two or three occasions.

Nothing conclusive is perceived in this evidence. No doubt the plaintiff's own testimony is clearly negative in character, since he does not claim to have looked for notices. This might be legally overthrown by the positive evidence adduced by the defendant and the uncontradicted fact that the plaintiff had previously made deposits, a circumstance tending to prove his knowledge of the requirement. But Mr. Gordon's positive and direct testimony to the effect that there was no notice in the room nor in the lobby, a few days after the loss, and that the defendant had admitted sole reliance upon the notice printed in the register, completely covers this phase of the case, and makes the issue turn altogether upon the credibility of the witnesses. It is neither inadmissible nor devoid of evidential value, by reason of lapse of time between the loss and his visit to the hotel. He contradicted the witnesses who said notices were up after as well as before the loss, and impeached the defendant as to practically all of his evidence. Under such circumstances, neither a trial court nor an appellate court can disturb a verdict. Harman v. Appalachian Power Co., 77 W. Va. 48, 86 S. E. 917.

[3] An inn guest's actual knowledge that his host requires a deposit of his jewelry, money, and other valuables in the office, as a condition of liability, is obviously binding upon him. Actual notice is always more potent than merely constructive notice. The statute binding him by constructive notice simply extends a common-law principle, which exonerated the host in case of the refusal of his guest to make the deposit upon request, or his failure to do so with knowledge of a rule requiring it, and consequent loss of the property. Such failure is negligence, barring right of recovery. Purvis v. Coleman, 21 N. Y. 111; Fuller v. Coats, 18 Ohio St. 343; Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 417; Jalie v. Cardinal, 35 Wis. 118; Richmond v. Smith, 8 Barn. & Cress. 10; Cashill v. Wright, 6 Bl. & Bl. 891; Beale, Innkeepers & Hotels, § 213.

[4] No conclusive evidence of actual notice of the requirement in question is found in the record. Though testimony to the fact that the plaintiff, on previous occasions, had deposited his money at the office, is uncontradicted, it merely tends to prove knowledge of a rule requiring him to do so. Notwithstanding such tendency, the jury could have attributed the act to timidity or unusual caution on his part. Neither the defendant nor any other witness testified to any express notification to him of such a rule, custom, or specific requirement. As to the reason for the deposits, the plaintiff was not interrogated, nor did he say anything. The utmost value that can be given them, as evidence of actual knowledge of the rule in question, is that of mere tendency to prove it. From them, an inference of such knowledge may arise, but it is manifestly not a necessary nor a conclusive one. Others probative of a different reason for the acts just as readily arise from them. Moreover, his failure to deposit on other occasions argues as strongly against knowledge as the deposits argue in favor of it. The plaintiff may have seen the notice printed in the register, but there is no proof that he did. As to that, he was not interrogated. The jury might have combined two circumstances, presence of the notice in the register and the deposits, and based a finding of knowledge on them, but they were clearly not bound to do so, and they did not. A guest, in signing a hotel register, is not bound to assume that he is signing a contract, and read everything printed in the register or on the page he signs. Murchison v. Sergeant, 69 Ga. 206, 47 Am. Rep. 754; Olson v. Crossman, 81 Minn. 222, 17 N. W. 375. Our conclusion is that the issue as to knowledge on the part of the plaintiff was one for jury determination.

For the reasons stated, the judgment complained of will be affirmed.

STAR PIANO CO. v. BURGNER. (No. 4376.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 8, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Judgment \S 153(4)—Default judgment may not be set aside after adjournment of term except for errors appearing upon the record.

A default judgment may not be set aside under the provisions of section 5 of chapter 134 of the Code of 1913 (sec. 4979) after the adjournment of the term at which it is rendered, except for errors appearing upon the record.

2. Courts \S 78—Have inherent power to establish reasonable rules for conducting business.

Courts have inherent power to establish reasonable rules for the conduct of their business not inconsistent with organic or statutory law.

3. Courts \S 85(1)—Rules have the effect of law as to proceedings.

Rules adopted by a court not in excess of its authority have the effect of law as to proceedings conducted in such court.

4. Judgment \S 144—Judgment rendered in violation of valid court rule should be set aside on motion of party injured.

Where a court has adopted valid rules for the conduct of its business, litigants may rely upon the court conducting its proceedings in conformity with such rules, and a judgment rendered in violation of a valid rule is properly set aside upon motion of the party injuriously affected thereby.

5. Courts \S 85(2)—Interpretation of rule by court promulgating it will be followed by Supreme Court.

The interpretation placed upon a rule by the court adopting and promulgating it will be followed by this court, unless such construction is in violation of the plain terms of the rule, or of some organic or statutory law.

6. Trial \S 9(2)—Where court rule provides for trial calendar, it is error to try case not placed thereon, without parties' agreement.

A rule of court providing that the clerk of the court shall, before each regular term, make up a "trial calendar docket," upon which shall be placed all cases expected to be tried at the term, and further providing that the parties or their counsel desiring a case to be tried shall give notice to the clerk thereof, and that only cases in which such notice is given shall be placed upon such trial calendar, and that all other cases shall stand continued, is a reasonable and proper rule for the orderly conduct of the business of the court, and it is error for the court to proceed with the trial of a case not so placed upon such trial calendar without the agreement of the parties thereto.

7. Judgment \S 279—Court's rules are part of the record of every case in which a default judgment is rendered.

Rules adopted and promulgated by a court within the limit of its powers are a part of the record of every case in which a default judgment is rendered in such court.

8. Judgment \S 279—Court dockets are part of record of every case of default judgment.

The dockets of a court are a part of the record of every case in which a default judgment is rendered in such court during the terms for which such dockets are made.

9. Pleading \S 85(3)—Where affidavit is filed with declaration, and writ of inquiry of damages is necessary, office judgment at rules does not bar answer.

In an action of assumpsit, where an affidavit is filed with the declaration as provided by law, but in which it is necessary to execute a writ of inquiry of damages, the office judgment entered at rules does not become final on the last day of the next succeeding term, so as to thereafter bar defense to the action. In such case, defense may be made thereto at any time before the writ of inquiry of damages is properly executed.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by the Star Piano Company against C. C. Burgner. Default judgment for plaintiff, and from a judgment setting the same aside, the plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. E. R. Byrne and John H. Linn, both of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

Barnhart, Horan & Pettigrew, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

RITZ, P. By this writ of error reversal is sought of a judgment of the court below setting aside a default judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, upon motion under the provisions of section 5 of chapter 134 of the Code (sec. 4979).

The plaintiff instituted its action of assumpsit in the court of common pleas of Kanawha county, returnable to March rules, 1920. Process was duly served upon the defendant returnable at that time. At April rules, 1920, the declaration, together with an account and affidavit, was filed, and the case was upon the court's docket for the May term, 1920. No proceedings, however, were had therein at that term. The case was likewise upon the regular docket of the court at the September term, 1920, but no proceedings were then had therein. A special term of the court was called to begin on the 29th of November, 1920. The proclamation calling the same recited that, inasmuch as the last term of the court had adjourned without dispatching all of the business, a special term was called at which no grand or petit jury would be required. At this special term the plaintiff called up its case, and, there being no appearance by the defendant, waived a jury for the execution of the writ of inquiry, had the same executed by the court, and the default judgment complained of rendered. After the adjournment of this special term an execution was sued out on the judgment, and the sheriff proceeded to levy the same upon the property of the defendant, who thereupon gave notice that he would, on the 5th day of March, 1921, move the court to vacate said default judgment, upon the ground, among others, that the said cause was not regularly upon the docket of the court for trial. This motion was heard by the court of common pleas, and an order entered vacating the default judgment and placing the cause on the court's docket for trial. The plaintiff prosecuted a writ of error to the circuit court of Kanawha county, which court affirmed the judgment of the lower court, and this writ of error is prosecuted to that judgment.

[1] The ground upon which the judgment was vacated is that the court of common pleas entered the default judgment in violation of one of its rules, which the said court held to be error appearing upon the face of its record, for which the judgment should be set aside under the provision of section 5, c. 134, of the Code. This rule of the court which it is contended was violated in the rendition of this judgment provides that the clerk of the court shall make up for each term thereof a "trial calendar docket," upon which shall be placed all cases which are expected to be tried at the term, and that parties litigant desiring their cases tried at any term shall notify the clerk of such intention 15 days before the term, so that the same may be placed upon this "trial calendar docket"; that, in case no such notice is given by either party to a suit, the case will stand continued at that term. This case was not upon this "trial calendar docket" at the special term at which the judgment was rendered, but this is perhaps not conclusive, in view of the fact that this special term was called to complete the work of the last regular term. The case, however, was not on the "trial calendar docket" at any term of court prior to the rendition of the judgment, and the defendant contends that he had a right to rely upon the court's rule that the same would stand continued. The plaintiff insists that this rule of the court is invalid because it is not a reasonable or proper rule, and violates the provisions of the statute; that, even if it is a proper rule, it has no application to this case; further, that it was no part of the record at the time the court below vacated the default judgment, wherefore it could not be considered upon that motion; and, further, that the court should not have set aside the judgment for the reason that the defendant can make no defense to the suit at this time, inasmuch as an affidavit was filed with the declaration, and no counter affidavit or plea was filed at the first term of court thereafter, for which reason the defendant is now barred from making any defense to the suit.

It is, of course, very well settled that a default judgment can only be set aside after the adjournment of the term at which it is rendered for error appearing upon the record as the same stood at that time. If extraneous matters are relied upon as the basis for relief against a judgment, it must be attacked by an independent suit for the purpose of setting it aside. Helms v. Greenbrier Valley Cold Storage Co., 65 W. Va. 203, 63 S. E. 1069.

[2, 3] This brings us to a consideration of the question whether or not the court's rules and its docket are a part of the record of this case. It is very well established that a court has inherent power to make rules for the orderly conduct of its business, so long as such rules are not oppressive or unreasonable, and violate no provision of law. Teter v. George, 86 W. Va. 454, 108 S. E. 276. When such rules are adopted and promulgated, they are the law controlling proceedings in that court. They become binding upon the litigants, as well as upon the court in the conduct of its proceedings. 7 R. C. L. title "Courts," § 54; Gist & Scott v. Drakely, 2 Gill. (Md.) 330, 41 Am. Dec. 426; Dunbar v. Conway, 11 Gill. & J. (Md.) 92; Wall v. Wall, 2 Har. & G. (Md.) 79; McDonald v. State, 172 Ind. 393, 88 N. E. 673, 139 Am. St. Rep. 383, 19 Ann. Cas. 763.

[4, 7] This being the effect of a valid court rule, it follows, of course, that every such rule is a part of the record of every case tried in the court promulgating it, and must be observed by the court in the conduct of its business just as a general statute enacted by the Legislature for the conduct of its business must be complied with. Goodwin v. Blackford, 20 Okl. 91, 93 Pac. 548, 129 Am. St. Rep. 729; Walla Walla Printing & Publishing Co. v. Budd, 2 Wash. T. 336, 5 Pac. 602.

[8, 8] Is the rule relied upon a reasonable and proper rule, and one which the court had the authority to adopt for the conduct of its business? It will be observed that section 1 of chapter 131 of the Code (sec. 4905) provides that certain dockets shall be made up by the clerk before the beginning of each term of the court; and it further provides that the clerk shall, under the control of the court, set the cases for trial on certain days during the term. Apparently this rule was adopted for the purpose of furnishing to the clerk and to the court information upon which intelligent action might be had in setting the cases for trial. It does not violate the provisions of any statute, nor deprive a party of any right, but is simply a method adopted by the court for securing the information necessary to an intelligent administration of the law. Without this rule the court would have to assume that every case upon its docket would be tried at the term, and proceed to set the cases for trial with that view. This would result in the court being idle a large part of the time, for the reason that it is well known that many of the cases upon the court's docket which are in such a position that they might be tried are not tried. It was to avoid just such a condition as this that the rule was promulgated, and we can see that it is a very salutary one. Instead of being in violation of any positive law, it is a substantial aid to the court in the execution of the positive command of the statute.

[5] But it is said that this rule does not apply to the case we have here; that it only applies to those cases in which issue has been joined. The rule itself does not so limit its application. The court below has interpreted the rule as applying to this case, and this construction will be adopted by this court unless the same is in conflict with the positive terms of the rule or some positive rule of law. Teter v. George, 86 W. Va. 454, 103 S. E. 275.

The plaintiff complains also of the action of the common pleas court in entering which is termed a nunc pro tunc order. The first order entered by the common pleas court vacating the judgment stated as the reason therefor that the case was not properly upon the docket at the time the judgment was rendered. Later the court concluded that this was not an accurate statement, and entered an order reciting that, by inadvertence, the real reason had not been stated in the former order, and stated fully the ground upon which the judgment was set aside as above indicated, and recited in this order the rule relied upon, as well as the fact that the case had never been placed upon the trial calendar. This order was not, strictly speaking, a nunc pro tunc order at all, but it was an order entered for the purpose of correcting a clerical inadvertence which the court always has the power to do. Section 1, c. 134, Code.

[9] The further ground relied upon by the plaintiff for reversal of the judgment, that the defendant could not, at the time the default judgment was set aside, make any defense because he had filed no counter affidavit or plea at the first term that the case was on the court docket, is likewise without merit. In this case a writ of inquiry of damages had to be executed, and, according to our holdings, in that event the defendant may file a counter affidavit, and plead to issue at any time before the writ of inquiry is properly executed. Philip Cary Manufacturing Co. v. Watson, 53 W. Va. 189, 52 S. E. 515; Federation Window Glass Co. v. Cameron Window Glass Co., 53 W. Va. 477, 52 S. E. 518; Wilson v. Shrader, 73 W. Va. 105, 79 S. E. 1063, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 886;

Rosencrance v. Kelley, 74 W. Va. 100, 81 S. E. 705.

We are therefore of opinion that the court of common pleas committed no error in setting aside the default judgment, and the judgment complained of will therefore be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 8, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Insane persons \S 61—Deed of insane person prior to lunacy inquisition, in absence of fraud or imposition, is voidable but not void.

The deed of an insane person, made before an inquisition of lunacy has been had, and in the absence of fraud or imposition, and without knowledge or notice to the grantee therein of such mental disability, is not void, but voidable only.

2. Insane persons \S 66—Voidable deed of insane person will not be avoided without placing affected parties in statu quo.

And such a deed by an insane person being voidable only, will not be avoided at the suit of the insane person, his committee or heirs, without restitution of the benefits secured thereby, or by placing the parties affected in statu quo.

3. Insane persons \S 66—Insane person or his representative may avoid trust deed given to cover debt of another to grantee.

But when one obtains a deed of trust from such an insane person, which is made to cover in part the debt of another to him, and for which the grantor receives no benefits, such deed of trust may be avoided at the suit of such insane person, his committee, administrator or heirs, unless the property covered has been sold and conveyed to an innocent purchaser for value, in which event the beneficiary in such trust may be required to account to his grantor, or his personal representative or heirs, for the amount covered in excess of the benefits accruing to the grantor or his estate.

Everly & Bowman, of Morgantown, for appellants.

O. C. Rose, of Morgantown, and F. E. Par-rack, of Kingwood, for appellees.

MILLER, J. The bill was filed by Jordan L. Morris, administrator of the estate of Mary

D. Huggins, deceased, and by said Morris and Charles H. Morris, his brother, in their individual rights as the only heirs at law of the said decedent, their sister, who died intestate, against the defendants William Hall, S. F. Glasscock, Trustee, Morgantown Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, I. Grant Lazzelle, Trustee, Morgantown Security & Development Company, a corporation, Joe Walls, and Bruce D. Glover.

The bill alleges that the said decedent left debts which her personal property was not sufficient to satisfy; that prior to June 20, 1912, she was seized and was owner in fee of two certain lots of land situate in Morgan District, Monongalia County; and the source of her title thereto is also set out in the bill. It is further alleged that on said 20th day of June, 1912, decedent signed and delivered to the Morgantown Savings & Loan Society a deed of trust, in which I. Grant Lazzelle was named trustee, securing a loan of $1,040.00, but that said loan was engineered and carried through by the defendant Joe Walls, who received the money and appropriated it to his own use, and never repaid it to decedent or to any one for her; that at least the sum of $380.00 was paid on said loan by way of dues etc., to said Morgantown Savings & Loan Society; and notwithstanding said payments said Society demanded the sum of $1,086.00 in settlement of said loan, which was paid by the defendant William Hall; and that by reason of said payment by him, the said Hall had secured from said Mary D. Huggins another deed of trust, dated November 2, 1915, calling for the payment of the sum of $1,500.00, and which latter deed in addition to the property covered by the deed of trust to Lazzelle, Trustee, was made to include another lot owned by decedent, the latter trust deed having been made to defendant S. F. Glasscock, Trustee; that on January 17, 1917, said lots had been sold by said Glasscock, Trustee, at which sale said Hall had become the purchaser thereof at the price of $1,350.00, which were deeded to him on the same day; and that said Hall, on October 9, 1917, had conveyed said property to the defendant Morgantown Security & Development Company, who on August 17, 1918, conveyed it to Bruce D. Glover, the present owner thereof.

The prayer of the bill is that said two deeds of trust and all the subsequent conveyances of said property may be set aside as a cloud upon the title of said Mary D. Huggins, and for general relief.

The only grounds alleged for the relief prayed for are that the said Mary D. Huggins, on June 20, 1912, when she signed and delivered the deed of trust to Lazzelle, Trustee, and on November 2, 1915, when she signed and delivered the deed of trust to said Hall and his trustee, S. F. Glasscock, and for several years prior thereto and up until the date of her death, was of unsound mind, not competent to execute a deed or deeds of trust; that she was then suffering from an incurable mental affliction, for which she had received treatment in an insane asylum at Dixmont, Pa., at two different times from which she had received no beneficial results, and from which she never recovered to the time of her death; that when she executed said deeds, decedent did not possess memory, understanding and mind sufficient to know and appreciate the nature, character and effect of signing and delivering the same; and the second and last amended bill alleges that the defendants well knew the mental condition of decedent at the various dates of their transactions with her, and took advantage of her mental condition to rob her of her property. This latter allegation does not apply to the Morgantown Security & Development Company and Bruce D. Glover, for they are not alleged to have had any transactions with decedent, or notice of her insanity.

It will be observed from the recital of the allegations of the bill that it is not alleged that the said Mary D. Huggins was at any time, either in the state of Pennsylvania or in this state, by any legal and competent authority adjudged to be insane, nor that any committee or trustee was appointed for her, and to whose custody and control her property was committed. In the brief of counsel for plaintiffs it is argued that she had been adjudged insane in Pennsylvania, but the fact is not alleged, nor is it proven. It is simply a matter of inference from the fact alleged and proven, that some twelve years prior to the transactions in question, she had been received for treatment in some asylum at Dixmont, Pennsylvania, but from which she had been removed prior to her coming into and residence in this state.

The demurrers of the defendants Morgantown Savings & Loan Society and I. G. Lazzelle, Trustee, to the original and amended bills were sustained, and as to them the bills were dismissed; but the demurrer of the remaining defendants was overruled. On a subsequent day, however, the court sustained defendants' demurrer to an amended bill, which being again amended, their demurrer to the bill as amended was overruled, and defendants ruled to answer, which was done, the answers admitting the recorded facts, and did not specifically deny the insanity of the decedent, but did deny that defendants had any notice thereof at the time of the several transactions with her.

On this state of the pleadings, and the depositions taken and filed in the cause, the decree complained of, pronounced on the 18th day of September, 1920, adjudged that the deed of trust from Mary D. Huggins to S. F. Glasscock, Trustee, and all the subsequent deeds, down to and including the deed from the Morgantown Security & Development Company to Bruce D. Glover, purporting to convey the said two lots originally held by said decedent, should be and the same were set aside and declared to be null and void as against the complainants, and a writ of possession was also decreed to plaintiffs against the said Bruce D. Glover or whomsoever might be found in possession of said property.

From the final decree aforesaid the defendants William Hall, S. F. Glasscock, Trustee, Morgantown Security & Development Company, and Bruce D. Glover obtained this appeal.

The bill, as already observed, does not allege that the decedent had ever been adjudged insane by competent authority, and the answers do not deny specifically the fact of insanity. Should the bill be regarded good on demurrer? It does not allege adjudication of insanity, nor notice of the fact of insanity by any of the parties except those who had transactions with Mary D. Huggins, which would not include the Morgantown Security & Development Company or Bruce D. Glover, who are not alleged to have had any transactions with her; nor is it alleged that decedent obtained no benefit from the deeds of trust or other deeds set aside by the decree, unless the allegation that Joe Walls engineered the loans and appropriated the money to his own use amounts to such allegation; nor is there any proffer in the bill to restore to defendants any of the money obtained by the decedent upon the deeds of trust alleged to be void.

[1] While there has been some considerable conflict in the decisions on the question whether the deed of a lunatic, before inquisition of lunacy has been had, is void or only voidable, the rule is now well established in this country, by a long line of decisions, that in the absence of fraud, and when good faith has been observed on the part of those dealing with one not known to be insane, and with nothing to put them upon notice of such insanity or unsoundness of mind, the deed of such person is not void, but voidable only. The cases so holding are many, of which the following are sufficient to support the proposition: Eaton v. Eaton, 37 N. J. Law, 108, 18 Am. Rep. 716; Hull v. Louth, Guardian, et al., 109 Ind. 315, 10 N. E. 270, 58 Am. Rep. 405; Abbott v. Creal, 56 Iowa, 175, 9 N. W. 115; Myers v. Knabe, 51 Kan. 720, 33 Pac. 602; Burnham v. Kidwell, 113 Ill. 425; Downham v. Holloway, 158 Ind. 626, 64 N. E. 82, 92 Am. St. Rep. 830; Wait v. Maxwell, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 217, 16 Am. Dec. 391; Hovey v. Hobson, 53 Me. 451, 89 Am. Dec. 705; Castro v. Gell, 110 Cal. 292, 42 Pac. 804, 52 Am. St. Rep. 84; Blinn v. Schwarz, 177 N. Y. 252, 69 N. E. 542, 101 Am. St. Rep. 806; Smith v. Ryan, 191 N. Y. 452, 84 N. E. 402, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461, 123 Am. St. Rep. 609, 14 Ann. Cas. 505; Pearson v. Cox, 71 Tex. 246, 9 S. W. 124, 10 Am. St. Rep. 740;

Studabaker v. Faylor, 170 Ind. 498, 88 N. E. 747, 127 Am. St. Rep. 397; Allis v. Billings, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 415, 39 Am. Dec. 744, note 749; Riggan v. Green, 80 N. C. 236, 30 Am. Rep. 77; Flach v. Gottschalk Co., 88 Md. 368, 41 Atl. 908, 42 L. R. A. 745, 71 Am. St. Rep. 418, note 430.

[2] And being voidable only, like the deeds of infants and others under like disability, their deeds can not be avoided without restitution of benefits secured thereby, or placing the parties affected in statu quo as far as possible, this upon the principles pertaining to courts of equity, that when one comes into a court of equity for redress of supposed grievances, he will be required to do equity and will not be allowed to retain the benefits of a voidable transaction, but must make restitution as a condition of obtaining relief against his voidable act. Odum v. Riddick, 104 N. C. 515, 10 S. E. 609, 7 L. R. A. 118, 17 Am. St. Rep. 686; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 625, and cases cited; Loomis v. Spencer, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 153; Burnham v. Kidwell, supra; Abbott v. Creal, supra; Myers v. Knabe, supra; Matthiessen & Welchers Refining Co. v. McMahon's Adm'r, 38 N. J. Law, 536. In the latter case it is said the liability of the lunatic in such cases is upheld, not on the ground of the contract, but on the fact that he has received and enjoyed an actual benefit from the contract. See, also, 14 R. C. L. 593, section 47.

[3] We think the bill as amended makes out a case for relief against Hall, for he is charged with notice of decedent's insanity. He denies such notice, and as there was no proof of notice to him, we do not think the pleadings and proof make a case against him on the fact of insanity. But as to the Morgantown Security & Development Company and Bruce D. Glover, not charged with notice, and being purchasers for value without notice, their title to the land could not be affected. The cases above cited will support this proposition. As to the defendants so situated the bill was demurrable, and their demurrer should have been sustained. Odum v. Riddick, supra.

As to Hall and Glasscock, his trustee, the case made by the bill is that he not only knew of decedent's insanity, but that when he took the deed of trust it was made to cover, not alone the $1,086.00 necessary to discharge the prior loan, but the sum of $1,500.00. The bill does not allege what the additional sum was intended to cover, but the evidence shows it was intended to cover debts due him from the plaintiff J. L. Morris and the said Joe Walls, which in no way benefited said decedent. If such was the fact, and it had been clearly alleged and proven, Hall would not be protected in that part of his debt by the deed of trust to Glasscock but should be limited to the amount advanced to pay off and discharge the prior lien. As to that part of the debt the decedent's estate was benefited by the discharge of her property therefrom.

Moreover, the bill as lastly amended alleges that the plaintiffs desire a fair settlement of all the matters pertaining to all of said transactions; that each party shall receive or be permitted to retain whatever is just and right and in good conscience he should retain, but after such restitution or permission to retain the amounts to which each of said defendants are entitled, the remainder shall go and belong to plaintiffs. As the plaintiffs are the heirs at law of the decedent, the proffer of the bill should not go unheeded even on demurrer to the bill; but it leaves the bill certainly good on demurrer as to Hall, so far as it affects his right to retain or have enforced his deed of trust against the property for the debts of Morris and Walls included therein. True, the title of the innocent subsequent purchasers of the property can not be affected, but the allegations of the bill and the evidence thereon will support a decree against Hall for whatever sum was included in his deed of trust to cover the debts of Morris and Walls, not benefiting the decedent or her estate. The exact amount so included in the trust deed does not clearly appear, and it will have to be ascertained.

The case as made by the proof does not show notice of insanity to any of the parties who had transactions with the decedent, and there being no judgment of lunacy against her prior thereto, and the transactions being without such notice, and in good faith, and not in fraud of the decedent's rights, the deeds will not be set aside nor relief of any kind granted against those dealing with her, except upon the principles of placing them in statu quo.

In this case the evidence shows that Jordan L. Morris, one of the heirs and beneficiaries of the estate of the decedent, was himself the principal actor in procuring from his sister the execution of both the deeds of trust, the one to Lazzelle, Trustee, and that executed to Hall and his trustee; that the check in the first case was made to Mrs. Huggins, and her endorsement thereon secured by him, and that he was responsible principally for the transfer of the funds to himself or to the firm of Morris and Walls; and in the second case Hall's check for the balance due the loan company, Hall thinks, was made to that company; and all this without the knowledge of any of the defendants, alleged or proven. Walls denies any complicity in the transactions relating to the borrowing of the money by Mrs. Huggins, and placed to the credit of Morris or Morris and Walls. Evidently there was disagreement and misunderstanding between the partners, which has brought about the present controversy and the effort on the part of plaintiffs to saddle the loss upon the defendants. Neither the pleadings nor proofs justify the decree, and our conclusion is to reverse it, and to remand the cause for further proceedings to be had in accordance with the principles herein affirmed, and further according to the principles governing courts of equity.

TALLEY v. SOUTHERN REAL ESTATE & INV. CO. (No. 2573.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Auctions and auctioneers — Contract for land sold at auction held unilateral when signed only by purchaser.

This is a suit brought by auctioneers against a successful bidder at an auction sale, to enforce specific performance of two contracts for the purchase of land. The petition alleges, in substance, that the auctioneers in such sale acted as agents of the designated owner of the land, and were to be compensated for their services by a stated commission on the proceeds derived from the sales; that these facts were all well known to the successful bidder; that such bidder executed two written contracts, duplicates except as to the amounts to be paid, notes to be executed, and the descriptions of the lands, one of which was as follows: "This is to certify that I have this day purchased at public auction from the Southern Real Estate & Investment Company, as agent for Buell Stark, that tract or parcel of land known as tract — as shown on map of survey made by R. L. Brown containing 80 acres, for which I agree to pay the sum of $35.50 per acre, upon the following terms; ¼ cash, balance in three equal annual payments, deferred payments bearing interest at the rate of 8% per annum from January 1st, 1920; and I agree to execute promissory notes for the deferred payments. The purchase of this property is made subject to all existing rental contracts for the year 1920. Witness my hand and seal, this the 23d day of December, 1919. W. S. Talley." No memorandum of the auctioneer was made, so far as the record discloses. The petition further alleges that said bidder failed and refused to perform his contract, without legal excuse; that the owner had offered to perform, but refused to bring suit for specific performance. Defendant demurred to the petition, upon several grounds, among them that the contract signed by the purchaser is unilateral, the same not having been signed by the auctioneer or the owner of the land, and failing to create any obligation on the part of the vendor which could be enforced by the bidder. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Held:

The court erred in refusing to sustain the demurrer to the petition, on the ground that the instrument signed by the bidder was unilateral.

2. Class of cases distinguished.

The case differs from that class of cases founded upon memorandums of the auctioneer, who, under the statute, is considered the agent of both parties so far as to dispense with any memorandum in writing other than his own entries. Civ. Code 1910, § 4107.

LOCHAMY v. STATE. (No. 2441.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Homicide — Evidence of deceased's possession of money held material.

The fact that the deceased had a large sum of money in his possession a short time before the homicide was a material fact tending to illustrate the circumstances under which he was killed; and the court did not err in admitting evidence to establish that fact, over the objections made.

2. Criminal law — Definition of "reasonable doubt" held not error.

On the trial of one charged with murder, it is not error for the court, in charging the jury on the law of reasonable doubt, in part to define "reasonable doubt" as such a doubt "as an upright man might entertain in an honest investigation after truth." Peterson v. State, 47 Ga. 524(5).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reasonable Doubt.]

3. Criminal law — Inaccuracy in instruction held not to require new trial.

The expression by the court in his charge that "an assault is an attempt to commit a violent injury; as used in sections 85, an assault and battery is evidently contemplated"—is not an accurate expression of the law; but the inaccuracy, in view of the evidence, does not require the grant of a new trial.

4. Homicide — Striking one with club inflicting wound causing fatal disease held murder.

If one willfully, unlawfully, and with malice aforethought strikes another on the head and face with a piece of wood, inflicting a wound which, though not necessarily mortal, is the primary cause of a disease which brings about the death of the wounded person, he is guilty of murder. Clements v. State, 141 Ga. 667, 81 S. E. 1117.

5. Criminal law — New trial properly denied when verdict authorized.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for new trial.

PEARSON et al. v. COCHRAN et al.
(No. 2566.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Wills \S 834(1)—Remainder to life tenant's daughter and heirs of her body held vested.

Where one bequeaths property to his wife "during her lifetime," and further provides that at her death it shall belong to a named daughter and the heirs of her body, the remainder is one limited to a certain person upon the happening of a necessary event, and such remainder is vested. Civ. Code 1910, \S 3676.

2. Wills \S 853—Vested remainder held to pass to son of deceased remainderman.

"If the remainderman dies before the time arrives for possessing his estate in remainder, his heirs are entitled to a vested remainder interest." Civ. Code 1910, \S 3677. In the present case the daughter, to whom was bequeathed the vested remainder interest in land, predeceased the testator, dying intestate, leaving one son as heir at law. On the death of the testator this son became entitled to the vested remainder interest of his mother. Civ. Code 1910, \S 3906; Cheney v. Selman, 71 Ga. 384; Smith v. Williams, 89 Ga. 9, 15 S. STEED et al. v. BENTLEY et al. (No. 2461.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. New trial \S 42(2)—Not granted because plaintiff was a juror at the same term where improper influence not shown.

The first special ground of the motion for a new trial, in which the contention is made that the defendant did not have a trial before an impartial jury, as provided by law, in that "the plaintiff served as a traverse juror during the term of the court at which said case was tried, for several days before said case went to trial, and afterwards, and that his fellow jurors sitting upon this case were biased and prejudiced by their association with him, which prejudice is manifested by the verdict," etc., is without merit, there being no specific acts to show that the defendant in error did anything to improperly influence the jurors with whom he was associated to render a verdict in his favor.

2. Specific performance \S 120—In suit on parol contract, admission of unexecuted deed held error.

This was a suit for specific performance to compel the execution by an administrator of certain deeds to land which it was averred the administrator's intestate had agreed to convey for a stated consideration, the performance of which by the plaintiff was duly alleged; and the existence of the parol contract was a material question in issue. It was error for the court to admit in evidence certain unsigned instruments in writing, purporting to convey the land in question.

3. Specific performance \S 123—Instruction authorizing recovery if plaintiff sustained burden of showing contract without requiring showing of performance held error.

In a suit for specific performance of a parol contract for the conveyance of land, a charge in substance to the effect that the burden was on the plaintiff to establish by evidence the parol contract as alleged, to the requisite degree of certainty, and that if he did so establish the parol contract by evidence he would be entitled to a decree, was erroneous in that it stopped short of imposing also upon the plaintiff the burden of showing by evidence performance on his part of the contract, where the consideration of the conveyance was services rendered and to be rendered by the plaintiff to the intestate of the defendant administratrix.

4. No error in other ground of motion.

The other ground of the motion for a new trial shows no error requiring the grant of a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Lincoln County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Action by O. R. Bentley and others against Mrs. W. El. Steed, administratrix of Mrs. Grace A. Bentley, and others. Judgment ment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Colley & Colley, of Washington, Ga., for plaintiffs in error.

John T. West & Son, of Thomson, for defendants in error.

BECK, P. J. This was a suit for specific performance. The plaintiff prayed for a decree requiring the administratrix of his mother, Mrs. Grace A. Bentley, to execute a deed to the premises in dispute. He based his contention that he was entitled to the execution of such a deed and to specific performance on the ground that his mother had, in consideration of love and affection and the past services rendered by the plaintiff and the agreement on his part to perform certain other services set forth in the petition, made a parol contract to convey to him certain lands. The jury upon the trial of the case returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The ruling made in the first head-note requires no elaboration.

[2] 2. The court erred in admitting in evidence an unexecuted deed purporting to be a conveyance from the intestate of the defendant of the tract of land in dispute to the plaintiff in error. The fact that a deed had been drawn and purported to convey the land in question in accordance with the parol contract upon which the plaintiff bases his right to specific performance might have had weight with the jury in determining the question as to whether the parol contract alleged was actually made and entered into, when as a matter of law it is not entitled to such weight, and was irrelevant, especially in the absence of evidence that the grantor named in the unsigned paper had herself prepared the instrument; and the evidence of certain witnesses that she had intended or desired to sign such an instrument did not render the paper itself admissible in evidence.

[3] 3. Error is assigned upon the following excerpt from the charge of the court:

"The law places a certain burden on the plaintiff in this case, which he must carry before he would be entitled to have a verdict at your hands, which he now and here asks for in the case. He must show you, and that by evidence in the case, that there was a parol contract between him and his mother, as he contends, and he must show you that contract and the terms thereof. This he must establish so clearly and strongly and satisfactorily as to leave no reasonable doubt as to this contract and its terms. That burden he must carry before he would be entitled to have a verdict at your hands. I charge you that if he does carry that burden, and in the way I have explained to you, he would be entitled to have a verdict at your hands."

The defect in this charge is that it failed to instruct the jury that it would be necessary for the plaintiff, in addition to establishing by evidence the parol contract as alleged to the degree of certainty required, to show by evidence such performance on his part as would entitle him to a decree for specific performance in a court of equity. The court did in other parts of the charge clearly instruct the jury that the plaintiff was required to show performance and compliance with his part of the contract, but the instruction which we have set forth above and which we have held to be defective stands apart and separate from the other parts of the charge; and, while this court might not have reversed the judgment on this ground alone, but might have reached the opinion that in view of subsequent portions of the charge the defect in that part of it under consideration was cured or rendered harmless, nevertheless, as the judgment refusing a new trial is reversed on another ground, it is deemed best to point out the defects in the charge complained of, so that the error may be avoided upon the next trial.

[4] 4. The other portion of the charge criticized in the motion for a new trial was not error, in view of the note by the court appended to the motion.

Inasmuch as the case is remanded for a new trial, no opinion is expressed as to the sufficiency of the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., absent because of sickness.

JACKSON v. CALLAHAN. (No. 2544.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Wills §697(1)—Creditor of beneficiary before judgment cannot maintain suit for construction of will.

A nonjudgment creditor of a beneficiary under a will, who is seeking judgment against the beneficiary in a separate suit, cannot maintain an equitable action against the executor of the will, to obtain a judicial construction of the will, in order to secure an adjudication to the effect that his debtor (the devisee) took under the will an interest to which the lien of the judgment would attach if obtained.

Error from Superior Court, Taliaferro County; E. T. Shurley, Judge.

Suit by J. S. Jackson against J. H. Callahan, executor. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. A. Mitchell, of Crawfordville, for plaintiff in error.

Alvin G. Golucke and Hawes Cloud, both of Crawfordville, for defendant in error.

GEORGE, J. J. S. Jackson brought suit in the city court of Greensboro against R. L. Andrews, upon an account and a promissory note. While the suit was pending Jackson filed a petition in equity against J. H. Callahan as executor of the estate of J. V. Andrews, for the purpose of having the will of J. V. Andrews construed and the interest of R. L. Andrews under the will determined. To the petition the executor filed demurrers both general and special. The general demurrers were sustained, and the petition was dismissed.

The plaintiff is neither a judgment creditor of the beneficiary, nor does he assert any lien on or title to any estate devised to the beneficiary. He asserts no equitable claim or right to the estate devised to his debtor, nor does he seek any equitable remedy. The sole object of the action is to obtain a judicial construction of the will, in order to secure an adjudication to the effect that plaintiff's debtor took under the will an interest to which the lien of his judgment, if and when obtained, would attach. Only the personal representative of an estate may maintain an action having for its sole object the judicial construction of a will. Civil Code 1910, § 4597.

"The construction of a will may be invoked by a devisee or legatee, as a basis for the recovery of the devised or bequeathed property." Clay v. Clay, 149 Ga. 725(2), 101 S. E. 793.

See, also, Maneely v. Steele, 147 Ga. 399, 94 S. E. 227, and cases there cited.

"In cases of real difficulty in construing wills, * * * the personal representative of the estate may ask the direction of a court of equity; but direction of the court cannot be invoked by the legatee or heir unless such direction is essential to the protection of the legacy or distributive share, or is necessary as a foundation for the recovery by the legatee or heir of his legacy or distributive share." Morrison v. McFarland, 147 Ga. 465(5), 94 S. E. 569.

See, also, Civil Code 1910, § 4597.

Generally the power of courts of equity to construe wills is incidental to some recognized ground of equity jurisdiction; and it is clear that an action merely to construe a will cannot be brought by a person who has no lien on or title to the property disposed of by the will, and who may never have any interest in the property or in the construction of the will. See 40 Cyc. 1847. In Higgins v. Downs, 101 App. Div. 119, 91 N. Y. Supp. 937, it was held that even a judgment creditor of a beneficiary under a will had no right to maintain an action to obtain a judicial construction of the will, in order to secure an adjudication to the effect that his debtor took an interest under the will to which the lien of the judgment attached. In view of the foregoing, the court did not err in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., absent because of sickness.

WIMBERLY v. ROSS et al. (No. 2427.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Action \S 50(10)—Petition in suit by coheirs to establish rights and cancel deed held not multifarious.

The petition is not multifarious. Brown v. Wilcox, 147 Ga. 546(3), 94 S. E. 993; Georgia Peruvian Ochre Co. v. Cherokee Ochre Co., 152 Ga. —, 108 S. E. 609.

2. Descent and distribution \S 83—Heirs entitled to sue administratrix in her own wrong to establish rights, enjoin sale, and for accounting.

The parties plaintiff, as heirs at law of Eleanor J. Sabra, could maintain the suit under the allegations contained in the petition as amended. Allen v. Hurst, 120 Ga. 763, 48 S. E. 341; Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3929, 3983.

3. Cancellation of instruments \S 37(6)—Petition held to state cause of action for cancellation for fraud.

The petition set forth a cause of action for the cancellation of the deed from Sara Ann Ross to the defendant, Laura R. Wimberly.

4. Pleading \S 250—Petition to establish rights in property not inconsistent with amendment asking accounting and injunction against sale.

Properly construed, there was no inconsistency between the prayers of the original petition and of the amendment.

5. Equity \S 39(1)—Jurisdiction retained to grant complete relief.

Equity, having taken jurisdiction of the case for one purpose, will retain it for all purposes as made by the petition.

6. Demurrers properly overruled.

The judge did not err in overruling the demurrers, both general and special, to the petition amended.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; Malcolm D. Jones, Judge.

Suit by S. A. Ross and others against L. R. Wimberly. Demurrer to the petition was overruled, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Sara Ann Ross and Dixie V. Sabra Johnson, individually and as guardian for her two minor children, William Sabra and

James Sabra, brought a petition against Laura R. Wimberly, for the cancellation of a certain deed, for injunction, and for other relief. The petition alleged in substance the following: Plaintiffs and defendant are the only heirs at law of Eleanor J. Sabra, who died intestate in 1919, and there has been no administration on her estate; she left no debts against her estate, except a balance of about $150 on a security deed to a certain house and lot (the property in controversy) in favor of Mrs. Wing, which indebtedness, as plaintiffs are informed and believe, has been paid off from money derived from policies of insurance due to the estate of Eleanor J. Sabra. Sara Ann Ross and Laura R. Wimberly are sisters of the deceased; and Dixie V. Sabra Johnson is the widow, and William and James Sabra are the children, of James Sabra, deceased, who was the brother of Eleanor J. Sabra. Eleanor J. Sabra died seized of a certain tract of land described in the petition, and the defendant is claiming exclusive ownership of the house and lot, and is basing such claim on a quitclaim deed alleged to have been executed by Sara Ann Ross to the defendant in June, 1919, a copy of which is attached to the petition. Sara Ann Ross charges that the quitclaim deed was fraudulently obtained by the defendant, was not authorized by plaintiff, and is a forgery. Sara Ann Ross alleges that the only instrument which she signed in the presence of James C. Estes, whose name is signed to the quitclaim deed as attesting witness, was signed in June, 1919, when she went to the office of Estes, defendant's attorney, at the special instance and request of defendant, who urged plaintiff to go there, saying she wanted her to sign a paper which her lawyer had prepared, authorizing the cancellation of the mortgage deed given by Eleanor J. Sabra to Mrs. Wing; and plaintiff Ross, not having her glasses and not being able to read without them, and placing full confidence and faith in the honesty and integrity of her sister, did sign a paper which she was told by the defendant was only an order for the cancellation of the mortgage deed aforesaid. The instrument was not read over, nor its contents explained to her, at the time she signed it, but she signed it apparently in blank, solely upon the representations previously made to her by her sister, the defendant, on whose honesty and integrity she placed implicit confidence. Defendant was fully aware that she was deceiving plaintiff in obtaining her signature to the alleged quitclaim deed, and she did it for the purpose of getting an unconscionable advantage over the plaintiff. The quitclaim deed was without any consideration. Plaintiffs prayed that the quitclaim deed be ordered to be delivered up and canceled, that plaintiffs be decreed to be tenants in common of the realty in controversy with the defendant; and that the interest of each be declared. By an amendment to the petition the plaintiffs allege that at her death Eleanor J. Sabra was seized and possessed in her own right of the property described in the original petition, upon which she had created a lien by deed to secure a debt, with power of sale, in favor of Mrs. Laura Baker Wing, upon which at the time of her death there was a balance due of about $150. The deceased also left as a part of her estate a certain policy of insurance for the sum of $200 or more, and also benefits in various societies, sufficient to defray all expenses of her last illness and burial. Defendant Laura R. Wimberly, acting in her own wrong as administratrix, upon the death of Eleanor J. Sabra seized and entered upon the whole estate of the deceased, procured from Sara Ann Ross the deed by fraud, as set out in the original petition, and also collected the money on all of the policies of insurance, amounting to several hundred dollars, and with the proceeds thereof procured from Mrs. Wing a transfer to Laura R. Wimberly of the deed to secure the debt on which there was then a balance due by the deceased. Pending the hearing of this case and since it was set for final hearing and trial on January 10, 1921, the defendant by her attorneys advertised in the Macon Telegraph, on December 10, 1920, for sale under the power to sell in said deed the property described therein, being the property in controversy; and unless restrained by the court, the defendant will offer the same for sale at public outcry on January 3, 1921, and thus involve plaintiffs in further litigation with other parties who may bid on the property. Plaintiffs do not know, and have no way of learning the exact amount of money collected by the defendant on the policies of insurance; and they ask that the defendant be compelled to set out a full, itemized statement of all sums collected by her from the policies of insurance held by the deceased at her death, and the source from which same was collected, together with copies of all policies from which she collected any money. Plaintiffs charge, on information and belief, that the aggregate sum collected by the defendant amounts to between $300 and $400. The prayer in the amendment was that the defendant, her agents and attorneys, be enjoined from offering the property for sale as advertised, and from further seeking to becloud the title to the lands in controversy; that the defendant be compelled to come to a full and complete accounting as administratrix de son tort with petitioners, for all other acts and doings in connection with the estate; and that plaintiffs have judgment against her, together with the penalties provided by law, for whatever sum may be found to be due to plaintiffs as heirs at law of the deceased.

The defendant demurred to the petition, both generally and specially. The special grounds of the demurrer were because of a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, and a misjoinder of causes of action, and because the petition is multifarious. The ninth paragraph of the original petition was specially demurred, to, because the reason alleged to have been given by the defendant to the plaintiff Sara Ann Ross for wanting her to sign the quitclaim deed "is irrational and incapable of deceiving any one with normal intellect; * * * further, that no sufficient reason is set forth excusing said plaintiff, Sara Ann Ross, from knowing the contents of said deed." Paragraph 10 was demurred to for a similar reason. The amendment to the petition was demurred to upon the ground that it set up a new cause of action, and upon the further ground that it contains a misjoinder of causes of action and a misjoinder of parties plaintiff; and also because the amendment and the prayers thereto are inconsistent with paragraph 4 of the original petition, which is not stricken by the amendment, which alleges that deceased left no debts against her estate except a balance of about $150 on a mortgage deed to the house and lot in controversy, which indebtedness plaintiffs allege had been paid and satisfied from funds derived from certain policies of insurance due to the estate of the deceased. The demurrers, both general and special, were overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Walter De Fore and Jas. C. Estes, both of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

J. P. Burnett and H. F. Strohecker, both of Macon, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., absent because of sickness.

GRANT v. STATE. (No. 2397.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law \S 805(1)—Proper charge not error because another appropriate instruction not given.

It is not a good assignment of error on a portion of the judge's charge which states a correct principle of law applicable to the case, that some other correct and appropriate instruction was not given. Harvey v. State, 121 Ga. 590(2), 49 S. E. 674; Howell v. State, 124 Ga. 698(2), 52 S. E. 649; Nail v. State, 125 Ga. 234(2), 54 S. E. 145; Powers v. State, 138 Ga. 624(4), 75 S. E. 651; Hicks v. State, 146 Ga. 221(6), 91 S. E. 57; Holston National Bank v. Howard, 148 Ga. 767(1), 98 S. E. 269; Johnson v. State, 150 Ga. 67(3a), 102 S. E. 439. Under application of the principle stated above, the criticisms of the charge made in the first, fifth, and sixth grounds of the motion for new trial show no cause for reversal.

2. Criminal law \S 786(2)—Instruction as to effect of defendant's statement held not error.

The court instructed the jury: "The defendant has made a statement. While not under oath, yet the jury may believe the statement in preference to the sworn evidence." This instruction was excepted to on the following grounds: "(1) It is an incorrect statement of the law applicable to the statement of defendant, and has the effect of minimizing the statement of the defendant in this case. Especially is this true in view of the brief manner in which this branch of the law was presented and dismissed by the court. (2) This instruction omitted and failed to inform the jury that the defendant had a 'right' to make a statement in this case. (3) This charge failed to inform the jury that the statement of the defendant was a legal right which all defendants have in criminal cases. (4) The court also failed to instruct the jury that such statement 'shall not be under oath,' and failed to instruct the jury it 'shall have such force only as the jury may think right to give it.'" Held that, even if the assignment of error was in good form, none of the grounds of criticism of the charge were meritorious.

3. Homicide \S 304, 309(3)—Evidence held not to require charge on accident or manslaughter in commission of unlawful act.

The evidence did not require a charge (1) on the law of misadventure or accident, (2) or on the law of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act.

4. Homicide \S 235—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for murdering one person in attack on another.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict finding the defendant guilty, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

J. C. Grant was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Grant, on trial for the murder of Wyley Heussey, was found guilty, and the jury recommended that he be punished by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for life. His motion for a new trial having been overruled, he excepted.

The homicide occurred on a street and near a restaurant in the business section of the city of Gainesville. The testimony of the state's witnesses tended to show that it occurred under the following circumstances: An automobile was standing parallel with the sidewalk extending along the side of a building, the left wheels resting in a shallow gutter in the street running along the edge of the sidewalk. J. B. Hale, proprietor of the car, was seated in the left front seat in a position to drive, and B. M. Farmer was in the right front seat. They were preparing to go home, and invited Wyley Heussey to go with them. Heussey was standing on the sidewalk facing the left side of the car talking with Hale. Other persons were about the car. After testifying as above, Hale testified further: J. C. Grant came up flourishing his pistol, commanding the crowd to "hands up." After intimidating the crowd in such manner, he went around on the right side of the car and fired his pistol twice at Farmer, one shot grazing his breast and the other passing through the fleshy part of the forearm. Referring to the first shot that was fired, Hale testified that Grant, addressing Farmer, said, "You and I have had an argument to-night," and fired at Farmer; also, that when the shot was fired Hale was leaning forward over his steering wheel, and Farmer was leaning back with his hands up. Hale further testified:

"As far as I can figure it out, he [Grant] struck him [Farmer] when he came down with the gun. He hit him in the mouth with the cylinder of the gun, and the fire of the gun burnt his chest. * * * He is said to have been struck in the face at the time the shot was fired, by the doctor. I did not see him strike him."

Concerning the first shot, Farmer testified:

"Grant ran around the car and threw his pistol in my face, and struck me there [indicating] on the lip and fired. And as he threw his pistol over he says, 'You and I have had an argument before, and I guess, * * * this will settle it.' * * * He threw his gun over into me and shot, and the shot glanced me across the breast here [indicating], and then when he done it I started to jump out on him, I started to get out and reached for the front of the door, and he shot again and shot me through the arm. * * * From where he was that would have been straight across the car front. At that time Heussey would have been directly towards him. Heussey was still standing there when the first shot was fired."

At the first shot Hale jumped out of the car and ran, as did all the others except Farmer. He reached into the pocket of the right front door of the car, drew out a pistol, and proceeded to attack Grant, shooting at him twice as he ran behind the car. When the shooting was over it was ascertained that Heussey had been wounded by one shot that entered his body near the naval and came out at the back, from which wound he died in about 30 minutes. The defendant did not introduce any witness, but made a statement before the jury, in which, so far as necessary to be stated, he denied that he was the man who killed Heussey, and stated further that—

Hale shortly before had assaulted Heussey, on account of which "some of the boys came running around and says, 'We ought not to let no Atlanta man do a Gainesville boy that way,' and I ran over to my car, cut loose, and come around there. Well I reached and got my gun, 32 caliber. * * * They wasn't but one bullet. That is the ball that Mr. Summers found in the car. I went around to where Farmer was in the car. Hale was going to go, and I ran around in front of the car, and Heussey was between the building and the car. And Farmer says, 'What the damned hell you got to do with it? Don't move now!' He had his gun in his hand, a 45. I hit him with this gun 32 caliber, my pistol, the onliest one I had; hit a stroke across there, * * * and the gun discharged by striking Farmer. I ran. I knew there wasn't but one cartridge in it. I ran around back of the car, * * * and just as I turned by the left-hand wall of this house, this man kept shooting at me; done shot me through the leg, and all of them was running down the street, and he shot at me two or three times in the crowd."

The grounds of the original motion for new trial were the usual general grounds. The grounds of the amendment to the motion were:

1. The court charged the jury as follows: "The defendant enters the trial with the presumption of innocence in his favor, and that presumption follows him until his guilt has been clearly proven under the rules which the court gives you in charge." Movant insists that said charge is error, for the following reasons: (1) It omitted to inform the jury that the testimony in the case, to overcome this presumption, must have the effect of satisfying the jury to a moral and reasonable certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant. (2) It failed to inform the jury that the presumption of innocence is in the nature of evidence, and avails the defendant at every stage of the trial until it is overcome by evidence which has the effect of satisfying the minds of the jury as to the defendant's guilt, to a moral and reasonable certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt.

2. The court charged the jury as follows: "The defendant has made a statement. While not under oath, yet the jury may believe the statement in preference to the sworn evidence." Movant insists that said charge is error, for the following reasons: (1) It is an incorrect statement of the law applicable to the statement of defendant, and has the effect of minimizing the statement of the defendant in this case. Especially is this true in view of the brief manner in which this branch of the law was presented and dismissed by the court. (2) This instruction omitted and failed to inform the jury that the defendant had a "right" to make a statement in this case. (3) This charge failed to inform the jury that the statement of the defendant was a legal right which all defendants have in criminal cases. (4) The court also failed to instruct the jury that such statement "shall not be under oath," and failed to instruct the jury it "shall have such force only as the jury may think right to give it."

3. The court erred in omitting and failing to charge the jury the law of misadventure or accident. This omission was error, because: (1) The facts raised this issue and required such a charge. (2) Such law, under the evidence, was directly applicable to the case, and the failure so to charge was prejudicial to the movant and his rights. (3) Under the evidence of witnesses for the state and the statement of the accused, it was shown that accused and deceased were friends, and that the conduct of the accused, on the occasion of the homicide, was induced by a desire on his part to protect the deceased in a matter of difference which had arisen between J. B. Hale, witness for the state, and the deceased. (4) No motive on the part of defendant for the killing of the deceased was shown by the evidence.

4. The court erred in omitting and failing to charge the jury the law of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act. This omission was error, because the facts in this case raised this issue and required such a charge. B. M. Farmer, witness for the state, testified: "And he was between the car and Grant. Grant was out a little further in front. Then all at once he ran around the car. Came around the front end of the car. Q. Who ran around? A. Grant, and threw his pistol in my face, and struck me there on lip, and fired." Defendant stated: "Farmer says, 'What the damned hell have you got to do with it? Don't move now!'" * * * I hit him with the 32 caliber pistol, the only one I had; hit a stroke across there [indicating], and the gun discharged, striking Farmer. I ran."

5. The court charged the jury as follows: "I charge you that if Wiley Heussey, the man alleged to have been killed in this case, was shot and killed by Farmer, either purposely or accidentally, then you could not convict the defendant Grant." Movant insists that this charge was error, because, in connection with said charge, the court failed to instruct the jury that if they had, on this point, a reasonable doubt as to whether Farmer or Grant killed Heussey, then they should give the defendant the benefit of this doubt and acquit him.

6. The court charged the jury as follows: "I charge you that if Grant, without any provocation from Farmer, without any sort of mitigation or justification, shot at Farmer, intending to kill him, with malice, either expressed or implied, and that the shot that was intended for Farmer, whether it hit him or not, in some way struck and killed Wiley Heussey, it would not make any difference whether Grant had anything against Wiley Heussey or not—might have been his best friend. But if he shot at Farmer, intending to kill Farmer, if it had been murder if he had killed Farmer under the law I have given you in charge, then I charge you if that shot, or one of those shots, if there were more than one, all of which you must determine, killed Wiley Heussey, then I charge you that the defendant, J. O. Grant, would be guilty of murder. If he shot and killed Wiley Heussey, his defense depends upon whether he was justified, or whether there was any mitigation in shooting at Farmer, if he shot at him. What the circumstances are, and what the facts are, is for you to determine." Movant insists that said charge was error and prejudicial to him, for the following reasons: (1) The court failed to instruct the jury, in this connection, that the detailed facts must be believed by the jury to a moral and reasonable certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. (2) This charge failed to instruct the jury on the law of justifiable homicide as contained in sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code of Georgia; the court having nowhere in the charge defined justifiable homicide or the law in reference thereto. (3) This charge failed to instruct the jury on the law of voluntary manslaughter or upon any of the grades of manslaughter, and failed to inform the jury under what circumstances and conditions a homicide might be mitigated or reduced to manslaughter, or involuntary manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act, the court nowhere in the charge referring to or defining these branches of homicide. (4) The charge contained no suggestion as to the law in reference to justification or mitigation in cases of homicide, neither in the particular charge here excepted to, nor in the entire charge.

DANIEL v. JOSEPH ROSENHEIM SHOE CO. (No. 2583.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Judgment ~~reversed~~ 407(2)—Equitable petition to amend not maintainable, there being adequate remedy at law.

Harper Daniel filed an equitable petition returnable to the December term, 1919, of the superior court, which alleged in substance as follows: In an action brought by Joseph Rosenheim Shoe Company against Harper Daniel the jury returned a verdict as follows: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff $839. June 9, 1915. B. D. Jones, Foreman"—upon which the following judgment was rendered: "Wherefore it is considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the plaintiff, Joseph Rosenheim Shoe Company, do have and recover of said defendant, Harper Daniel, the principal sum of $839, together with interest on the same from October 1, 1909, at 7 per cent. per annum, and the further sum of $—, costs. E. E. Cox, J. S. C. S. C." Execution was duly issued by the clerk of the superior court, "which called for the payment of $839," which amount the defendant immediately paid to the sheriff of said county, the officer having charge of the fi. fa. for collection, and said officer marked across the face of the fi. fa. the word "Satisfied" and delivered the same to the defendant in fi. fa. The defendant in fi. fa. requested the sheriff to deliver the same to the clerk of the superior court with the request that the clerk mark the same satisfied and canceled on the general execution docket. The fi. fa. was marked "Satisfied," but the clerk failed to have the same canceled. Subsequently, in April, 1917, the sheriff levied the same fi. fa. for an additional sum which purported to be interest as stated on the face of the fi. fa., and threatened to advertise and sell the property levied upon, to the damage and injury of the petitioner. At the time petitioner paid the amount of principal due on the judgment the words, "with interest on same from October 1, 1909, at 7 per cent. per annum" did not appear on the fi. fa., but were written there after the same was paid and delivered to the sheriff to be by him delivered to the clerk of the court for the purpose of having the same canceled upon the records; and petitioner charges that the writing of the interest into the fi. fa. was a fraud upon him, and was so made by the plaintiff in fi. fa. or through its attorneys without the knowledge or consent of petitioner, and was not discovered until June, 1919; that petitioner discovered said fraud only when the sheriff made the levy complained of. Petitioner further contends that he had fully paid the amount of the "verdict" before interest accrued thereon, and that the portion of the judgment in reference to interest is null and void and a fraud on petitioner. The prayers are that the sheriff and the plaintiff in fi. fa. be enjoined and restrained from advertising or selling or in any way interfering with the property levied on under the said fi. fa. and judgment, that the judgment be vacated and declared void and canceled of record as to that portion of it which provides for interest from October 1, 1909, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, to be paid, and that the said judgment be declared satisfied as to the amount of the principal. The defendant demurred to the petition on several grounds, it being necessary to mention only the following: (a) The petition sets forth no cause of action. (b) The judgment sought to be set aside was rendered more than three years prior to the filing of plaintiff's petition. (c) The plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law by affidavit of illegality. Held:

If the plaintiff is not barred of a right to have the judgment so amended as to make it conform to the verdict in the case, under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 4358, relating to motions to set aside judgments, nevertheless his remedy at law for this purpose would be complete, and a resort to equity is not necessary.

2. Execution \S 171(2)—Proceedings not enjoined because of alteration there being remedy by affidavit of illegality.

In so far as the petition complains of the action in regard to amending the fi. fa. by or through the attorneys of the plaintiff in fi. fa., the petitioner had an adequate remedy at law by affidavit of illegality; and therefore injunction is not the proper remedy. Monroe v. Security Mutual Life Insurance Co., 127 Ga. 549, 56 S. E. 764; Park v. Callaway, 128 Ga. 119, 57 S. E. 229; Williams v. Kennedy, 134 Ga. 339, 341, 67 S. E. 821; Smith v. Murphey, 140 Ga. 80, 78 S. E. 423.

3. Petition properly dismissed.

It follows from the above rulings that the court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the petition.

HAM v. PRESTON. (No. 2556.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 670(2), 729, 1200—Exceptions, bill of \S 13, 39(1), 58(4)—Affidavit of service held sufficient; affidavit of service cannot be impeached, explained or sustained in the Supreme Court; affidavit of service can only be impeached for fraud; bill of exceptions held to comply with statute as to brief of evidence; bill of exceptions held presented to the judge in time; assignment of error to granting of nonsuit held sufficient; "proving."

Civ. Code 1910, § 6160, declares: "Within ten days after the bill of exceptions is signed and certified, the party plaintiff therein shall serve a copy thereof upon the opposite party or his attorney, and if there be several parties with different attorneys, upon each, with a return of such service (or acknowledgment of service) indorsed upon or annexed to such bill of exceptions." The affidavit of the plaintiff in error in regard to service, entered on the back of the bill of exceptions as it appears in this court, states a substantial compliance with the section of the Code above quoted. It has been held that this section, properly construed, requires personal service. This court will construe that the language of the entry of service on the back of the bill of exceptions, to wit, that the attorney for the plaintiff in error "has this day served O. M. Duke, attorney of record for the defendant in said case, with a copy of the bill of exceptions," means that the latter was personally served. The Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to hear evidence to explain, to sustain, or to impeach the verity of such an affidavit. It could be impeached only on the ground of fraud, and in the superior court. Georgia, Florida & Alabama Ry. Co. v. Lasseter, 122 Ga. 679, 51 S. E. 15. And see Wade v. Watson, 133 Ga. 608, 66 S. E. 922.

(a) The evidence which is incorporated in the bill of exceptions is a substantial compliance with section 6140(1), Civ. Code 1910, relating to the preparation of briefs of evidence. (Hill, J., dissenting.)

(b) The judgment complained of was rendered on February 24, 1921; the bill of exceptions was presented to the judge of the superior court on March 26, 1921. It follows that the ground of the motion to dismiss, based on the contention that the bill of exceptions was not tendered to the judge within the time required by law, is without merit.

(c) The assignment of error is as follows: "To the order and judgment of the court granting said nonsuit the plaintiff excepted, now excepts, and assigns the same as error, and says that the evidence offered required the submission of the issues to a jury and authorizes a recovery for the plaintiff." This was a sufficient assignment of error. None of the grounds of the motion to dismiss the writ of error being meritorious, the motion is denied.

2. Deeds — Evidence held to make question for jury as to delivery during grantor's lifetime.

Under the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, the jury would have been authorized to find a verdict in his favor. It was error to sustain the motion for a nonsuit.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Deeds — Delivery during grantor's lifetime essential.

Delivery of deeds during the life of the grantor is essential to constitute a valid conveyance.

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; W. E. H. Searcy, Jr., Judge.

Suit by J. H. Ham against Mrs. W. W. Preston. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Ham brought suit against Mrs. W. Walker Preston, alleging, in substance, that he is the sole heir at law of Mrs. Emma G. Ham, deceased; that all of her property descended to and became his property, there being no debts against said estate; that among the property owned by Mrs. Emma G. Ham was certain described property situated in Flovilla, Ga.; that some time prior to the death of Mrs. Emma G. Ham she signed certain instruments purporting to be deeds to the said real estate, conveying the same to Mrs. W. Walker Preston, and deposited these instruments of writing into the hands of J. T. Gibson, who was cashier of the Bank of Flovilla, as her agent; that said papers remained in the hands of her said agent at the time of her death; that immediately after her death the husband of the defendant demanded said papers from Gibson, and they were delivered by Gibson to W. Walker Preston; that after the death of Mrs. Ham said deeds were recorded in the clerk's office of Butts superior court; that the record of said instruments constitutes a cloud upon the title of petitioner to the property therein described; that said instruments, purporting to be deeds, were never legally delivered to Mrs. W. Walker Preston, and therefore passed no title to any of said property; and that said deeds were void and of no effect. The prayers are that the defendant be required to produce said instruments of writing; that they be decreed to be void and of no effect, and to constitute a cloud upon the title of petitioner; that the record of said instruments in the clerk's office be expunged; and for process.

The case proceeded to trial before a jury; and after the introduction of evidence by the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which motion the court sustained. The plaintiff excepted.

On the call of the case in this court the defendant moved to dismiss the writ of error, on the following grounds:

"(1) Because plaintiff in error has not incorporated in the bill of exceptions a brief of so much of the evidence as is material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, and has not had such brief approved by the judge, made a part of the record, and sent up by the clerk as a part thereof. (2) Because there is no sufficient assignment of error. (3) Because there is no such evidence of the service of the bill of exceptions and writ of error as is required by law. (4) Because it does not appear that the bill of exceptions was tendered to the judge within the time required by law."

In response to the motion the attorney for the plaintiff moved the court to allow him to amend his original affidavit as to service upon the defendant, written on the bill of exceptions and sworn to by him, by adding "to said affidavit that the service of the bill of exceptions was served on O. M. Duke by handing him a copy of said bill of exceptions in person, and that said bill of exceptions was personally served on said O. M. Duke." The original affidavit as to service of the bill of exceptions is as follows:

"Georgia, Butts County. In person appeared before the undersigned authority O. L. Redman, who on oath says that he is an attorney of record in the within case for plaintiff in error, and that he has this day served O. M. Duke, attorney of record for defendant in the said case, with a copy of this bill of exceptions in this case, with the certificate of the judge thereon and all entered thereon."

Mallet & Bell, of Atlanta, and O. L. Redman and H. M. Fletcher, both of Jackson, for plaintiff in error.

O. M. Duke, of Flovilla, and John R. L. Smith and Grady C. Harris, both of Macon, for defendant in error.

GILBERT, J. [1] 1. The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions has been sufficiently dealt with in the headnotes, except that portion dealing with the sufficiency of the brief of the evidence. The only evidence submitted on the hearing of the case is contained in the bill of exceptions, and the recital of it is as follows:

"Plaintiff introduced evidence proving that said defendant, Mrs. W. Walker Preston, is a resident of said county; that plaintiff and the said Mrs. Emma G. Ham were intermarried on the 23d day of September, 1915; and that the said Mrs. Ham died on the 14th day of December, 1918, leaving plaintiff her sole surviving heir at law; and that there were no debts against the estate of the said Mrs. Ham. That the said Mrs. Ham, at the time of her death, owned certain real estate, consisting of a dwelling house and lot and a storehouse and lot in the town of Flovilla, Ga., and that said real estate is the same as that described in Exhibits A and B, respectively, attached to plaintiff's petition; that this was the only real estate owned by the said Mrs. Ham; that she continued to collect the rents on said dwelling house and lot, and exercised other rights of ownership over said property; that, prior to her death, the said Mrs. Ham signed two instruments of writing, which were introduced in evidence with Exhibits A and B attached to plaintiff's petition, and that said Exhibits A and B were exact copies of said instruments, except that on the instrument purporting to be a warranty deed to said dwelling-house and lot there was written on said instrument the following words: 'To be delivered at my death (to Bess Preston) 7/14/16. Mrs. Emma G. Ham'—said words or notation being in the handwriting of the said Mrs. Ham; that some time prior to her death, during the fall or about September before she died in December, the said Mrs. Ham deposited with J. T. Gibson, cashier of the Bank of Flovilla, said instruments of writing together with other papers, all of which were sealed in a large envelope or wrapper, telling the said Gibson, 'Keep these papers for me; and if anything happens to me, turn them over to Bess' (meaning thereby Mrs. W. W. Preston); that the said Gibson had been acquainted with the said Mrs. Ham for '20-odd years,' and that before her marriage to plaintiff the said Mrs. Ham had operated a store next door to the bank of which the said Gibson was cashier, and that the said Mrs. Ham had often left other papers and valuables with the said Gibson for safe-keeping; that she kept money on deposit in said bank, and that the said Gibson would make deposits for the said Mrs. Ham as her agent, and often collected the rents on said dwelling house and lot and deposited the same to the credit of the said Mrs. Ham; that when the said sealed envelope was delivered to the said Gibson by Mrs. Ham there was written on the outside of the same the following words: 'Mrs. J. H. Ham's papers'—and that no other writing or notation appeared thereon.

"The said Gibson never parted with the possession of said papers, nor was he ever authorized or directed to deliver them to any one during the lifetime of the said Mrs. Ham. On the afternoon following the morning on which Mrs. Ham died, Miss Lucy Goodman called Mr. Gibson on the telephone and said 'Mrs. Ham told her (Miss Goodman) to tell him (Mr. Gibson) to deliver those papers to Mrs. Preston as soon as she died.' Miss Goodman asked Mr. Gibson if she could come and get the papers for Mrs. Preston. Mr. Gibson replied that he didn't know exactly where they were, but that he would get them up and deliver them. The said Gibson did not deliver the papers to the said Mrs. Preston, but two days later gave them to her husband, W. W. Preston, telling him Miss Lucy Goodman said that Mrs. Ham said to deliver them to Mrs. Preston as soon as she died. When said Gibson delivered this package of papers to said W. W. Preston, he had never opened said envelope, nor did he know what the same contained. Gibson testified, on cross-examination, that he supposed, or rather his understanding was, Mrs. Ham meant for him to deliver the papers to Mrs. Preston if she died before she called for them to be returned to herself; and that she never called for them after giving them to him to keep for her. The said Mrs. Ham had sold to W. W. Preston (under bond for title) the storehouse and lot, and held his (W. W. Preston's) notes for the balance of the purchase money due. About one month before she died she told Raymond Biles, who was doing clerical work for the government in J. H. Ham's office, that she had bought a home on Mulberry street (Jackson), and she wished she could sell her house at Flovilla; she said she had sold her store to her brother-in-law, and wished he would pay his notes; that if he would pay the notes, and she could sell her house, she would be all right. About two months before her death the said Mrs. Ham told T. W. Nelson that, if she could sell her place at Flovilla, she would not have to borrow any money to pay on the place they were buying here (in Jackson). About a month before her death Mrs. Ham told John Billie Mays that she was going to sell her home at Flovilla and put the money in the place she and Judge Ham were buying in Jackson."

The defendant in error moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions, upon the ground that no brief of evidence was incorporated in either the bill of exceptions or in an approved brief of the evidence. The ruling that should be made upon this motion is not altogether free from difficulty; but, after considering the question, we are of the opinion that the bill of exceptions substantially complies with the statute which requires that the evidence, or enough of the evidence to make clear the issue involved, is set forth in the bill of exceptions. It is insisted that the recital that the plaintiff introduced evidence "proving that," etc., shows that what purports to be a brief of the evidence is nothing more than a conclusion of the judge as to what the evidence established; but we cannot agree with this contention. We think that the expression "proving," as here used, is the equivalent of "in effect," or "in substance," or "in brief," the evidence following; that, where it is recited that evidence was introduced proving certain facts stated, it is meant that there was evidence introduced as follows that expression there used. If the bill of exceptions had recited that the plaintiff introduced evidence "in effect" as follows, or "in substance" as follows, it would hardly be contended that the bill of exceptions did not contain a brief of the evidence. Construing the expression "proving" as equivalent to "in effect" or "in substance," we reach the conclusion that what is set forth in the form of evidence is a brief of the evidence. The conclusion that we have here reached is strengthened by a reading of the entire brief of evidence. It is true that all of the evidence is connected with the evidence "proving that"; but when we read the statements following that expression, we see that it is a clear and brief recital of the facts, and is not in the form of a statement of a mere conclusion either of the judge or of counsel for the plaintiff in error.

[2, 3] 2. The evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the deeds were not delivered during the life of the grantor, which is essential to constitute a valid conveyance. Baxter v. Chapman, 147 Ga. 438, 94 S. E. 544. Under such a finding the plaintiff would have been entitled to a verdict and judgment in his favor; and accordingly it was error to award a nonsuit. Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., dissenting, and FISH, O. J., absent on account of sickness.

HILL, J. I dissent from the ruling made in head-note 1 (a). I do not think that such a brief of the evidence is incorporated in the bill of exceptions as is contemplated by Civil Code 1910, § 6140. What is incorporated therein amounts to the conclusion of the presiding judge, or the attorney for the plaintiff in error. It does not appear as a brief of the evidence at all, but recites that the "plaintiff offered evidence proving that," etc. The section of the Code, supra, provides that the plaintiff in error "shall incorporate in the bill of exceptions a brief of so much of the written and oral evidence as is material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of." In the absence of "a brief" of the evidence in the bill of exceptions, or therein specified and shown in the record, I am unable to say whether the facts as set out were "proved" or not.

Criminal law §935(1)—New trial properly refused when evidence authorized verdict.

JOHNSON v. STATE. (No. 12640.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Homicide §317—Admission of dying declarations harmless where verdict indicates jury did not believe them.

Conceding, but not deciding, that the admission of the alleged dying declarations of the deceased was error, it was not error requiring a new trial, since, if the jury had believed the declarations, the only possible legal finding would have been a verdict of murder, and they convicted the defendant of voluntary manslaughter. See, in this connection Pyle v. State, 4 Ga. App. 817, 818, 62 S. E. 540.

2. Assignments not passed on.

Under the foregoing ruling, it is unnecessary to pass upon the assignment of error upon the charge of the court as to dying declarations.

3. Homicide §340(4)—Defendant convicted of manslaughter cannot complain of errors in charging on murder.

A ground of the motion for a new trial complains that the court erred in instructing the jury upon the subject of murder. The defendant, having been convicted of manslaughter, and not of murder, will not be heard to complain of alleged errors of the court in charging the law of murder. Thompson v. State, 24 Ga. App. 144(2), 99 S. E. 891, and citations.

4. Criminal law §811(1)—Stating contentions of state at greater length than those of defendant does not necessarily constitute undue stress.

The complaint made in another ground of the motion for a new trial that the judge in his charge failed to state fully and clearly the contentions of the defendant is without merit. Conceding that the contentions of the state were stated more at length than those of the defendant, "It is well settled that the mere fact that contentions of one side are stated more at length than those of the other does not show that undue stress was laid upon or undue prominence given to the contentions so stated."

Smith v. State, 24 Ga. App. 654(2a), 101 S. E. 764, and citation.

5. Criminal law \S 935(1)—New trial properly denied where evidence and statements warranted verdict.

The evidence, with the dying declarations of the deceased excluded, and the defendant's statement to the jury, authorized the verdict of voluntary manslaughter, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Criminal law \S 1160—Verdict authorized by evidence and approved by trial judge not disturbed.

SOUTHERN UPHOLSTERING CO. v. LIEBERMAN. (No. 12401.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Frauds, statute of \S 89(1)—Oral contracts of sale not within statute when part of goods accepted and paid for.

The two contracts for the purchase and sale of merchandise, set forth in the separate counts of the petition, although each exceeded $50 in amount, did not fall within the statute of frauds, because, under the allegations, the buyer had accepted and paid for part of the goods sold under such oral entire contracts, so as to bring the agreements within the excepting clause in subdivision 7 of section 3222 of Civil Code 1910. Blumenthal v. Schneider, 21 Ga. App. 435, 94 S. E. 640.

2. Sales \S 370, 384(2)—Buyer's repudiation of entire contract after partial delivery entitles seller to sue for breach; measure of damages for buyer's breach is difference between contract and market prices.

The alleged contracts being entire, although providing for monthly deliveries of specified quantities, the repudiation of such contracts by the buyer, after partial delivery of the merchandise, but before full delivery, authorized the seller to bring his suit for damages on account of the breach. The alleged measure of damages was proper, viz. the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place for delivery. Robson & Evans v. Hale & Sons, 139 Ga. 753, 78 S. E. 177; Seabrook Coal Co. v. Moore, 25 Ga. App. 613, 614, 103 S. E. 839; Smith v. Harrison, 106 S. E. 191; Phosphate Mining Co. v. Atlanta Oil, etc., Co., 20 Ga. App. 660, 93 S. E. 532.

3. Sales \S 153—No tender required where buyer repudiates contract.

The buyer, under the allegations, having repudiated its contracts and refusing to be bound thereby, it was not incumbent upon the seller to make a tender of the merchandise.

4. Sales \S 11—Executory agreement to sell thing having no actual present existence is binding, if not speculative.

If a contract amounts merely to an executory agreement to sell, the parties may be bound, although the subject-matter has no actual existence, provided the agreement is not merely speculative, but contemplates an actual future delivery of the thing bargained for. Forsyth Mfg. Co. v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 199, 202, 37 S. E. 485, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28; Jones v. Fuller, 107 S. E. 545, 546.

5. Sales \S 377—Plaintiff alleging correct measure of damages need not allege abatement or mitigation.

The petition having set up the correct measure of damages under the facts alleged, it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to allege by his petition that he had undertaken to abate, mitigate, or lessen such damage.

6. Contracts ¶10(4)—Contracts requiring definite quantity to be ordered each month not unilateral.

The contracts alleged were not unilateral, in that they left to the purchaser the option of directing when and where the monthly installments of merchandise were to be delivered, the contracts further definitely providing for a specified quantity to be so ordered in each month. Seabrook Coal Co. v. Moore, supra, (2, 8).

7. Petition cured by amendment.

The amendment to the petition, which appears to have been allowed without objection of the defendant, cured such of the grounds of demurrer as might otherwise have been sustained.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law ¶938(3)—Alleged newly discovered evidence held not to require new trial.

The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is based upon newly discovered evidence. An affidavit is made that the gun used by the accused at the time of the alleged assault was "what is known as 'easy on trigger' and liable to fire with slight pressure on the trigger." This fact will not now avail the plaintiff in error, because: (a) The evidence shows that he had been using the gun and had shot it a number of times on the day of the alleged assault, and necessarily knew, if such was really true, that the gun was "easy on the trigger." (b) The defense was not "bottomed" upon the idea that the gun was "easy on the trigger," and the defendant made no such claim in his statement.

2. Criminal law ¶828—Charge on evidence of good character unnecessary unless requested in writing.

The second ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial complains that the judge erred in failing to charge on the good character of the defendant. It is true that a number of witnesses testified as to his good character, but there was no request for a charge on this subject. "In the absence of a written request the court did not err in failing to charge on the weight to be given to evidence of good character." Scarboro v. State, 24 Ga. App. 29 (6), 99 S. E. 637.

3. Criminal law ¶1160—Verdict approved by trial judge not disturbed.

No error of law was committed on the trial, the jury was convinced of the guilt of the accused, the trial judge approved their finding, and this court will allow it to stand.

SPENCER v. NORTHWESTERN NAT. INS. CO. (No. 12648.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Account, action on ¶6(4) — In action against agent for premiums, demurrer properly overruled.

In a suit on an open account, the original petition alleged that the defendant was indebted to the petitioner "in the principal sum of two thousand one hundred seven & ⁹⁴/₁₀₀ dollars for the net balance of insurance premiums on policies of insurance written by the defendant in behalf of petitioner as local agent in said county," and an exhibit was attached to and made a part of the petition, showing the various amounts, the months when due, and the interest on each amount, which together made the total sum sued for. To meet a demurrer, an amendment was made, giving a minutely itemized statement of the account, and the demurrer was overruled. Held, no error. Southern Ry. Co. v. Grant, 136 Ga. 303, 71 S. E. 422, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 472.

2. Appeal and error ¶967(1)—Discretion of judge in appointing auditor not interfered with unless abused.

In all cases involving matters of account the judge may, upon the application of either party, or upon his own motion, where, in his judgment, the facts and circumstances of the case require it, appoint an auditor to investigate such matters of account. Civ. Code 1910, § 5128. This statutory discretion will not be interfered with unless abused. Martin v. Foley, 82 Ga. 552, 9 S. E. 582; Mayor, etc., of Gainesville v. Jaudon, 145 Ga. 303, 89 S. E. 210.

3. Reference \Leftrightarrow 8(7)—Case properly referred to auditor when long account involved and defendant denied each paragraph of petition.

An action on open account, with bill of particulars attached, consisting of several hundred items of alleged indebtedness, where the defendant denies each paragraph of the petition, making it necessary to examine the books of both plaintiff and defendant, thus constituting complex and intricate matters of account which cannot be conveniently and safely examined in a court by a jury, may be properly referred to an auditor. The present record shows clearly such a case.

WADE v. STATE. (No. 12858.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1, Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 797—Failure to charge that jury could recommend punishment as for misdemeanor held not error.

The accused was charged with rape and found guilty of an assault with intent to rape. The evidence showed that the female in question was under 14 years of age. Under the ruling in Todd v. State, 25 Ga. App. 411, 103 S. E. 496, the court did not err in failing to instruct the jury that they could, if they saw fit, recommend that the defendant be punished as for a misdemeanor.

2. Rape \Leftrightarrow 54(1)—Corroboration not essential to conviction for assault.

In a case where a defendant is convicted of an assault with intent to rape, it is not essential that the testimony of the female in question be corroborated. Rivers v. State, 8 Ga. App. 703 (2), 70 S. E. 50, and citation. This rule was not changed by the act of the General Assembly of Georgia approved July 31, 1918 (Ga. Laws, 1918, p. 259). That act provides that no conviction shall be had for rape on the unsupported testimony of the female in question, but there is no such provision as to an assault with intent to rape.

3. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 935(1)—New trial properly denied when verdict authorized.

Under the above rulings, none of the special grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is meritorious. The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

1. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 958(1)—Motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence without statutory affidavits not considered.

The only special ground of the motion for a new trial is based upon alleged newly discovered evidence, but no affidavits of movant, counsel, or witnesses are produced, as required by section 6088 of the Civil Code of 1910; therefore this ground of the motion is so defective that it cannot be considered.

"Where in a certificate to a bill of exceptions the judge certifies that the bill of exceptions 'as amended' is true, and the amendment referred to consists of a note by the judge which precedes the certificate, and which shows that the bill of exceptions is in part not true, the writ of error must be dismissed. While the judge may supply omissions in a bill of exceptions by interlineations or notes, any interlineation or note which has the effect of showing that some of the averments in the bill of exceptions are not true will work a dismissal of the writ of error, when the bill of exceptions is certified to be true only 'as amended.' Fort v. Sheffield, 108 Ga. 781, 33 S. E. 680, and case cited; Sanges v. State, 110 Ga. 260, 34 S. E. 327. See, also, Johnson v. Equitable Security Co., 113 Ga. 1153, 39 S. Nov. 16, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Criminal law \S 798½—Where defendant admitted guilt of included offense, failure to give form of verdict of acquittal not error.

The defendant was convicted of seduction, and complains in his motion for a new trial that the judge in his charge instructed the jury as to the forms of their verdict if they should find the defendant guilty of seduction or of fornication, but failed to give any form of a verdict for acquittal. There is no merit in this exception to the charge, since there was no evidence authorizing an acquittal, and the defendant in his statement to the jury admitted that he was guilty of fornication.

2. Criminal law \S 1156(3)—Discretion in denying new trial for newly discovered impeaching evidence not interfered with.

The alleged newly discovered evidence being impeaching in its character, and it appearing from the facts of the case that it probably could have been discovered before the trial of the case if the defendant had exercised ordinary diligence, the discretion of the court in overruling that ground of the motion for a new trial, which was based upon the alleged newly discovered evidence, will not be controlled.

FRONEBARGER v. STATE. (No. 12703.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Indictment and information \S 192—Conviction for assault unauthorized when offense, if any, was other assault and battery or assault with intent to rape.

It is well settled that upon the trial of one charged with assault with intent to rape, where the undisputed evidence shows that if any offense was committed it was either assault with intent to rape or assault and battery, a verdict, finding the defendant guilty of a mere assault, is contrary to the law and the evidence. Harris v. State, 8 Ga. App. 457, 60 S. E. 127; Owens v. State, 9 Ga. App. 441 (2), 71 S. E. 680.

(a) In the instant case the evidence showed one or more assaults by the defendant on the female in question, but the evidence further showed that each assault was consummated by a battery, either at the time of the assault or almost immediately thereafter. It follows that the defendant's conviction of a simple assault was contrary to law and the evidence, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

STANDARD PAINT & LEAD WORKS v. POWELL. (No. 12368.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Trial \S 252(13)—Where pleading and evidence showed only implied warranty, charge properly limited accordingly.

The defendant's plea does not set up an express warranty governing the quality of the goods purchased, but relies merely upon a breach of the warranty implied by law, and alleges that the goods were totally worthless. Neither does the testimony relative to the terms and conditions of the trade disclose any express agreement, such as would exclude the warranty implied by law. Elgin Jewelry Co. v. Estes, 122 Ga. 807, 810, 50 S. E. 939; Lovvorn v. Eldorado Jewelry Co., 1 Ga. App. 349, 57 S. E. 926; White v. Mercantile Jewelry Co., 6 Ga. App. 860, 65 S. E. 1075. The court, therefore, did not err in limiting the charge accordingly. New South Rubber Co. v. Muse, 27 Ga. App. —, 109 S. E. 296.

2. Evidence \S 91—Trial \S 255(3)—Burden on plaintiff, except where defendant admits prima facie case entitling plaintiff to recover, without more; instruction on shifting of burden need not be given without request, when prima facie case not admitted.

Except in cases where the defendant by his plea admits a prima facie case as alleged in the petition, so that the plaintiff, without more, could recover in the amount sued for, or where the defendant in open court makes such an admission and thereby assumes the burden of proof, the burden in all cases brought ex contractu lies upon the plaintiff, and it is incumbent upon him to establish all of the unadmitted material allegations as laid in the petition. Since the plea in the instant case does not admit a prima facie case, upon which the plaintiff, without more, could recover in the amount sued for, the general burden remained upon the plaintiff; and in the absence of a timely request, it was not incumbent upon the court to charge upon the shifting of the burden under the development of the evidence. Western & Atlantic Ry. Co. v. Brown, 102 Ga. 13, 29 S. E. 130; Brunswick R. Co. v. Wiggins, 113 Ga. 842, 845, 39 S. E. 551, 61 L. R. A. 513; Askew v. Amos, 147 Ga. 613, 95 S. E. 5; Lazenby v. Citizens' Bank, 20 Ga. App. 53, 55(2), 92 S. E. 391.

3. Evidence \S 129(1)—Trial \S 85—General exception to evidence not well taken, when some was not subject to objection made; evidence of quality and durability of paint and cement similar to that involved held inadmissible for want of sufficient foundation.

One general exception based on several grounds is made as to the admissibility of certain quoted portions of the evidence of four named witnesses, each of whom testified as to the quality and durability of similar paint and cement, which had been used by them, and which it was shown had been bought of the same company, through the same agents, about the same time as the goods sued for. The objections made to this testimony as a whole were that it was irrelevant and hearsay, and consisted of mere statements of opinion. Held: (a) While a small part of the testimony objected to is subject to the last two objections, the exception thus taken to the evidence as a whole is not well taken, under the general rule that an assignment of error upon the admission of specified evidence as a whole is inadequate, when some of it is not subject to the criticism made. Brunswick, etc., R. Co. v. Hoodenpyle, 129 Ga. 174, 175(4), 58 S. E. 705; Burkhart v. Fitzgerald, 137 Ga. 366(2), 73 S. E. 583; Higgs v. State, 145 Ga. 414, 415(2), 89 S. E. 361; Ga. R., etc., Co. v. Decatur, 129 Ga. 502(2), 59 S. E. 217; Jones v. Teasley, 25 Ga. App. 784 (1, b), 105 S. E. 46. (b) Since the record fails to disclose any evidence showing that the similar paint testified about was properly applied, with reasonable and ordinary skill and under proper and suitable conditions, the foundation laid for the introduction of such evidence was insufficient, and for this reason it should have been excluded. Dunn v. Beck, 144 Ga. 148(2), 86 S. E. 385; 22 Corpus Juris, 751(2).

Error from City Court of Nashville; T. N. Henson, Judge.

Action by the Standard Paint & Lead Works against J. W. E. Powell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The evidence admitted over objection, referred to in the decision, is as follows:

J. W. E. Powell: "I had reasons to believe that my lot of paint was just like those that were not at all satisfactory. I have not heard of but one lot that was used that was satisfactory; the men that put the paint on the hotel told men that it was no account. It seems from the court calendar that there was a good many people that thought that it was no good. All I know about the paint put on my house is what my little boy said."

Jim McKinnon: "I put some of this liquid cement on Mr. J. H. Anderson's house. I do not know it was this Goodyear cement paint. It was some Mr. Yates sold."

Mallie Shaw: "I bought some paint from Standard Paint & Lead Works, through Mr. Yates and Mr. Bean. They told me that 55 gallons of the paint would cover my house and it would not cover but little more than half of it. In order to finish it, I had to send for another shipment. Before the last shipment came, I saw it was coming off of the roof; I would not open the last shipment. This shingle I hold come off of my roof. The paint come off of the shingles, and left more cracks than there was before. It made my house look worse than it did before it was put on it. It was worthless and damaged my house."

Joas A. Alexander: "The liquid cement I placed on my roof was of absolutely no benefit. If you were to give me the paint and hire a man to put it on free of charge, I would not let him put it on. It was the most worthless stuff I ever saw in my life. I come in an ace paying for mine."

McNATT v. STATE. (No. 12828.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §753(1)—Refusal to direct verdict not error.

There is no merit in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, which complains that the court refused to direct a verdict in favor of the accused. It is never error for the court to refuse to direct a verdict.

2. Ground of motion not considered.

The remaining special ground of the motion for a new trial is merely an amplification of the general grounds.

3. Larceny §14(1)—When property obtained by trick or fraud with intent to appropriate, subsequent appropriation held simple larceny.

Where one obtains possession of money by trick or fraud with intent to appropriate it to his own use, and the owner intends to part with the possession only, and not with the property, the possession of the money is obtained unlawfully, and the subsequent appropriation of it in pursuance of the original intent is simple larceny. Martin v. State, 123 Ga. 478, 51 S. E. 334, and authorities cited. In the instant case the evidence authorized a finding that the defendant obtained possession of the money of the prosecutor by a trick or fraud with intent to appropriate it to his own use, and that the owner intended to part with the possession of the money only, and that subsequently the accused appropriated the money to his own use in pursuance of his original intent.

4. Larceny §30(10), 40(8)—Indictment for stealing money not demurrable as not describing kind of money; testimony held to show sufficiently that bills stolen were bank bills.

The indictment charged the accused with simple larceny, alleging that he stole $130 in paper money, the same being in the denominations of five $20 bills and three $10 bills, of the personal goods of B. F. Morris and of the value of $130. This indictment was good in substance, and was not even subject to special demurrer on the ground that it did not disclose what kind of money was stolen. Johnson v. State, 119 Ga. 257, 45 S. E. 960. Upon the trial B. F. Morris testified that he was the owner of the money stolen, and that it was paper money of the denominations of five $20 bills and three $10 bills. As "the ordinary meaning of a $5 bill is a bank bill for the payment of $5" (Allen v. State, 86 Ga. 400, 12 S. E. 651), the testimony of the owner of the money that it consisted of five $20 bills and three $10 bills was sufficient proof that the money was bank bills, in the absence of anything to the contrary, and the verdict finding the defendant guilty of simple larceny was not contrary to law and the evidence. This ruling is not in conflict with any holding in Johnson v. State, supra, for in that case the indictment charged the accused with stealing "$120 in paper money, to wit, two $20 bills, five $10 bills, and six $5 bills," and upon the trial the only evidence as to the kind of money stolen was that it was "paper money." There was no evidence in that case that the money stolen consisted of $20 bills, $10 bills, and $5 bills, as alleged in the indictment, and it was accordingly held that the state had failed to prove the charge as laid, and the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial was reversed. In the instant case every material averment in the indictment was sustained by the proof.

5. Criminal law §935(1)—New trial properly denied when evidence ample.

The verdict was amply authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

POWELL et al. v. STATE. (No. 11964.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 18, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Joint bill of exceptions held warranted.

"Where a rule nisi for contempt of court was brought against two defendants jointly, and they made a joint answer thereto, and were tried together, and the judge, sitting both as a court and jury, after hearing evidence, rendered two separate judgments, in one of which he adjudged one of the defendants to be in contempt of court and sentenced him to pay $100 and to serve 20 days in jail, and in the other he adjudged the other defendant to be in contempt of court and sentenced him to pay $100, the two defendants in these circumstances may bring a joint bill of exceptions from such judgment to the court having jurisdiction thereof. Nothing in the foregoing ruling is to be construed as preventing each of the defendants from excepting to the judgment in his own case."

2. City court held authorized to punish for contempt.

Conceding, without deciding, that the city court of Miller county "has no inherent power to define contempts of court," still, under section 4643 of the Civil Code of 1910, the city court of Miller county has authority to issue attachments against, and inflict summary punishment for contempt of court on, any person who bribes or attempts to bribe a witness not to appear and testify in obedience to his subpoena, even though the bribery is completed or the attempt to bribe is made in a county different from that in which the case is pending.

N. L. Stapleton, Sol., of Colquitt, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1, 2] This case was certified by this court to the Supreme Court, and the full opinion of that court will be found in 108 S. E. 464. The first of the headnotes to this case is in the exact language of the first headnote of the Supreme Court, while the second is in substance the same as the second headnote to the opinion of that court. Under the first of these rulings there is no merit in the motion to dismiss the writ of error. The ruling in the second headnote is controlling as to the issues raised, and shows that the judge who presided in the trial court did not err in his findings.

JONES v. STATE. (No. 12602.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Criminal law §252(1)—Accusation in city court may be amended by solicitor before defendant pleads.

"The solicitor of a city court, before the trial of a criminal case and before the selection of a jury, can at any time amend the accusation as he may deem proper." Conley v. State, 88 Ga. 496, 499, 10 S. E. 123; Goldsmith v. State, 2 Ga. App. 283, 286, 58 S. E. 486.

"(a) The solicitor of a city court may amend an accusation at any time before the defendant therein has pleaded to the merits, provided the affidavit of the prosecutor will support the accusation as amended, unless such amendment is forbidden by the act creating the court. Goldsmith v. State, supra." Bishop v. State, 22 Ga. App. 784, 97 S. E. 251.

2. Criminal law §252(1)—Allowance of amendment of accusation not error though there was no written order.

Conceding, but not deciding, that the accusation as originally drawn was subject to the demurrer interposed, the amendment to the accusation cured the defect, and it was not error for the court to allow the amendment before the accused had pleaded to the merits, even though there was no written order allowing the amendment. "While the proper procedure would have been for the judge to sign a formal order amending the affidavit and accusation, the slight irregularity in the form and method of the amendment in this case was not error." Bishop v. State, supra.

(a) It is not disclosed by the bill of exceptions or the record that the accusation as amended was not supported by the affidavit of the prosecutor, and this question was not raised by the demurrer.

3. Criminal law §1064(4)—Ground of motion for new trial not considered when not complete in itself without reference to brief of evidence.

The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial cannot be considered, as it is not complete and understandable within itself, and to ascertain whether the evidence objected to and admitted was material, this court would have to refer to the brief of evidence.

4. Criminal law §1170(4)—Exclusion of questions held harmless, where substantially the same questions were answered.

The refusal of the court to allow counsel for the accused to ask certain character witnesses for the defense whether they had ever, "until this case came up against him," heard anything bad about the defendant, or anything against his character for honesty, was not harmful error (if error at all), since the brief of the evidence discloses that substantially the same questions were elsewhere answered by the witnesses.

5. Criminal law §825(4)—Instruction as to effect of character evidence held sufficient in absence of request for fuller charge.

In the absence of a request for a fuller charge upon the subject of good character, the following instruction was sufficient: "Proof of character may be of itself sufficient to generate in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt"—the court, elsewhere in the charge, having fully instructed the jury upon the subject of a reasonable doubt.

6. Criminal law §510, 1160—Conviction of misdemeanor may rest on accomplice's uncorroborated testimony; verdict not disturbed when supported by evidence and approved by trial judge.

In a misdemeanor case the defendant can be lawfully convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. The evidence in this case authorized the verdict, and, the trial judge having approved the finding of the jury, and no error of law appearing, this court is without authority to interfere.

Criminal law §935(1)—Denial of new trial not error when evidence sufficient.

Patterson was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. No error of law upon the trial of the case is assigned. THOMPSON v. STATE. (No. 12784.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Criminal law §723(5)—Argument as to purpose and necessity of county police held inflammatory and improper.

The defendant was convicted of violating the Prohibition Statute (Laws [Ex. Sess.] 1917, p. 7). The only assignment of error that we consider of merit is that the court failed to declare a mistrial upon the defendant's motion because state's counsel, in his concluding argument before the jury, made use of the following language: "Gentlemen of the jury, the county commissioners have legally appointed your county police, and largely for the protection of the country women and children. You know how it is out there in the country, gentlemen, that they are without police protection and exposed always to drunken, vagrant negroes; that you yourselves, as you sit here, are possessed by the haunting possibility that on your return to your home you may be confronted by the corpse of a murdered child in your door, or at your door the idiotic face of a ruined wife." At the conclusion of this argument, timely motion for mistrial was made. The court, in overruling the motion for a mistrial, said, in the presence and hearing of the jury, "I hold that it is proper argument." State's counsel turned to the jury and said: "Gentlemen of the jury, his honor says that is proper stuff." We think that the defendant's motion to declare a mistrial should have prevailed. The statement of the attorney for the state was inflammatory in character, and the court should have admonished the jury not to be influenced by such argument. The error is not cured by the note of the trial judge, wherein the judge states that the assignment of error shows upon its face that the argument was based upon an effort of state's counsel to defend the use and employment of county policemen who offered to be witnesses for the state, and that the court thought the argument justifiable. The officers of court should be most careful in the use of language employed in the argument of the state's cases to the juries. It is never necessary to influence or arouse by inflammatory argument the passions of a conscientious juror. The other assignments of error are without merit. For the reason pointed out, it was error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

BROYLES, C. J. (dissenting). I do not think that, under all the particular facts of this case, the refusal of the court to declare a mistrial or to rebuke the solicitor-general requires a new trial. The evidence fairly demanded the verdict, and therefore the error of the court was harmless. Furthermore, it clearly appears that the improper remarks of the solicitor did not inflame the minds of the jury since although they found the defendant guilty of a felony, they recommended a misdemeanor punishment, which was imposed by the judge.

Nov. 18, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Negligence §136(1, 25, 26)—Questions for jury not determined on demurrer.

Plaintiff alleged that, while walking in a public road, he was compelled by the rapid approach of an automobile to step to his left and leave the highway; that in so doing he moved not more than 20 feet from the center of the 20-foot road; that he thus came in contact with and was injured by a heavily charged electric wire, which was entirely hidden from view by a growth of weeds from two to four feet in height; that the wire, as here maintained by the defendant along the land of another, had been in this position for many weeks, on account of two posts having fallen, which fact was known or by the exercise of ordinary diligence could have been known to the defendant, but was unknown to the plaintiff. The trial judge dismissed the petition on general demurrer as failing to set out a cause of action. Held:

"Questions as to diligence and negligence, including contributory negligence, being questions peculiarly for the jury, the court will decline to solve them on demurrer, except in plain and indisputable cases" (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Spencer, 24 Ga. App. 471, 101 S. E. 198; Sherrod v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 108 S. E. 908); "and in the exercise of this function the question as to what constitutes the proximate cause of an injury complained of may be directly involved as one of the essential elements and disputed issues in the ascertainment of what negligence, as well as whose negligence, the injury is properly attributable to" (Ga. Ry. & Power Co. v. Ryan, 24 Ga. App. 288, 289, 100 S. E. 713; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Daniels, 8 Ga. App. 775 [2], 70 S. E. 203). It is only where it clearly appears from the petition that the negligence charged against the defendant was not the proximate and effective cause of the injury that the court may upon general demurrer as a matter of law so determine. Gillespie v. Andrews, 108 S. E. 906; Southern Ry. Co. v. Barber, 12 Ga. App. 286, 77 S. E. 172.

2. Electricity §19(2)—Petition held not to show that plaintiff was trespasser or negligent, or that negligence was proximate cause of injury.

Under the facts alleged, it cannot be taken as a matter of law, either that (a) the relation of plaintiff to defendant was that of a mere trespasser, or that (b) the fact that petitioner as a pedestrian stepped to the left instead of the right side of the road, in order to dodge the rapidly approaching vehicle, constituted negligence, or that (c) such act must be taken as the proximate cause of the injury. The court therefore erred in dismissing the petition, since it was for the jury to pass upon all questions of negligence raised by the evidence under the pleadings. Eining v. Ga. Ry. & Electric Co., 133 Ga. 458, 66 S. E. 237; Atlanta Consolidated Street Ry. Co. v. Owings, 97 Ga. 663, 666, 667, 25 S. E. 877, 33 L. R. A. 798; *Mayor, etc., of Unadilla v. SCOTT v. STATE. (No. 12603.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Criminal law §1160—Verdict, supported by conflicting evidence and approved by trial judge, not disturbed.

The case is here upon the single assignment of error that the evidence does not authorize the verdict. The defendant was charged with a violation of the prohibition statute (Laws Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 7). The evidence is abundant that he possessed corn liquor and sold corn liquor. There was some conflict in the evidence, but the jury, after being properly instructed by the court, did not believe the defendant's evidence. There being ample evidence to support the verdict, and the trial judge having approved the verdict, this court is powerless to interfere. It was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

DIXON et al. v. JOHNSON. (No. 12385.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 18, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant §329—Petition held to show servant's act within scope of employment.

The petition is not defective for the reason assigned, that it fails to show that the alleged negligent act of the defendant's servant was done within the scope of his duties and employment. Not only would it seem that this necessary element of liability is shown by reasonable inference from the allegations made, but it is expressly alleged.

2. Highways §213(3)—In action against contractors, proximate cause of injury held for the jury.

Whether the defendants' alleged act of negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, as claimed by the plaintiff, or whether the injury was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff in failing to observe and avoid contact with the alleged obstruction, was properly left for determination by the jury.

3. Highways §197(1), 208(1)—Traveler has right to assume road is free from obstructions; petition held not to show plaintiff was a trespasser on road which was being surfaced; description of obstruction on highway with which automobile collided held sufficient.

The grounds of special demurrer are without merit.

(a) The petition alleges that the plaintiff at the time of his alleged injury was driving his car along a public highway. A traveler, in the absence of notice to the contrary, has a right to use it and to assume that it is reasonably safe and free from obstructions. Nothing shown in the petition could indicate that the plaintiff was a trespasser, on account of the county authorities having closed the highway pending the making of repairs thereon for it by the defendant. On the contrary, the petition shows that "there was no other barrier or obstruction of any kind or character or anything else to indicate that said public road was closed or to call attention to the fact that said wire was so suspended."

(b) The nature and character of the alleged obstruction, as consisting of a "small cable wire," which the petition alleged the defendants had stretched across the highway, is sufficiently described. Especially is this true since more detailed information as to its character would lie more particularly within the knowledge of the defendants, who it is alleged had strung it.

4. Demurrers properly overruled.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the petition as amended.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by H. S. Johnson against M. W. Dixon, Jr., and others. Demurrers to the petition were overruled, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

From the petition as amended, it appears that the defendants, acting under a contract made with the county authorities of Chatham county, were engaged in surfacing a portion of a public highway known as the Augusta road. For the purpose of closing the highway to traffic the defendants, through one of their servants, moved up a distance of about two miles beyond the point where the work was going on, and stretched a "small cable wire" across the road, at just such a height as would catch the top of an automobile moving along the road at that point. It is alleged that the plaintiff did not know of such obstruction and had no reason to anticipate its presence, and "there was no other barrier or obstruction of any kind or character, or anything else, to indicate that said public road was closed or to call attention in any way to the fact that said wire was so suspended," and that, not seeing the wire until too late to avoid it, he ran into it with his car, and thereby received specified injuries.

1. Jury §32(2)—Error to try defendant before eight jurors and to fail to furnish full panel to strike from.

The defendant in this case was arraigned upon an accusation in the city court of Dublin, charging him with a violation of the prohibition statute. In due time the defendant stated that he "waived nothing." A full panel of jurors was not put upon him to strike from, and his case was tried before 8 jurors, instead of 12. His assignment of error is upon the ground that he was entitled to a full panel of jurors, and that therefore his conviction by 8 jurors was illegal. We agree with the contention of the defendant, and it was error for this reason to overrule his motion for a new trial. Amerson v. State, 18 Ga. App. 177 (5), 88 S. E. 998, and cases cited.

1. Intoxicating liquors §236(4)—Evidence held insufficient to show defendant's participation in manufacture.

Three men were at a distillery. As certain officers approached two of them ran, but the defendant remained. He gave a reasonable explanation of his presence there. It was not shown that he had any interest in the "still," or that he was making liquor, or was in any way engaged in aiding or assisting in the manufacture of liquor. Under the evidence his conviction was unauthorized. The evidence which connected the defendant with the offense charged was entirely circumstantial, and did not exclude every reasonable hypothesis save that of his guilt. Ward v. State, 21 Ga. App. 655, 94 S. E. 816; Smith v. State, 16 Ga. App. 291, 85 S. E. 281. The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

1. Criminal law \S 554—Homicide \S 309(4)—Charge on voluntary manslaughter proper when there is evidence raising doubt as to degree of offense; defendant's statement may be accepted or rejected or believed in part.

"It is well settled by numerous rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court that the law of voluntary manslaughter may properly be given in charge to the jury on the trial of one indicted for murder, where, from the evidence or from the defendant's statement to the jury, there is anything deducible which would tend to show that he was guilty of manslaughter, voluntary or involuntary, or which would be sufficient to raise a doubt as to whether the homicide was murder or manslaughter. Reeves v. State, 22 Ga. App. 629, 97 S. E. 115. It is likewise well settled that it is the prerogative of the jury to accept the defendant's statement as a whole, or to reject it as a whole, to believe it in part, or disbelieve it in part. In the exercise of this discretion they are unlimited. Brown v. State, 10 Ga. App. 50, 54, 55, 72 S. E. 587." May v. State, 24 Ga. App. 379, 382, 100 S. E. 797.

(a) Under this ruling and the facts of the instant case the court did not err in instructing the jury upon the law of manslaughter.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1, Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading \S 216(1)—Trove and conversion \S 32(1)—Petition held to state cause of action; oral admissions not considered in passing on demurrers.

The petition in this case alleged that the plaintiff owned certain shares of stock in a corporation, which were represented by a certificate of stock of a certain number, the value of which was stated; that this certificate of stock was loaned to the defendant for the purpose of being used as collateral by him to secure a temporary loan, and the certificate was to be returned to her when it had served its purpose, which she was assured would be in a short time; that he thus, by deception and fraud, obtained possession of her certificate of stock, appropriated it to his own use, and refused to deliver it to her on demand. The allegations of the petition made this an action of trover, and it was not subject to the general demurrer filed. Small v. Wilson, 20 Ga. App. 674 (2-4), 93 S. E. 518; Harrell v. Ataway, 18 Ga. App. 269(1), 89 S. E. 847; Phelan v. Vestner, 125 Ga. 825-827, 54 S. E. 697; McNorrill v. Daniel, 121 Ga. 78(1), 79(1), 48 S. E. 680; Kirkpatrick Hardware Co. v. Hamlet, 20 Ga. App. 719(1, 2), 93 S. E. 226, and cases cited.

(a) In the bill of exceptions it is stated that "according to admissions of her counsel in open court," this is "a suit for money had and received." However, in passing on demurrers, only the petition and the demurrer are to be considered, and not oral admissions. In Hicks v. Beacham, 131 Ga. 89(2), 62 S. E. 45, the Supreme Court held that "Oral admissions of fact by a party or his counsel are not proper matters for consideration in passing on a demurrer to pleadings, or a motion to dismiss in the nature of a demurrer." See, also, Griffin v. Russell, 144 Ga. 277(1), 87 S. E. 10, L. R. A. 1916F, 216, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 994.

2. Trial \S 251(2)—Charge applicable only to action for money had and received properly refused in trover.

This being an action of trover, the judge did not err in refusing a request to charge which was applicable only to a suit for money had and received.

3. New trial \S 70—Properly denied when evidence sufficient.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Vendor and purchaser \S 334(3), 341(5)—Verdict for defendant in action to recover part payment improperly directed when evidence tended to show consent to rescission; measure of recovery after rescission of contract stated.

This was a suit to recover a part payment made on the purchase of land. Whether or not the contract of purchase was originally unenforceable under the statute of frauds is immaterial to the maintenance of plaintiff's case, since the evidence for the plaintiff showed that the seller had expressly consented to a rescission of the contract of sale, and the evidence of the seller was such as might show an implied consent to such a rescission, in that he had retaken the land in question and made a crop thereon after the purchaser had surrendered possession. It was for this reason error to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, although the plaintiff's pleadings and evidence did not sustain her contention relating to fraud in the procurement of the original contract, and the evidence did not sustain her other contention relative to a breach of the seller's obligations in that he had failed to give possession of the premises. In a case such as this, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary in the subsequent contract of rescission, the rule governing a recovery is that the purchaser is entitled to a return of the partial payments plus the value of any improvements made, less a deduction of the rental value of the land and any injury or damage to the property during the term of occupancy. 39 Cyc. 2002, 1358; *McDaniel v. (Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 394—Evidence that defendant was drunk when arrested held relevant to show admissibility of evidence as to finding whisky.

The defendant was tried for having intoxicating liquors in his possession. The evidence showed that two policemen arrested him in the city of Thomasville and took some whisky from his person. It was not error to allow the arresting officers to testify that the defendant was drunk when they took the whisky from him, they testifying that "the defendant was drunk and disorderly in our presence and violating a city ordinance, and we arrested him for violation of city ordinance." The evidence that the defendant was drunk was relevant for the purpose of showing that his arrest was legal, and therefore that the evidence as to the finding of whisky on his person was legal and admissible against him.

1. Carriers \S 159(2), 163—Stipulation for notice of claim within four months is valid; burden on carrier to show failure to give required notice of claim.

Where a shipper signs and accepts a bill of lading containing a stipulation that claims against the carrier should be made in writing to the carrier "at the point of delivery or at the point of origin within four months after the delivery of the property, or in case of failure to make delivery, then within four months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed," this clause is valid and binding; and in a suit for damages for unreasonable delay in the delivery of goods, where it appears that such notice was not given either by the consignor or the consignee, nor waived by the carrier, a recovery will not lie. Southern Ry. Co. v. Simpson, 20 Ga. App. 290, 93 S. E. 47; Mitchell v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 15 Ga. App. 797, 84 S. E. 227. But where the consignee does not sue upon the express contract evidenced by the bill of lading, but brings his action in tort based solely upon the public duty of the carrier to properly transport and deliver the goods, and upon the custom of the carrier to notify consignees immediately after the arrival of shipments at destination, and where it is the carrier who sets up by its plea and introduces in evidence such bill of lading with its stipulation as to notice, the burden of proof lies upon the carrier to further sustain its affirmative plea and defense by showing the failure of the plaintiff to give the notice thus required. 10 Corpus Juris, 302.

2. Appeal and error \S 1140(1)—Carriers \S 105(1)—Measure of damages for unreasonable delay stated; plaintiff may write off excess when judgment excessive.

When this case was previously before this court upon exceptions to the overruling of the defendant's general demurrer, it was held that the proper measure of damages for the alleged unreasonable delay in the delivery of the goods was "the difference between their market value when they should have been delivered and their market value when they were delivered, with interest from the former date, less the freight, if unpaid." Southern Ry. Co. v. Bunch, 25 Ga. App. 45, 46(1), 102 S. E. 462. On the subsequent trial it appeared that there were two shipments of goods, the first made November 9, 1915, and received at destination November 17, 1915, and the second shipped February 9, 1916, and received at destination February 17, 1916. As to the second of these shipments, the record discloses no proof whatever as to the damages for the alleged unreasonable detention in the defendant's warehouse; but as to the first shipment, there was some evidence, admitted without objection, from which the jury were authorized to find that there was a decrease in value caused by the delay amounting to as much as one-half of $300, or $150, and, to add interest thereto at 7 per cent. from November 17, 1915, to the date of trial, January 17, 1921, $54.25. As the grounds of the motion for a new trial are without merit, except as to the amount of the finding, the plaintiff in the court below is given the privilege of writing off the unauthorized amount of the finding, to wit, $75.75, at the time the remittitur from this court is made the judgment of the trial court, in which event the judgment will stand affirmed; otherwise the judgment is reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 603(1)—Trial in absence of witnesses not error, when no motion for continuance made.

Where no motion for a continuance is made for absence of witnesses, the court does not err by disregarding such absence; the accused having had full time after his arrest to prepare for trial.

2. Criminal law \S 938(1)—Newly discovered, impeaching, cumulative evidence not ground for new trial.

The alleged newly discovered evidence was (a) cumulative of the evidence introduced upon the trial to show an alibi. "Cumulative evidence to prove an alibi, even if newly discovered, is not cause for a new trial." Harrison v.

State, 83 Ga. 129(1), 9 S. E. 542. Tipton v. State, 119 Ga. 305(8), 46 S. E. 436. (b) Its effect would be to impeach the evidence for the state. Odum v. State, 24 Ga. App. 271, 100 S. E. 655; Nisbet v. Vandiver, 24 Ga. App. 572(8), 101 S. E. 761.

3. Criminal law \hookrightarrow 935(1)—New trial properly denied, when evidence warranted verdict.

The evidence warranted the verdict, the trial judge approved it, and no error was committed in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Duke Davis, Judge.

George Hanson was convicted of an offense, and he brings error. Affirmed.

L. B. Wyatt, of La Grange, for plaintiff in error.

L. L. Meadors, Sol., and B. J. Mayer, both of La Grange, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1-3] Only the first headnote needs elaboration. The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is as follows:

"Because at the beginning of the criminal week of the March term of the city court of La Grange movant was advised by his then sole counsel, Judson Andrews, that on account of his physical condition a leave of absence had [been?] granted him, and that the case against movant would not be tried at that term of court, and that it would [not?] be necessary to have any witnesses attend court until the June term of said court. Movant had no knowledge, notice, or information that the case would be tried until the morning of the day that same was tried. Movant then had no other counsel, and reported the matter to the solicitor of the city court of La Grange, who, of course, could do nothing for movant regarding the matter. Movant shows that by reason of this instruction from his counsel he had made no arrangements for a trial, and had no witnesses in attendance upon court, and had not an opportunity to get his evidence properly before the court, and was by reason thereof denied a fair and impartial trial."

This ground of the motion is absolutely without merit. Although the defendant was represented at the trial by two attorneys, one of them being the attorney above referred to as his "sole counsel," yet the attention of the trial judge was not called to the foregoing facts, nor was any motion made to postpone or continue the case. See Harrison v. State, supra; Phillips v. Bagwell Motor Car Co., 22 Ga. App. 488, 96 S. E. 334; Harrison v. State, 20 Ga. App. 12 (1), 92 S. E. 388, 95 S. E. 630.

1. Appeal and error \hookrightarrow 1051(2)—Admission of carbon copy harmless where there was other undisputed evidence of notice to same effect.

It being otherwise proved without dispute that notice of the same tenor and effect as that contained in the carbon copy of the letter excepted to was given by the plaintiff to the defendant prior to incurring the items of expense sued for, the admission of such copy, if illegal, should be treated as harmless.

2. The verdict in the amount sued for, to wit, $753.80 consisting of items which under the undisputed evidence were subject to exact calculation, and which must have been so calculated and found by the jury, and being only authorized in the amount of $601.95, the judgment will stand affirmed if the plaintiff in the court below shall write off the unauthorized excess; otherwise the judgment is reversed.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Jean Rourke, Jr., Judge.

Action by E. G. Thomson against the Investors' Realty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition that plaintiff write off part of recovery.

Wilson & Rogers, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

Simon N. Gazan and McIntire, Walsh & Bernstein, all of Savannah, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. The action was for damages resulting from the breach of a certain specification in a contract for the building of a dwelling house, as follows:

"Roofing: The main roof is to be covered with tin shingles of Conklin make or equal put on in the best manner, do all necessary flashing and counterflashing. Flashing at chimneys to be let into reglets in the brickwork, wedged in place, and cemented in with Portland cement."

The petition alleges that soon after the completion of the house the roof began to leak, and, notwithstanding repeated notices to the defendant to remedy such defect, the leaks continued; that the tin shingles rusted and corroded, and the leaks could only be remedied by laying a new roof; that in endeavoring to stop the leaks and lessen the damage the plaintiff expended $53.83 in applying a coat of roofing paint, and $100 in restoring to their former condition the ceilings and walls which were stained and cracked from the leaks; and that he finally incurred an expense of $600 in replacing the original roof with new tin shingles, so as to put it in proper condition as required by the contract. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff in the amount sued for, to wit $753.80.

[1] Only two questions are raised by the record—the first relating to the admission of certain evidence as to notice given the defendant of the defect, which is disposed of in the first headnote; the other relating only to the sufficiency of the evidence as to the $600 item.

[2] The defendant's counsel in effect admit that the verdict is proper in so far as it covers the two items amounting to $153.80, and their only contention is as to the other $600 item, which was necessarily allowed by the jury in their verdict. It is also in effect admitted that the plaintiff had the right to recover the value of a roof as good as that provided by the specifications, that is, a roof of "tin shingles of Conklin make or equal"; but it is contended that, as the evidence shows that plaintiff laid a more costly roof than that required by the contract, the defendant was not liable for the excess cost, and that, as the burden was on the plaintiff to show the proper items of expense, and as he had failed so to do, the verdict as to the $600 item was without evidence to support it.

The plaintiff, however, contends that the $600 was a proper allowance under the evidence, not only on account of the increased cost of materials and labor at the time of replacement above such cost at the time of original construction, but because he had incurred additional items of expense in painting the new roof and in laying it over tarred paper. His contention is based upon the clause in the specification that the shingles should be "put on in the best manner"; and he contends that to do this so as to avoid leaks the shingles should have been painted as well as primed, and laid over tarred paper.

The plaintiff testified, without objection, that for such a roof to be laid in the "best manner" painting was required. G. E. Pacetti, one of the firm of roof contractors who laid both the original and the new roof, testified that "the roof should be painted, in addition to the priming coat." O. C. Pacetti, his partner, testified that, while their firm would not paint a tin-shingled roof or lay it on paper unless expressly provided for in the specifications, and while they did not paint the original roof in question except to apply a coat of priming, yet immediate painting after finishing such a roof was "the only thing to make a roof tight, so that it is properly flashed, and these are the things that prevent leaks," and, further, that he had advised the defendant's vice president that "the leakage was due entirely to the fact that the roof had not been painted." As to the use of tarred paper he said, "It is an open question whether paper is to be included or not; some people want it, and some don't," and he said also that such paper "cannot prevent leaks." There was thus ample evidence to sustain the plaintiff's contention that painting was a necessary element and expense in laying the roof "in the best manner," as stated in the specification. But there was no proof showing such a necessity for using tarred paper. It was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that each of the items of expense incurred by him in laying the new roof was necessary in obtaining such a roof as he was entitled to have under his contract. He offered no evidence showing the cost of the several items for the new shingles, painting, tar paper, and labor. Unless there is something definite and tangible in the evidence by which the unauthorized item for tarred paper can be excluded from the $600 item included in the verdict, such item must be held unsupported by any evidence.

While the evidence of the plaintiff falls in this respect, it appears, however, that the defendant's vice president, W. H. Stillwell, testified that "the difference in the cost of a roof put on like this new roof and the roof that was specified in accordance with these plans and specifications" was "35 or 40 per cent. more," and that the roof which the plaintiff "now has is worth $605, which is a superior article, has paint on it and tar paper underneath, it is a more expensive roof to the extent of 40 per cent." under the rule that a party's testimony is to be construed most strongly against himself, it may thus be taken that the cost of the new roof to the plaintiff, with paint and tar paper added, exceeded the cost without such two items by 35 per cent., which would make the cost exclusive of those items $448.15, and the cost of such disputed items $156.85. The plaintiff under this admission was authorized to recover as much as $448.15. This excluded the proper item of paint, as well as the unauthorized item of tarred paper, and, had there been any evidence to show the cost of painting, or any evidence by which such cost might be separated from the cost of the tarred paper, the former item might be recovered. But, in the absence of any such proof, the only amount authorized under the evidence is that which the jury could have definitely calculated from the defendant's admission as properly allowable, to which should be added the undisputed items of $153.80, making a total of $601.95. The plaintiff is therefore given the privilege of writing off the unauthorized amount of the finding, to wit, $151.85, from the $753.80 found, at the time the remittitur from this court is made the judgment of the trial court, in which event the judgment will stand affirmed; otherwise the judgment is reversed.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

(27 Ga. App. 879)

JOHNSON v. STATE. (No. 12857.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Homicide \S 340(4)—Instruction on murder harmless where defendant convicted of manslaughter.

Plaintiff in error was tried for murder, but was convicted of manslaughter. For this reason the instructions on the subject of murder could not have been prejudicial to the accused. Dunwoody v. State, 23 Ga. App. 93(1), 97 S. E. 561, and cases cited. Thompson v. State, 24 Ga. App. 144(2), 99 S. E. 891. This ruling disposes of grounds 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the motion for a new trial.

2. Homicide \S 309(4)—Instruction on manslaughter authorized when there is anything tending to show manslaughter.

"It is well settled, by repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and this court, that on a trial for murder, if there is anything deducible from the evidence or the defendant's statement that would tend to show manslaughter, voluntary or involuntary, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury fully on the law of manslaughter." Smith v. State, 23 Ga. App. 77(4), 97 S. E. 454, and see cases there cited. In the case under consideration there was ample evidence to authorize the charge on voluntary manslaughter.

3. Criminal law \S 851, 1144(1/2), 1144(15)—Sheriffs and constables \S 12, 24—Party claiming bailiff not sworn must affirmatively show fact; presumption in favor of regularity and legality of proceedings; evidence insufficient to show bailiff not sworn; removal of constable to another district does not vacate office until fact judicially ascertained; bailiff selected by sheriff is de facto officer; appointment of bailiff need not appear on minutes.

(a) Before a verdict will be set aside upon the ground that the bailiff who attended the jury while they had the case under consideration was not sworn, this fact must affirmatively appear.

(b) "The presumption is in favor of the regularity and legality of all proceedings in the superior court."

(c) The removal of a constable from the militia district for which he was elected or appointed to another militia district in the same county does not vacate his office until the fact has been judicially ascertained.

4. Sufficiency of evidence.

There was evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; R. Eve, Judge.

Almer Johnson was convicted of manslaughter, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Perry & Tipton, of Sylvester, for plaintiff in error.

R. S. Foy, Sol. Gen., of Sylvester, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1-4] Only the third headnote will be elaborated. Ground 9 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial alleges error because the plaintiff in error "was not given and did not have upon the trial in this case the benefit and protection of having the jury trying his case attended during the trial and during the deliberations in making up their verdict, by a bailiff sworn as required by section 883 of the Penal Code of Georgia." Three reasons are assigned why the bailiff was not qualified to take charge of and attend the jury.

"(a) Because the said Hiram Stewart, the bailiff who attended the jury was not sworn as required by law, he not having had administered to him at any time during said term of court the oath prescribed by section 883 of the Penal Code of Georgia, and not at any time prior to the trial of said case having had administered to him any oath of any kind, and being unsworn throughout his connection with said case and his handling of the said jury.

"(b) Because the said Hiram Stewart, at the time of the trial of said case and of his having charge of and attending said jury therein as above shown, was not one of the constables or bailiffs of said county in which the said trial occurred, and held no office or authority whatever.

"(c) Because the said Hiram Stewart, at the time of the trial of said case and throughout his connection therewith in having charge of and attending the said jury as above shown, was none other than a private citizen of said county, under no oath of any kind, and having no legal authority of any kind to take charge of and attend the said jury."

A discussion of the "reasons" set out under (a) and (b) will dispose of reason (c). Before the first of these reasons would avail the plaintiff in error it would have to appear affirmatively that the party who acted as bailiff and had charge of the jury had not been sworn. This did appear in the cases of Roberts v. State, 72 Ga. 674 (2), and Washington v. State, 138 Ga. 370 (4), 75 S. E. 253, cited and relied upon by the plaintiff in error. Had it been shown in this case that the bailiff who attended the jury had been deputized by the sheriff and acted as bailiff, and had charge of the jury without being sworn, a new trial would necessarily result. The plaintiff in error insists that the bailiff was not sworn, and the burden of proving this is upon him. The presumption is that the bailiff was sworn. The law requires that he be sworn, and "there is a presumption of law that all officers do their duty, and, unless in the given instance this presumption be in some way rebutted, it will prevail." See Goldberg v. State, 25 Ga. App. 200, 103 S. E. 90, citing Carter v. Griffin, 118 Ga. 634, 38 S. E. 946. In Grinad v. State, 34 Ga. 270 (1), it was held: "The presumption is in favor of the regularity and legality of all proceedings in the superior court." The affidavits offered on the hearing of the motion for a new trial by the plaintiff in error to support this ground of the motion do not affirmatively establish that the bailiff was not sworn. In each of the affidavits the testimony is negative. The substance of these affidavits is that the affiant does not remember—that his mind is a blank as to this particular transaction. Some of the witnesses, in counter affidavits introduced by the solicitor general, swear that if the oath had not been administered they think they would have remembered this fact, as it was the custom for the bailiffs to be sworn. If the bailiff who waited upon the jury in this case had not been sworn, then he could have been designated, so far as the law is concerned, as suggested by Chief Justice Jackson in Roberts v. State, 72 Ga. 678, as a "heathen man and publican" and as an "uncircumcized Phillistine."

We think that the second of these "reasons" is settled adversely to the plaintiff in error, not only by the decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court, but by the statute law of the state. The motion for a new trial shows that the person who attended the jury had been for a number of years a constable of the county in which the trial was held, but in December before the trial in February had moved from one militia district of the county to another. Section 264 (5) of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that all offices in the state are vacated "by the incumbent ceasing to be a resident of the state, or of the county, circuit, or district for which he was elected. In the first case the office shall be vacated immediately; in the latter cases, from the time the fact is judicially ascertained" (italics ours). In the case under consideration there is no contention that this fact had been judicially ascertained. In Bush v. State, 10 Ga. App. 544, 73 S. E. 697, where it was sought to bring in question the title of the acting solicitor general of the city court, Judge Russell said:

"The court judicially knew that Mr. Rich was the duly commissioned solicitor of the city court of Miller county, and, taking all the allegations of the plea to be true, he was at least the de facto officer of the court. Furthermore, the plea was defective in that there was no statement that the office of the solicitor of the city court had been judicially ascertained to be vacant in a legal sense by reason of the fact that it had been judicially ascertained that Mr. Rich had moved his residence from the county of Miller to the county of Decatur. The exact point was decided by the Supreme Court in the case of Channell v. State, 109 Ga. 152, 34 S. E. 854, in which Justice Lewis, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Section 229 of the Political Code (Political Code of 1910, § 264) describes how offices in this state may be vacated, and one of the methods (see subdivision 5) for vacation is: "By the incumbent ceasing to be a resident of the state, or of the county, circuit, or district for which he was elected. In the first case the office shall be vacated immediately; in the latter cases, from the time the fact is judicially ascertained." It is manifest from this provision that when an incumbent of an office has moved from the county for which he was elected to another county in this state, the office is not thereby immediately vacated, and does not become so until the fact has been judicially ascertained."

See, also, Christopher v. State, 21 Ga. App. 244, 94 S. E. 72. The record shows that this bailiff was selected by the sheriff to serve during the term of court at which plaintiff in error was tried, and that he did serve in that capacity, and, as hereinbefore stated, we must presume that he was sworn for this special service, and would at least be a de facto officer, and his acts as such would be valid. In Hinton v. Lindsey, 20 Ga. 746 (4), an officer de facto was defined as:

"One who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be, and yet is not a good officer in point of law; one who acts by color or an appointment, but is not in all respects legally qualified."

In the case just referred to it was also held that—

"Neither the title of such an officer nor the validity of his acts, as such, can be collaterally impeached in a proceeding to which he is not a party."

See cases cited on page 748 (3). See, also, Civil Code 1910, § 277; Twiggs v. Hardwick, 61 Ga. 272 (1); Gunn v. Tackett, 67 Ga. 725 (1).

It is insisted that the minutes of the court do not show the appointment of this constable. There is no merit in this contention. Had the selection of this person as bailiff appeared on the minutes, this fact could have been proven by the introduction of these minutes, but this method of proof is not exhaustive. See, in this connection, Zeigler v. State, 2 Ga. App. 632, 58 S. E. 1066, and cases cited. In Allen v. State, 21 Ga. 219 (2), 68 Am. Dec. 457, Judge Benning said:

"In Greenleaf on Evidence, § 92, vol. 1, it is said that: 'It is not in general necessary to prove the written appointments of public officers. All who are proved to have acted as such are presumed to have been duly appointed to the office, until the contrary appears; and it is not material how the question arises, whether in a civil or a criminal case, nor whether the officer is or is not a party to the record.' And there is ample authority cited to sustain the statement."

In Massey v. Allen, 48 Ga. 21, the third headnote is as follows:

"The court having to pass upon the weight and credit of the affidavits filed on the motion for a new trial, this court will not interfere with its discretion unless abused."

See, also, Civil Code 1910, § 6088.

Under the facts of this case, and the law as above noted, we cannot say that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

(27 Ga. App. 671)

HETRICK v. STATE. (No. 12686.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 823(15)—Omission of charge as to reasonable doubt not error in view of other instructions.

When considered in connection with the remainder of the charge, the judge did not err in failing to add the words "and beyond a reasonable doubt" to the words "to a reasonable and moral certainty," in the excerpt from the charge embodied in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

2. Criminal law \S 878(2)—Indictment and information \S 128—Indictment may charge same offense in different counts and general verdict good if any count sustained by evidence.

While the indictment in this case contained three counts, all of them "covered the same offense, and the same transaction, and the embezzlement of the same funds, and all were based on the same statute." In Innes v. State, 19 Ga. App. 273, 91 S. E. 339, this court held: "It is well settled that an indictment may in several counts charge a violation of one statute in different ways; in which event a general verdict of guilty is good, if the evidence sustains either count." See in this connection, Jones v. State, 12 Ga. App. 564(2), 77 S. E. 892; Colquitt v. State, 6 Ga. App. 109, 64 S. E. 231.

3. Charge on admissions and confessions authorized.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize a charge on admissions and confessions.

4. Criminal law \S 822(13)—Instruction as to necessity of state showing embezzlement of full amount charged not error in view of whole charge.

In the light of the entire charge the court did not err in instructing the jury as follows:

"It is not incumbent upon the state to show the full amount charged in the indictment; any part, either the full amount of 90-odd thousand dollars and cents, or any part would be sufficient, as far as the amount is involved in the case."

5. Criminal law \S 400(7), 472—Testimony as to total amount of checks introduced and as to how they were used held properly admitted.

The court did not err in allowing the auditor to testify as to the "total amount" of "a large batch of checks" introduced in evidence, nor in allowing him to tell the jury how he treated these checks in his audit, as complained of in ground 6 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial; nor did the court err in ruling on the admission of evidence, as complained of in ground 9 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial. Spence v. State, 20 Ga. App. 62(11), 92 S. E. 555.

6. Criminal law \S 856(3), 918(5)—Court's remarks in ruling on evidence not error, though involving statement as to testimony.

"Generally, what the court says in stating to counsel the reason for denying a motion to exclude or rule out evidence is, if pertinent to the question raised by counsel, not error, although the reason given involve a statement as to certain testimony which is already in."

7. Criminal law \S 696(2)—Objections to evidence provisionally admitted are abandoned when no motion to exclude them made.

The evidence the introduction of which was complained of in grounds 8 and 10 of the motion for a new trial was provisionally admitted, and no motion was thereafter made to exclude it, and it will be considered that counsel abandoned his objections thereto. Quinn v. State, 22 Ga. App. 632(2), 634(2), 97 S. E. 84, and cases cited.

8. No error in rulings.

The court did not err in admitting the evidence of which complaint is made in ground 11 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial; nor did the ruling of the judge on this evidence violate the provisions of section 1058 of the Penal Code of 1910 (Civ. Code 1910, § 4863).

9. Admission of evidence not error.

For no reason assigned did the court err in admitting the checks referred to in special grounds 12, 13, 14, 17, 18, and 19 of the motion for a new trial; nor in admitting the evidence of which complaint is made in the fifteenth special ground.

10. Criminal law \S 918(5)—Remarks of court of slight importance do not require new trial.

"Observations of the court to counsel in the hearing of the jury during the progress of the trial, though open to criticism, if of but slight importance and only possibly, not probably, injurious, will not work a new trial."

11. Sufficiency of evidence.

There is ample evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; D. W. Blair, Judge.

W. F. Hetrick was convicted of embezzlement, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Clay & Blair, of Marietta, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. S. Wood, Sol. Gen., of Canton, and L. W. Camp, Morris & Hawkins, and Abbott & Wallace, all of Marietta, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [2-5, 7-9, 11] We will amplify only the first, sixth, and tenth head-notes.

[1] 1. The first special ground of the motion for a new trial alleges that the court erred in charging the jury as follows:

"The credibility of the witnesses, that is, the amount of weight to be given to the testimony of the several witnesses who have testified in the case, is a matter peculiarly for you. You see them on the witness stand, you note their demeanor, you judge of their sources of information, their interest or want of interest in the case, their opportunity for knowing the facts about which they testified; and from all the facts and circumstances which appear on the trial of the case you reach a conclusion as to what amount of weight should be given to the several witnesses who testified in the case, and from all the facts and circumstances you reach a conclusion as to whether or not the prosecution has carried the burden in the way I have stated, and shown the defendant's guilt to a reasonable and moral certainty."

This excerpt from the charge is alleged to be error because the court did not follow the words "to a reasonable and moral certainty," in the last line thereof, with the words "and beyond a reasonable doubt." Elsewhere in the charge the judge instructed the jury that—

"The effect of his plea of not guilty is to put the burden upon the prosecution to show the defendant's guilt to a reasonable and moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. Reasonable and moral certainty of the guilt of the accused is all that is required of the prosecution. A reasonable doubt is such a doubt as the term implies, that is, it is such a doubt as fair and impartial jurors find because of the want of evidence, or because for some reason the evidence is not sufficient to satisfy the minds and conscience of the jurors of the guilt of the accused."

In another portion of the charge the jurors were told that, if they had a reasonable doubt about the guilt of the defendant, it would be their duty to give him the benefit of that doubt and acquit him. In the decision in Bone v. State, 102 Ga. 390, 30 S. E. 845, it was said:

"One thing is quite apparent from the words of the charge: That is, that the jury would not be authorized to convict if they had a reasonable doubt of guilt, nor unless they were morally and reasonably certain of such guilt. It is difficult to conceive how the mind of a juror may reach a conclusion as to a fact to the point of moral certainty, and yet be rendered uncertain by the existence of a doubt of that fact which is reasonable."

In Cole v. State, 125 Ga. 276 (3), 53 S. E. 958, Mr. Justice Lumpkin, speaking for the Supreme Court, said:

"The charge of the court having fully explained to the jury the necessity to prove the accused guilty beyond a reasonable doubt in order to authorize a conviction, it furnished no ground for a new trial that he also stated to them that 'the state is bound only to establish his guilt to a reasonable and moral certainty; and if the state has done that, it is your duty to convict the defendant.' Taking the entire charge together, there was no error on this subject."

This court, in Austin v. State, 6 Ga. App. 211 (1), 64 S. E. 670, held:

"The phrases 'to a moral and reasonable certainty' and 'beyond a reasonable doubt,' as applied to the quality of proof in a case, are identical in meaning."

In Thomas v. State, 19 Ga. App. 105. (4), 91 S. E. 247, this court announced that—

"One distinct and unequivocal statement by the judge in his charge to the jury, that the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused of the offense charged in the accusation upon which he is being tried, is sufficient, and it is not necessary to reiterate this instruction in charging as to various phases of the case developed by the evidence."

The rulings in the foregoing cases show that the first special ground of the motion for a new trial is without merit.

[6] 6. While a witness was upon the stand testifying as an expert, counsel for the defendant objected to certain evidence upon the ground that the witness had not said that he was an expert. The judge replied: "He testified he was a public accountant." This remark of the judge was not such error as would require the grant of a new trial. The witness had previously sworn that—

"In the fall of 1920 and until December 31, 1920, I was a public accountant; connected with the Audit Company of the South. My place of business was 209 Candler Building, Atlanta, Ga. Since then I have moved to Florida. I was, as a public accountant, called upon to audit the books and records of the Acworth Cotton Manufacturing Company."

In Scarborough v. State, 46 Ga. 83, it was said:

"It would be impossible to carry on a trial if this section of the Code [section 4863 of the Civil Code and section 1058 of the Penal Code of 1910], prohibiting a judge from expressing an opinion as to what is proven, is to be construed as is contended for. A judge, in deciding as to admissibility of testimony, must always, to some extent, decide as to its weight, since often its admissibility depends on that, so he must often determine what has been proven so as to say whether certain other things may be proven. * * * The only practicable rule is, to treat the jury as possessed of common sense, and as capable of understanding what is addressed by the judge to them and what is not. He may not express to the jury any opinion; but if in the decision of any legal question, as it arises, he must pass upon facts, the statute does not apply."

In Redwine v. Street, 18 Ga. App. 77 (4), 89 S. E. 163, this court held:

"The trial judge may give the reasons which influence him in the admission or exclusion of testimony, without expressing an opinion of what has been proved. Even though the judge, for the purpose indicated, recites or reviews some of the testimony already adduced, this is no violation of section 4863 of the Civil Code."

See, also, Croom v. State, 90 Ga. 430 (3), 17 S. E. 1003; Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Rogers, 21 Ga. App. 324, 94 S. E. 321; Hall v. State, 7 Ga. App. 116 (5), 119 (5), 66 S. E. 390, and cases cited.

[10] 10. Ground 16 of the motion for a new trial is as follows:

"Movant insists the court erred in allowing $30,000 worth of stock certificates of the Marietta Cotton Mill to be introduced in evidence, as follows: Mr. Morris: 'We tender in evidence the stock certificates of the Marietta Cotton Mill that we have just examined the witness about, with four shares of them transferred.' Mr. Clay: 'We object, for the reason they were treated as the property of the Acworth Cotton Manufacturing Company and for the reason they are in Mr. Awtrey's hands, and their report now and not that of Mr. Hetrick, and they don't shed any light on this transaction and are irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent.' The Court: 'Let them go in.' Mr. Morris: 'They aggregate $30,000 par value.' The Court: 'That ought to be sufficient.' Movant insists the admissibility of this evidence and the statement of the court 'that ought to be sufficient' was an expression of opinion on the part of the court, and was immaterial and incompetent evidence, and prejudicial to the defendant's rights."

In the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error they impliedly abandon all their objections to the evidence referred to in this ground of the motion for a new trial, except that it "was an expression of opinion on the part of the court." It is not alleged that it was an expression of opinion "as to what has or has not been proved, or as to the guilt of the accused." Exactly what the judge meant by saying "that ought to be sufficient" we do not know. Counsel for the state insists that—

"What the court actually did was to state that this was a sufficient description of the papers offered in evidence."

This is not an unreasonable conclusion, as the state had offered in evidence certain certificates of stock without stating the number of shares or the aggregate face value thereof; but whatever may have been intended by the judge when he used these words, we cannot say that this was such a violation of the "Dumb Act" as to require the grant of a new trial.

"Observations of the court to counsel in the hearing of the jury during the progress of the trial, though open to criticism, if of but slight importance and only possibly, not probably, injurious, will not work a new trial." Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Palmer, 89 Ga. 161(3), 15 S. E. 34.

AUGUSTA-AIKEN RY. & ELECTRIC CORPORATION v. BURDASHAW.
(No. 12230.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Negligence — 138(4)—Instruction on comparative negligence held justified.

In this case the judge did not err in giving in charge "the principle of comparative negligence and apportionment of damages," as such a charge was authorized both by the pleadings and the evidence.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; J. C. C. Black, Jr., Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. F. Burdshaw against the Augusta-Aiken Railway & Electric Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Wright & Jackson, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error.

O. Lee White and C. Henry & R. S. Cohen, all of Augusta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. In the brief of plaintiff in error it is said:

"But it is respectfully contended that his honor in the court below erred in giving in charge to the jury the principle of comparative negligence and apportionment of damages. And this constitutes the only error and issue insisted upon before this court by the plaintiff in error."

The charge of the court of which complaint is made is as follows:

"If you find from the evidence in this case that both parties were at fault, and that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could not have avoided the consequences to herself of the defendant's negligence, she may nevertheless recover, but her damages shall be diminished by you in proportion to the amount of default attributable to her."

Counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that this charge was error, because "there was nothing in the pleadings or evidence upon which to base said charge." We cannot agree with this contention. In Georgia Railroad v. Hunter, 12 Ga. App. 294 (8), 77 S. E. 176, it was held:

"In a suit by a railroad employee to recover damages from the railroad company for personal injuries, an allegation in the petition of freedom from fault on his part, and a plea that he failed to exercise ordinary care, puts in issue the question whether the recovery should be diminished by reason of the fact that he was guilty of contributory negligence not amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care."

In the case sub judice the petition alleges that—

"Your petitioner was in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence in alighting from said car; that your petitioner could not have avoided the injuries complained of; and that the injuries complained of were caused solely by negligence of the defendant company, its agents and employees."

And the plea alleges that—

"The plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, could have avoided the consequences of the alleged negligence of this defendant."

Applying the above rule, the pleadings authorized a charge on "the principle of comparative negligence and apportionment of damages," and so did the facts; for, according to the evidence for the plaintiff, the defendant was negligent, and the evidence of the conductor introduced by the defendant was sufficient to authorize the jury to reach the conclusion that the plaintiff also was to some extent negligent.

No error of law is shown to have been committed on the trial; the evidence supports the verdict; the motion for a new trial was properly overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

SOCKWELL v. STATE. (No. 12604.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Weapons — License does not authorize carrying concealed or at place of public worship.

The indictment in this case charged that the defendant "did carry about his person a certain pistol to and while at Salem Camp Ground, a place of public worship, while the people were then and there assembled for the purpose of engaging in religious services." The allegations in the indictment were supported by the uncontradicted evidence of several witnesses, and the defendant himself admitted that he had the pistol at the time and place alleged. However, he insisted that he violated no law, because he had a license which authorized him to carry the pistol. This contention is not sound. Prior to the passage of the act of 1910 (Ga. Laws 1910, p. 134; Park's Ann. Pen. Code, § 848[a] et seq.), a person violated no law who carried a pistol openly and fully exposed to view, and did not carry it to any of the places to which carrying it was prohibited by law. The effect of the Act of 1910 was to make it unlawful for any person to have or carry about his person a pistol, whether it is concealed or not, unless a license has been procured as provided for by that act. Under the express provisions of the act of 1910, it does not alter, affect, or amend any laws now in force in this state relative to the carrying of concealed weapons on or about one's person. Hence the issuance of a license to a person to carry a pistol would not avail him as a defense, should he be prosecuted for carrying the pistol concealed or carrying it to a place of public worship. This being true, the judge did not err in withholding from the jury "a pistol totter's license" issued to the defendant, nor in charging the jury that "the fact that a man may have a license for the carrying of a pistol does not permit him, under the license, to carry it to the place described in this bill of indictment."

MARR v. DIETER. (No. 12657.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 18, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(8), 169(4)—Landlord conclusively presumed to have knowledge of defective construction; landlord entitled to notice to render him liable for failure to repair.

A landlord is responsible to a guest of his tenant for damages arising from defective construction or for damages from failure to keep the premises in repair. Civil Code 1910, § 3694. In the first case knowledge of the defective construction by the landlord is conclusively presumed. Monahan v. National Realty Co., 4 Ga. App. 680, 62 S. E. 127. In the second case the landlord is entitled to notice, either actual or constructive. Ocean Steamship Co. v. Hamilton, 112 Ga. 903, 38 South. 204.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(2)—Landlord retaining qualified possession liable if he knew, or should have known, of defective condition.

Where the landlord retains a qualified possession of the rented premises, himself attending to the supervision of the building, collecting the rents, and personally or by an agent making repairs, he is liable for an injury resulting from a defective condition of the building, if he has actual notice of such defective condition, or if, in the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, he ought to have known of it. Monahan v. National Realty Co., supra; Davis v. Hall, 21 Ga. App. 268, 94 S. E. 274.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(2)—Landlord not ordinarily bound to inspect; landlord responsible for injury due to improper or imperfect repairs.

Ordinarily the landlord is under no duty to inspect the premises while the tenant is in possession, in order to keep informed as to its condition, yet where the landlord does inspect the premises and in such inspections finds a defect caused either by original construction or by a want of repair, and himself undertakes to remedy such defect, he is responsible for an injury due to improper or imperfect repairs. Adams v. Klasing, 20 Ga. App. 203, 92 S. E. 960.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(8)—Landlord making repairs liable to tenant or a guest for injuries.

A landlord making repairs on the rented premises, either voluntarily or in compliance with his statutory obligation, is required to use due care to leave the repaired portion free from defects; and for personal injuries received by the tenant, or one lawfully on the premises as the guest of the tenant, from negligence in making the repairs, when the injured person had no notice of such defective condition and was in the exercise of due care, the landlord is liable. See notes in 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 806.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇨167(2)—Landlord liable for injuries from defective construction whether discovered before or after creation of tenancy.

A landlord would be responsible for injuries to a tenant occasioned by defects in the structure either when the landlord knew of such defects "before the tenancy was created" or discovered the existence of such defects after the tenancy was created, and especially would this be true if the landlord, after such discovery, attempted himself unsuccessfully to repair such defects when the tenant had no notice, actual or constructive, of such defective condition. The decision of the Supreme Court in Ross v. Jackson, 123 Ga. 657, 51 S. E. 578, properly construed, does not limit the responsibility of the landlord for improper construction to knowledge, actual or constructive, of the defective condition "before the tenancy was created."

6. Landlord and tenant ⇨169(8)—Evidence held to warrant verdict for plaintiff, injured by falling of mantelpiece.

The evidence showed a latent defect in the mantelpiece in a room of the rented house, which caused it to fall upon the plaintiff, injuring her foot. Whether this defect was due to improper construction and was known to the landlord before the tenancy was created does not clearly appear. It does appear that the landlord actually discovered that the mantel was defective and himself attempted to repair it. Subsequently to his effort to make the repairs the injury occurred from the falling of the mantel. These facts would warrant a verdict for the plaintiff for damages due to improper repairs as the proximate cause of the injury, in the absence of notice by the tenant or by the plaintiff of the defective condition of the mantel after the landlord had attempted to repair it. McGee v. Hardacre, 27 Ga. App. —, 107 S. E. 563.

7. Nonsuit held unauthorized.

Applying these principles of law to the evidence in support of the allegations of the petition, the nonsuit was unauthorized.

RODGERS v. STATE. (No. 12653.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Criminal law \S 778(4)—Instruction not to consider defendant's personality, the personal presumption, etc., held erroneous.

Where a judge, near the beginning of his charge, told the jury that "the defendant comes into this court with the presumption of innocence around about him, and that presumption remains with him until it is removed by evidence sufficient to convince you, and that beyond a reasonable doubt, of his guilt," it was error, requiring the grant of a new trial, for the judge, near the conclusion of his charge, to say to the jury that in considering the case they should "take away the personality of the defendant—the personal presumption—take away all things that may hang in your mind."

Burnside & McWhorter, of Lincolnton, for plaintiff in error.

M. L. Felts, Sol. Gen., of Warrenton, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. Just after stating the issue raised by the indictment and the plea of the defendant, the judge charged the jury as follows:

"The defendant comes into this court with the presumption of innocence around about him, and that presumption remains with him until it is removed by evidence sufficient to convince you, and that beyond a reasonable doubt, of his guilt."

Near the conclusion of his charge the judge told the jury:

"Take this case, gentlemen, consider it from the evidence and the prisoner's statement and those things alone. Take away the personality of the defendant—the personal presumption—take away all things that may hang in your mind, weigh it according to the law as given you in charge and the evidence as delivered from the stand, and render your verdict, and when you have considered your verdict and made your verdict, write it on this indictment, date it and sign it, and return it into court. Retire, gentlemen, and make up your verdict."

It is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that this charge—

"might well be construed by the jury to mean that they should take away from their consideration of the case the presumption of innocence, since a defendant in the trial of a criminal case has no personal presumption other than the legal presumption of his innocence. The instruction, 'Take away all things that may hang in your mind,' used in the connection as above quoted, was confusing to the jury, and probably caused them to absolutely disregard the legal presumption of the defendant's innocence, which the court near the beginning of his charge had instructed the jury was with the defendant and remained with him until sufficient [evidence had been introduced] to convince them beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, remove the presumption of his innocence. Now at the close of the charge to instruct the jury, in substance, not to consider the personal presumption of the defendant amounted to an expression of an opinion on the part of the court, when considered in connection with the first instruction in regard to the presumption of innocence, that sufficient proof had been submitted to remove this presumption."

The charge of which complaint is made is inapt, inaccurate, and erroneous, and such as might have misled the jury, and requires the grant of a new trial.

It is unnecessary to consider the other grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, as the alleged errors are such as are not likely to reappear on a second trial.

2. Provisions of statute.

All admissions should be scanned with care, and confessions of guilt should be received with great caution. A confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction. Pen. Code 1910, § 1031.

3. Criminal law \S 769, 824(11)—Judge must charge all the material law on any subject charged on; failure without request to charge all the law regarding admissions and confessions held error.

It is well settled that where the judge undertakes to charge upon a certain subject, although it be one upon which it is unnecessary, in the absence of a request, to instruct the jury, he must charge all the law upon that subject that is material to the facts of the case. In the instant case, the court having charged upon the subject of admissions, and the state largely relying upon certain alleged admissions of the accused for a conviction, and there being an issue of fact as to whether the admissions were freely and voluntarily made, the court committed reversible error in failing to charge, even in the absence of a request therefor, the principles of law set forth above.

1. Decision of Supreme Court conformed to.

Upon a writ of certiorari in this case the Supreme Court held: "The language employed in section 10 of the act of November 30, 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 107), relating to the regulation of motor vehicles and motorcycles and their rate of speed upon the highways of this state, and providing that a motor vehicle shall not be operated upon any public street or highway 'at a speed greater than is reasonable and safe,' is so indefinite as to render that part of the statute void. Moreover, since the decision of this case by the Court of Appeals (108 S. E. 683), the portion of the statute above referred to has by this court been held to be unconstitutional and void." Where one fraudulently intends to get possession of the money of another, and by false representations induces the owner to deliver the money to him for the purpose of being applied to the owner's use, and then appropriates it in pursuance of the original fraudulent intent, he may be convicted of the offense of simple larceny. *Martin v. 2. Sufficiency of evidence.

The evidence in this case fully authorized the jury to find that the defendant, with a fraudulent intent and by false and fraudulent representations, induced a person to deliver to him money to be applied for the owner's benefit, and that the money was not so applied, but was appropriated by the defendant to his own use. 1. Robbery \Leftrightarrow 23(1)—Testimony as to resemblance of automobile exhaust with that of car in which defendant was riding shortly before crime committed held admissible.

A witness testified that he was at the store where the robbery was committed, and saw the defendant and two others indicted with him come in and take a drink. He further testified that when they left one of them cranked the automobile, and that they "went on down West Fourteenth street. I heard the exhaust of the car as it went off that time, and then I heard the exhaust of the car that the three people were in 30 minutes later when they came, and the exhaust sounded very much like the first time; sounded like the cut-off, or whatever you call it, was open." This evidence was objected to as follows: "I object to that, because I don't think he could identify the car by the sound of the exhaust." The court properly allowed the evidence to go to the jury. It was a circumstance which they could consider along with the other evidence in determining the identity of the parties charged with the crime. The robbery was committed when the three people above referred to returned to the store later in the night.

2. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 1160—Verdict supported by evidence and approved by trial judge not disturbed.

1. Witnesses \Leftrightarrow 175(2)—Party may testify to transactions with deceased party who answered interrogatories before his death.

Where one of the parties to a written contract or cause of action in issue or on trial answers interrogatories sued out in the cause before his death, and after his death they are introduced in evidence in the case, the opposite party is a competent witness to testify in rebuttal of the evidence contained in the interrogatories respecting transactions and communications with the witness. See McNair v. Brown, 147 Ga. 161, 93 S. E. 289. It was not error for the court to admit the testimony of the defendant, Taylor, as complained of in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh grounds of the motion for a new trial.

2. Landlord and tenant \Leftrightarrow 296(2), 309—Vendor and purchaser \Leftrightarrow 298—One entering under contract to purchase cannot be dispossessed by summary proceedings; case should have been submitted to jury when evidence was in sharp conflict.

Where one enters into possession of lands under a contract of purchase, he cannot be dispossessed by summary proceedings against him as a tenant. Griffith v. Collins, 116 Ga. 421, 42 S. E. 743. The question as to the validity of the contract in this case should have been submitted to the jury, as there was a sharp conflict in the evidence upon this point.

Under the above rulings it was error for the court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). I agree to the ruling announced in the first paragraph of the decision in this case, and to that portion of paragraph 2, wherein it is ruled that where one enters possession of lands under a contract of purchase he cannot be dispossessed by summary proceedings against him as a tenant, but under the contract in this case I cannot concur in the judgment of reversal, for the reason that in my opinion there was no question as to the validity of the contract, nor was there any question as to whether the defendant was a purchaser. Clearly, under the contracts in evidence, the defendant was a purchaser and not a tenant. Therefore, in my opinion, it was not error to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant.

CODMAN v. ROBERDS. (No. 12423.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1005(3)—Judgment on conflicting evidence not reversed.

Roberds obtained a judgment against Codman for $350, the full amount sued for on two notes given for the purchase price of certain potash bought for use as fertilizer. Held:

The evidence being conflicting, the judgment will not be reversed on the general grounds of the motion for new trial.

2. Agriculture \Leftrightarrow 7—Statute as to registration of fertilizers does not apply to sales in bulk to one purchasing for his own use.

By section 1796 of the Civil Code of 1910 it is provided that "It shall be lawful for manufacturers, jobbers, dealers, and manipulators of commercial fertilizers and fertilizer material to sell or offer for sale in the state of Georgia acid phosphate or other fertilizer materials in bulk to persons, individuals, or firms who desire to purchase the same for their own use on their own lands but not for sale." Upon an examination of the act of 1903 from which this section is taken (Ga. Laws 1903, p. 94), and a comparison of it with section 1771 of the Civil Code of 1910, requiring the registration of the names of the brands of fertilizers, acid phosphate, fertilizer materials or chemicals offered for sale, together with the name and address of the manufacturer or manipulator and the guaranteed analysis thereof, with the sources from which the phosphoric acid, nitrogen, and potash are derived, section 1771, properly construed, does not apply to fertilizers or fertilizer material sold in bulk to persons desiring to purchase the same for their own use on their own land.

(a) The excerpt from the charge of the court to which exception is taken is not erroneous for any reason assigned. No error is assigned thereon upon the ground that the evidence was conflicting as to whether the sale was in bulk.

3. Agriculture \Leftrightarrow 7—Charge that there was dispute as to how fertilizer was sold not error, though there was no dispute as to how it was delivered.

The charge of the court that "there is a difference in the testimony here between these parties as to whether or not this fertilizer was sold in bulk or in sacks" was not error for the reason assigned, that the evidence showed that the fertilizer material was "delivered" in sacks. The question is not how it was delivered, but how it was sold.

4. Agriculture \Leftrightarrow 7—Potash not required to be branded when sold in bulk for use by buyer.

It was not error for the judge to charge that, if the sale was in bulk to one desiring to use it for his own use on his own land, the seller was under no obligation to brand the potash in accordance with the provisions of section 1772 of the Civil Code of 1910.

5. Agriculture \Leftrightarrow 7—Charge held to sufficiently cover contention as to invalidity of sale of untagged potash.

The court having substantially charged the provisions of the act of 1911 (Ga. Laws 1911, p. 172), embodied in section 1778(a) of Park's Annotated Code, and having stated to the jury the defendant's contention that the sacks of potash were not marked or branded in accordance with that section, and that therefore the notes sued on were void, there is no merit in the contention that "the charge did not plainly set forth the contention of the defendant that if the sacks were not tagged in accordance with the provisions of this section, the sale would be void."

6. Question for jury.

Whether the borax in the potash sold rendered it totally worthless was a question for the jury, and the court properly left it to them.

7. Appeal and error \S 302(3)—Motion for new trial must state evidence objected to, and not merely its purpose.

One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court admitted the testimony of a witness, John M. Blain, over the objection of defendant's counsel on the ground that the same was irrelevant and hearsay, the purpose of which was to show that the fertilizer material sold to the witness by the plaintiff was used upon his crops and did them no damage." It is not enough to state the purpose of the evidence. The evidence itself, literally or in substance, should have been set out in the exceptions. Petty v. Brunswick, etc., Co., 109 Ga. 686(4), 35 S. E. 82; Davis v. Gaskins, 137 Ga. 450(2), 78 S. E. 579; Chamblee v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 20 Ga. App. 527(4), 93 S. E. 239; Tolbert v. State, 16 Ga. App. 311(1), 85 S. E. 267.

8. Instruction proper.

The judge properly instructed the jury that there was no evidence to support a partial failure of consideration.

9. Sales \S 418(19)—Difference between crops treated with poisonous fertilizer and other crops held speculative, and not recoverable.

The defendant pleaded by way of recoupment that the poisonous borax in the potash sold him caused him a loss of 19 bales of cotton worth $200 per bale, and 9,500 pounds of cotton seed worth $80 per ton, or a total loss of $4,180. He arrived at this loss by proof that the 52 acres to which he applied, at the rate of 500 pounds per acre, a mixed fertilizer containing a fifth part of the potash in question yielded only six bales of cotton, whereas two nearby acres of equal natural fertility, planted with the same kind of seed and worked alike, but fertilized differently, made at least half a bale per acre; his contention being that the 52 acres would have made at least twenty-five 500-pound bales of cotton of a grade worth 40 cents per pound, together with 1,000 pounds of seed to each bale, had the cotton seed planted not been injured by the borax. By subtracting the cotton and seed actually made from what should have been made, he undertakes to fix his actual loss. The damages sought were speculative, and the court did not err in charging that they were not recoverable. Butler v. Moore, 68 Ga. 780, 45 Am. Rep. 508; Savannah Chemical Co. v. Bragg, 14 Ga. App. 373, 80 S. E. 858. For no reason assigned was it error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant \S 103(1), 258(12)—Master's duty nondelegable; petition for injuries by cogwheels held to state cause of action.

The allegations of the petition charge negligence by a partnership in failing to exercise the care imposed by law upon masters for the protection of their servants, and sufficiently set forth a cause of action.

2. Partnership \S 63, 153(1)—Liable to employees to same extent as individuals and corporations; partnership and members not given immunity from liability for negligence in partnership business; not liable for partner's torts unless committed in pursuance of partnership business; partnership held legal entity in conduct of business.

The rules of law applicable to the relationship of master and servant, where there is a failure on the part of the master to perform the nondelegable, absolute duty to safeguard the servant, apply with the same force, effect, and extent to partnerships as to individuals and to corporations. The law of this state gives no protection or immunity to partnerships for their negligent acts, as legal entities or as individual partners, if such acts are clearly for the partnership benefit and in furtherance of the partnership business.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by H. G. Lipes against the Zakas Bakery. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McCallum & Sims, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

J. A. Miller and Branch & Howard, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This is an action against a partnership for personal injuries sustained by an employee. Two questions are made on general demurrer. It is insisted (1) that partnerships are not responsible for torts committed by a partnership, under Civil Code (1910), \S 3187; and (2) that, if there is such a liability, the allegations of the petition are not sufficient to set forth a cause of action.

[1] 1. The second question will be considered first. The suit is against a partnership to recover damages for an injury received by the plaintiff while he was working as an employee in a bakery operated by the partnership. It is alleged that the defendant partnership, in the operation of the bakery, used a machine known as a molding machine, run by electric power; that this machine had a set of cogwheels, at the end of which, between the machine and the wall, where the machine set close to the wall, and right back of the machine, and on the wall, and in close proximity to the cogwheels, was an electric switch, which had to be used in turning the electric power on and off. The cogwheels were ordinarily covered by a guard to protect the employee, who might be called upon to use the electric switch in the performance of his work, from being injured by exposed cogwheels. On the day of the injury the plaintiff, in the performance of his duties as an employee of the defendant, attempted to reach around the machine to use the electric switch to cut off the electric power, and in doing so his hand came in contact with the cogs and was very severely injured. The guard which was supposed to cover the cogs had been broken and was off at the time, and the cogs were exposed. It is alleged that this fact was known by the defendants, but that the plaintiff did not know of it and was given no warning of the defective condition. Under the allegations of the petition, which the demurrer admits to be true, it appears that the plaintiff was in the performance of his duties and received the injury by reason of the dangerous condition of the machine, that this machine was defective in the manner described, and this defective condition was known to the master, but was not known to the plaintiff, and he alleges that he had no opportunity of knowing of the defect. He further alleges that there is no duty of inspection upon him as an employee, but that the master, whose duty it was to inspect for the purpose of discovering the defect, and by the exercise of ordinary diligence in making the inspection could have discovered the defective condition of the machine and remedied the defect, or given the plaintiff notice of its condition. The plaintiff alleges that by the exercise of ordinary care he could not have discovered the defective condition of the machine and did not know of its condition.

Under the law of this state it is well settled that the master owes a duty to his servant of furnishing safe machinery and to keep the machinery in a safe condition, and that this duty is one of the absolute nondelegable duties of the master, and that a failure to perform this duty is negligence which renders the master liable for injuries to the servant caused by the failure of the master to perform this absolute, nondelegable duty, where the servant is free from any fault contributing to his injury. Brown v. Rome Machine & Foundry Co., 5 Ga. App. 142, 62 S. E. 720; Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 609, 56 S. E. 839, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 772; Cedartown Cotton Co. v. Miles, 2 Ga. App. 79, 58 S. E. 289; Civil Code (1910), § 3130.

[2] 2. Is the defendant relieved from liability for negligence because it is a partnership? It is earnestly contended by plaintiff in error that section 3187, supra, relieves a partnership from liability for its negligent torts. This section is in the following language:

"Partners are not responsible for torts committed by a copartner. For the negligence or torts of their agents or servant they are responsible under the like rules with individuals."

It is admitted that the second sentence of the Code section has no application to the case at bar, because there is no claim that the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of an agent or servant of the partnership. It is insisted that the case falls within the limitations of the first sentence of the section, namely, that "partners are not responsible for torts committed by a copartner." The section relied upon, in the opinion of the court, has no application to the negligent torts of a partnership. There is a wide difference between the torts of an individual partner and the negligent torts of a partnership as a legal entity. A partnership is not liable for the tort of a partner, unless the tort is committed for and in behalf of the partnership of which he is a member and in the pursuance of the partnership business. In the cases relied upon, cited in the brief of counsel, the torts alleged to have been committed, for which the partnerships were not liable for damages, were cases involving torts committed either by a fellow servant or by a copartner not in the performance of any duty as an agent of the partnership, nor in the furtherance of the partnership business. But there is no decision of the courts of this state which holds that a partnership is immune from liability for damage resulting from partnership negligence. If it were the law that a partnership could enter into a manufacturing or any other kind of business and employ servants therein, and, no matter how negligent it might be in failing to perform those duties which the law says every master must perform in the exercise of ordinary care to protect his servants from injury, could escape liability merely because the business was being carried on by a partnership, instead of by an individual or corporation, partnerships would be given a great advantage in the conduct of their business over individuals or corporations, and the business enterprises of this state would be carried on largely by partnerships and not by individuals and corporations.

This court is of the opinion that the same rules of law which make individuals and corporations liable for negligence apply to partnerships, and that it was never contemplated by the Legislature that the section of the Code relied upon should be given such a broad and unlimited application as is contended for in the present case. This section, by its very terms, has no application to the negligence of a partnership and lays down no different rule of liability for partnership negligence than for individual or corporate negligence. Chief Justice Bleckley, in Drucker v. Wellhouse, 82 Ga. 129, 8 S. E. 40, 2 L. R. A. 328, said:

"Though a firm or partnership is not a person, it is a legal entity, and for some purposes is recognized as a quasi person having powers and functions exercisable by one of the partners severally or all of them jointly. * * * The law does take note, on a wide scale, of partnership as a legal entity, and regards it as a unit both of rights and obligations."

A partnership in the conduct of its business is a legal entity, both as to its rights and in the performance of its duties to the public and their employees, and is a legal entity as to its obligations. Partners are, in respect to the business in which they are engaged, agents of each other, and therefore one partner might be liable for the tortious acts of another done in the usual course of business of the firm. But neither the members of a partnership nor the partnership itself is liable for the personal, individual tort of a member, not done in the prosecution of the business of the firm but for his own individual and personal purpose. If the master is a member of a partnership by which the servant is employed, and the work in which he so takes part is within the scope of the common undertaking of the partnership, his partners are jointly liable with him for an injury caused by his negligence to the servant. If the act of negligence which causes the injury to the servant is the act of the partnership itself as a legal entity, there can be no question but that the partnership is liable under the same rules of law as apply to individuals or corporations, and in such case this liability would extend to the individual members of the partnership.

The cases cited by plaintiff in error in support of his contentions are cases in which the tort complained of was an individual tort of the partner, where it was properly held that the partnership would not be liable for the tort of one of the partners in which the other partners did not join. Page v. Citizens' Banking Co., 111 Ga. 73, 36 S. E. 418, 51 L. R. A. 463, 78 Am. St. Rep. 144; Martin v. Simkins, 116 Ga. 254, 42 S. E. 483; Hendricks v. Middlebrooks Co., 118 Ga. 131, 44 S. E. 835; Corbett v. Connor, 11 Ga. App. 385, 75 S. E. 492; Battle v. Pennington, 14 Ga. App. 56, 80 S. E. 297. In the instant case the alleged negligence is the negligence of the partnership—the negligent failure on the part of the partnership to perform the absolute, nondelegable duties imposed by the law upon the master for the protection of the servant. And the law, reasonably construed, makes no difference in the rules of negligence applicable to the relationship of master and servant, whether the master be an entity such as a partnership, or an individual or a corporation. The judgment of the trial court in overruling the general demurrer is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

BERTHA MINERAL CO. v. BUIE.

BUIE v. BERTHA MINERAL CO.

(Nos. 12584, 12585.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 18, 1921.)

1. Affidavits \S 11—Liens \S 21—Paper not affidavit to support foreclosure when no oath administered; sale void when affidavit not sworn to; evidence held to show no oath administered; affiant's statement to officer held not sufficient oath.

Where a person signed a paper in the form of an affidavit for the purpose of foreclosing a mechanic's lien, and then procured a duly authorized officer to attest it by signing the jurat, but in fact no oath was taken or administered, or anything tantamount thereto, the paper did not constitute a legal affidavit, and furnishes no basis for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien, and a sheriff's sale thereunder is without authority and void.

(a) A purchaser at such a sale acquires no title, and this is so whether or not the purchaser had notice of the want of authority on the part of the sheriff to sell the property.

2. Shipping \S 32—Evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that mortgagor had title and possession when mortgage executed.

There was evidence sufficient to authorize the judge, who was sitting without a jury, to find that the mortgagor had title to and possession of the property in question at the time the mortgage was executed.

3. Other assignments without merit.

The other assignments of error are without substantial merit.

Error from Superior Court, Camden County; J. P. Highsmith, Judge.

Proceedings on a claim of J. C. Buie to property levied on by the Bertha Mineral Company upon foreclosure of a mortgage. Judgment for the claimant, and the mortgagee brings error, and the claimant files a cross-bill of exceptions. Reversed on the main bill, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

This is a claim case. The facts disclosed by the record are in substance as follows: The St. Marys Transportation Company, a copartnership composed of J. L. Douglas and others, executed a mortgage on a certain "lighter" to the Bertha Mineral Company. This mortgage was executed by J. L. Douglas on behalf of the St. Marys Transportation Company, and was properly recorded. Subsequently John Richardson, who built the lighter or barge, foreclosed a mechanic's lien thereon against J. L. Douglas, and had the property levied on and sold at public outcry. At this sale J. C. Buie bought the lighter. Thereafter the Bertha Mineral Company foreclosed its mortgage and levied upon the lighter. Buie thereupon interposed a claim. Thus was the issue formed, which, by consent of all parties, was submitted to the court for determination without the intervention of a jury. The court decided the issue in favor of the claimant, holding:

"(1) The mortgage, whether a mortgage by Douglas or by the partnership, was a good and valid mortgage against the property as between the parties. A member of a copartnership is authorized to execute a mortgage on personalty belonging to the partnership to secure a partnership debt.

"(2) The evidence was sufficient to make a prima facie case on behalf of the plaintiff, showing possession of the property by Capt. Richardson to have been through and on behalf of Douglas.

"(3) The mechanic's lien was a superior lien to the mortgage.

"(4) The mechanic's lien appearing on its face to be in every way regular, and the claimant having bought at sheriff's sale under foreclosure of the mechanic's lien, without notice of any defect with respect to the affidavit of foreclosure not having been properly verified or otherwise, [he] would stand in the position of an innocent purchaser and would be protected in the title thus acquired. The alleged defect would be immaterial in this case as against the claimant.

"(5) It follows that * * * the property is not subject to the mortgage in fa., and it is so held."

The plaintiff in in fa. excepts to the findings of the court against it, while the claimant, in a cross-bill of exceptions, excepts to the holdings adverse to him.

S. C. Townsend, of St. Marys, and Conyers & Wilcox, of Brunswick, for plaintiff in error.

Cowant & Vocelle, of St. Marys, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] We deem it necessary only to consider one of the points raised by the main bill of exceptions, to wit, that the affidavit which formed the basis of the mechanic's lien foreclosure, not being sworn to, was void, the sheriff's sale thereunder was without authority, and the claimant, who purchased the property in dispute at such a sale, acquired no title thereto.

Section 3354 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that—

"All mechanics of every sort, for work done and material furnished in manufacturing or repairing personal property, shall have a special lien on the same," which "shall be enforced in accordance with the provisions of section 3366 of this Code," when the property is surrendered and credit given.

Subsection 3 of section 3366 provides that—

"The person prosecuting such lien, either for himself or as guardian, administrator, executor, or trustee, must, by himself, agent, or attorney, make affidavit showing all the facts necessary to constitute a lien under this Code."

As to the making of the affidavit in question the witness Richardson, the person who built the lighter in question, testified:

"I do not remember where I was when I signed this paper [the paper relied upon by claimant as the affidavit foreclosing the mechanic's lien of John Richardson under which he bought at sheriff's sale]. I do not remember who was present when I signed it. I do not remember who it was that swore me when I signed the paper. I don't remember whether I was sworn or not, it has been so long. So many things happened, and me getting old, I don't remember. I don't know where I was when I went to foreclose this lien. I employed Col. Vocelle, and I don't remember where I was. I don't remember that Howard Rudolph was present and he had me hold up my hand. I am not trying to dodge; I could not tell you. You could question me all day and I could not tell you only what I have told you."

Rudolph, the officer who signed the jurat to the paper in question, testified on direct examination:

"That is my signature (indicating the signature to the jurat of the said alleged affidavit undertaking to foreclose the lien of John Richardson). At the time this paper was signed (indicating said alleged affidavit) before me by Capt. Richardson, I administered no oath or affirmation at all to him that I know of. I think he just signed his name."

On cross-examination this witness testified:

"I am not in the habit of attesting papers when a man signs his name to it. I don't know whether Capt. Richardson told me he wanted to swear to a paper. He said he wanted to sign a paper and I could not say what it was. I know I did not administer an oath to him, but I do remember that he told me he wanted to swear to a paper in my presence, but I did not read it over. He said he wanted to sign a paper and I attested it as clerk of the superior court and issued execution on it. I do not know whether he told me the contents of it were true. I did not ask him any question at all."

While it is true that the introduction of the alleged affidavit in evidence, which appears on its face to be regular, cast the burden upon the party attacking it to show that it was not in fact legally executed (Britt v. Davis, 130 Ga. 76, 60 S. E. 180), still it is our opinion that the evidence quoted above was sufficient to carry this burden. That evidence shows conclusively that no oath was administered, nor anything done which the law deems sufficient as amounting to the administration of an oath. Therefore the paper claimed to be an affidavit can neither suffice as such nor furnish a basis for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien. In the case of McCain v. Bonner, 122 Ga. 842, 846, 51 S. E. 36, 38, it was said:

"If, however, the affiant, at the time of tendering the affidavit to the officer, uses language signifying that he consciously takes upon himself the obligation of an oath, and the officer so understands and immediately signs the jurat, this will amount to such concurrence of act and intention as will constitute a legal swearing. The acts of the officer and of the affiant must be concurrent and must conclusively indicate that it was the purpose of the one to administer and the other to take the oath, in order to make a valid affidavit." (Italics ours.)

The facts of that case were that the affiant presented to the officer an affidavit previously signed by him, with the statement that he was familiar with its contents, that what was therein contained was true, and that he swore to the same, and the officer immediately, on the faith of that statement, appended his signature to the jurat; and it was held that this language of the affiant was sufficient to make it a question for the jury to determine whether or not the affidavit had been sworn to.

Viewed in the light of the decision in that case (which seems to be the leading Georgia decision on the subject), how stands the instant case? The affiant's testimony upon this point is altogether negative, and the uncontradicted evidence of the officer who attested the alleged affidavit is that he "did not administer an oath to him." It does not appear that the affiant stated that what was written on the paper was true. The mere statement that he told the officer that "he wanted to swear to a paper" in his presence is insufficient. What one wants to do and what one actually does are two entirely different things. The facts of the instant case do not, therefore, measure up to the test laid down in the McCain Case, supra, since the evidence shows conclusively that the affiant did not in fact swear to the paper, and the facts failed to present anything from which such an inference could legally be drawn. See Britt v. Davis, supra; Bryan v. Madison Co., 135 Ga. 171, 68 S. E. 1106; Green v. Rhodes, 8 Ga. App. 301 (1, 2), 68 S. E. 1090.

The judge, sitting without a jury, failed to squarely decide this question, since in his findings he said:

"The mechanic's lien appearing on its face to be in every way regular, and the claimant having bought at sheriff's sale under foreclosure of the mechanic's lien, without notice of any defect with respect to the affidavit of foreclosure not having been properly verified or otherwise, [he] would stand in the position of an innocent purchaser and would be protected in the title thus acquired. The alleged defect would be immaterial in this case as against the claimant."

We cannot agree with the trial court in this finding. If the officer had no authority to issue the execution (and we have already seen that he had not, in view of the fact that the alleged affidavit was not sworn to), the sale of the property under such circumstances would be void, and the purchaser thereat would acquire no title, and this is true notwithstanding the purchaser was such bona fide and without notice of the want of authority to sell. See Bell v. Chandler, 23 Ga. 356 (2), where it was held:

"A purchaser at sheriff's sale acquires no title, if the sheriff had no authority to sell, and this is so whether the purchaser had notice of the want of authority or not."

And in Torbert v. Collier, 141 Ga. 700 (2), 81 S. E. 1103, the Supreme Court held:

"Inasmuch as there was no authority on the part of the clerk to issue the execution mentioned in the preceding headnote, and it did not confer upon the sheriff any authority to levy upon and sell the land involved in the former litigation, the purchaser at such sale acquired no title thereunder."

See, also, in this connection, 23 O. J. 757, and numerous cases there collected.

From what has been said it follows that the court erred in finding and adjudging that the property was not subject to the mortgage fi. fa.

[2] The case being reversed on the main bill of exceptions, it becomes necessary to pass upon the cross-bill of exceptions. The first point presented thereby is that the court erred in not dismissing the levy for the reason that the plaintiff in fi. fa. failed to make out a prima facie case, since it failed to show either title to or possession in the mortgagor at the time of the execution of the mortgage. We cannot say that the trial court (who, it will be remembered, was exercising the functions of both judge and jury) erred in holding that the evidence was sufficient to show title and possession to the property in question in the mortgagor. The evidence of the witness Richardson, while not altogether clear and free from conflict, was in part as follows:

"I could not say for whom I was in possession except for Mr. Douglas. * * * Mr. John L. Douglas got me to build the lighter, and I was building it under his direction. * * * I was building the lighter for the stockholders. * * * Douglas was at the head; there was no contract for me to build the lighter, but Douglas paid me to build it, and if he paid me he employed me. All I was paid he paid it."

It will be recalled in this connection that Douglas executed the mortgage in question on behalf of the St. Mary's Transportation Company, a copartnership composed of Douglas and others, to the Bertha Mineral Company, the plaintiff in fi. fa. The evidence of the witness was, we think, sufficient to show a bailment by Richardson for Douglas. Possession in the mortgagor was all that the plaintiff in fi. fa. was required to show, and the possession of the bailee, Richardson, was the possession of the bailor, St. Mary's Transportation Company, subject, of course, to the bailee's claim of lien upon the property.

Furthermore, the record shows beyond question that the only right of the claimant to the property in dispute was through J. L. Douglas, and therefore, if Douglas had no title to the property, then obviously the claimant acquired none by purchasing it at public sale.

[3] The other points raised in the cross-bill of exceptions are without substantial merit.

Judgment reversed on the main bill of exceptions. Affirmed on cross-bill.

GOOGER v. STATE. (No. 12600.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §1044—Remarks of judge not reversible error when motion for mistrial not made.

In the special grounds of his motion for a new trial plaintiff in error complains of certain remarks of the judge made on the trial, which he insists were of such character as to prejudice the minds of the jurors against his cause, but he made no motion for a mistrial. In Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 277(1), 69 S. E. 184 the Supreme Court laid down the following rule: "Where remarks are made by the trial judge to counsel in a criminal case in the hearing of the jurors, which counsel contend were of such a character as to prejudice the minds of the jurors hearing them against the cause of their client, they should either move for a postponement of the hearing in order that other jurors may be impaneled than those present when the remark is made, or, if the jurors have actually been selected and impaneled to try the particular case, a motion should be made to have a mistrial declared; and upon the judge's refusal to grant a motion of the character indicated, his ruling would be subject to review. Counsel, having failed to make such motion and having proceeded without objection with the trial, cannot, after conviction, raise the question as to the prejudicial nature of the remarks complained of, in a motion for a new trial." See, also, Woodall v. State, 25 Ga. App. 8(3), 102 S. E. 918.

GRADY COUNTY v. RHEBERG.

(Nos. 12610, 12644.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)

1. Counties §208—Eminent domain §140, 270, 285, 295—Liability to suit may be based on constitutional provision against taking or damaging property without compensation; owner of property taken or damaged without compensation has right of action against county; measure of compensation for damage to land stated; county ratifying acts of chain gang crew in taking road materials from adjoining land liable to owner; retention of property taken authorizes inference of ratification.

While, as a general rule, a county is not liable to suit unless there is a law which in express terms or by necessary implication so declares, yet the appropriate law may be found in the constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation being first paid. When private property is taken or damaged by the authorities of a county, or by their duly authorized servant, for the use of the public, without just compensation being first paid, a right of action arises in favor of the owner of the property, which may be enforced by suit against the county, and the owner is entitled to recover adequate compensation for the property taken or damaged.

(a) Where the private property wrongfully damaged is land, adequate compensation or damages would be the difference between the market value of the land immediately before and after the damage.

(b) Even if the wrongful acts complained of which had the effect of taking or of damaging private property for public use were not done in the first instance under the sanction of the county authorities, yet if such authorities ratified and approved the acts of those assuming to represent them, the county would nevertheless be liable. And if the county authorities, after knowledge that their agent, charged with the working of a public road of the county, knowingly or by mistake took private property (dirt from a person's land, and thereby damaging the tract of land from which the dirt was taken), without compensation, and used the property taken in the improvement of the public road, the retention of the property so taken would authorize an inference that the original appropriation of the property had been ratified by the county authorities, so as to charge the county with the original wrongful taking and make it liable in damages, at the election of the owner of the property, either for the value of the property taken or for the diminution in the market value of the entire tract of land from which the dirt was taken.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Eminent domain §300—Evidence insufficient to show taking of property was without authority of commissioners and not ratified by them.

Testimony of the clerk of the commissioners of roads and revenues that it was the custom of the commissioners never to go on adjoining land for dirt for the roads without the consent of the owner held not to show that the acts of a chain gang crew and its foreman, in taking dirt, was without the authority of the commissioners and never ratified by them.

Error from City Court of Cairo; L. W. Rigsby, Judge.

Action by L. H. Rheberg against Grady County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant brings a cross-bill of exceptions. Reversed on main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on cross-bill.

L. H. Rheberg brought suit for damages in the sum of $1,000 against Grady county, and his petition made the following case: Petitioner, in the year 1919, was the owner of a certain described tract of land in Grady county, which abutted upon the Dixie Highway, a public road in the county. In the month of November, 1919, the county was repairing and grading said public road, adjoining petitioner's said land, with its chain gang crew, organized, controlled, and operated by the proper officials of the county, to wit, its county commissioners of roads and revenues. The chain gang crew was working the road under the direct supervision of a foreman employed by the county. The foreman and the chain gang crew, while repairing the road, left the roadbed and the right of way of the road, and unlawfully went upon the plaintiff's premises and tore down his wire fence, and dug a large excavation upon his land for the purpose of obtaining dirt for the repairing of the public road, and the dirt was so obtained and so used. The excavation so dug was 40 feet wide, 300 feet long, from 18 inches to 4 feet, 6 inches deep, and was from 15 to 29 feet distant from the right of way of the road. After rains the excavation holds about 3 feet of water. The damage done to the wire fence was $10, and the digging of the excavation rendered worthless to the petitioner one acre of land, which damaged him $60. In addition to these items of damages, the digging of the excavation gives to his property a bad appearance, thereby reducing its market value $1,000 and damaging him in that sum. All of which was done without the consent or authority of petitioner, and although demand has been made on Grady county nothing has been paid to petitioner.

A general and a special demurrer to the petition were overruled, and the defendant, in a cross-bill of exceptions, excepted to this ruling. The general demurrer was in the usual form, and the special demurrer set up that the paragraph of the petition which alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of the land (described in the petition), and which described the land, was not germane to the subject-matter of the petition and did not show what relation it had to the petition.

Upon the trial, after the introduction of the plaintiff's evidence, the court, upon motion of defendant, awarded a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

P. O. Andrews, of Thomasville, and Jeff A. Pope, of Cairo, for plaintiff in error.

R. A. Bell and J. S. Weathers, both of Cairo, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. (after stating the facts as above.) [1, 2] As authority for the preceding headnotes we cite Elbert County v. Brown, 16 Ga. App. 834, 86 S. E. 651, and the many pertinent decisions there referred to and exhaustively discussed by Chief Judge Russell. If the ruling in the instant case as to the liability of a county for the tortious acts of its servant in wrongfully appropriating or damaging private property, for the benefit of the public, goes further than any direct holding in those cases, we think the extension fully warranted by the spirit of those decisions and the broad legal principles upon which they are based. In the light of the rulings in the headnotes, the petition set forth a cause of action against the county, and upon the trial every material allegation of the petition was supported by the proof. The mere fact that one of the witnesses for the plaintiff—the clerk of the commissioners of roads and revenues of Grady county—testified that the commissioners “had a custom to never go on adjoining land for dirt without first getting the consent of the owner” did not show that the unlawful acts of their servant were done without the authority of the county commissioners, and that such acts had never been ratified by them, the undisputed evidence showing that after the unlawful appropriation of, and the damage to, the plaintiff's property had been called to their attention they retained the plaintiff's dirt upon the road and failed to compensate him for it or for any of the damage to his property. Under the pleadings and the evidence in this case, the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the damage to his wire fence, and for the damage to his tract of land. It follows from what has been said that the court properly overruled the demurrers to the petition, but erred in awarding a nonsuit.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross-bill affirmed.

BUTLER v. BERRY SCHOOL
(No. 12441.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Charities \S 45(2)—Not generally liable for negligence; industrial school held charitable trust and not liable for negligence of officers and employees.

“The general rule is that charitable trust funds are not to be depleted by subjection to liability for negligence.”

(a) The facts of this case do not take the Berry school out of the operation of the foregoing general rule. It is primarily maintained as a charitable institution, and “is not liable for the negligence of its officers and employees, unless it fails to exercise ordinary care in the selection of competent officers and servants, or fails to exercise ordinary care in retaining such officers and employees.”

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Appeal and error \S 1028—Errors harmless where verdict demanded.

Errors at the trial were harmless, where the verdict rendered was demanded.

Error from City Court of Floyd County;
W. J. Nunnally, Judge.

Action by Wilma Butler, by next friend, against the Berry School. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Frank Copeland and Harris & Harris, all of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

Maddox & Doyal, of Rome, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] In 1903 a charter was granted by the superior court of Floyd county to certain persons for “the formation of a corporation to be known as the Boys' Industrial School, for the purpose of carrying on, conducting, and operating a boys' industrial school.” Later the charter was so changed by amendment that the name became the “Berry school,” and a further amendment provided that it should be “a school for the education of the poor country girls upon the same privileges, rights and principles, and under the same regulations and provisions, as in the original charter and the amendment thereto for the poor boys, so that the said Berry school shall, after this amendment, become a school for the poor country boys and girls alike under the amended charter.” The charter makes no provision for capital stock, and the evidence shows that none was ever issued. The evidence further shows that the school is not conducted for private or corporate gain; that none of the officers or directors receive any salary, and the only salaries paid are to the teachers and instructors; that while a nominal charge is made against each pupil able to pay, a number of them never pay anything, and that no student pays anything like his or her per capita expenses of operating the school; that it is supported primarily by voluntary contributions, and that it has never received any funds or property except that “donated by charitably inclined people” for the purpose of carrying out the aims of the school as declared in its charter. The foregoing facts show that the Berry school is a good charitable trust, and comes under the general rule that institutions of strictly eleemosynary character, conducted purely and exclusively for public charity, supported by public munificence, and having no property except such as was dedicated to charitable purposes, should not be liable for negligence of their agents. The evidence shows also that—

“The school is principally an industrial school, and is to teach them (the pupils) the practical side as well as the theoretical side. At the boys' school they go to school four days and work two. At the girls' school they work two hours each day and go to school the rest of the time. The regular courses along literary lines are given. They work four hours on Monday and two hours in the other days. Along with the literary is carried the industrial training along all lines. They are trained in the carpenter shop, the blacksmith shop, the laundry, cannery, dairy, print shop, farming, and, of course, stock raising. As to the girls' school they are given training in dairy, gardening, weaving, sewing, cooking, housekeeping, just to become homemakers, to go back to the home where they came from, to try to improve conditions there. They are also taught laundry work. Each boy is required to spend a certain time in each department of the boys' school, and the girls the same way; they go from one department to another."

The fact that all the pupils are required to give a portion of their time to work in the various departments of the school, and that some of them pay a part of their expenses, does not take this school out of the general rule above laid down or change its character as a charitable institution. In Richards v. Wilson, 185 Ind. 381, 382, 112 N. E. 794, Chief Justice Cox said:

"The fact that a private corporation, as trustee, conducting a school of the character here involved, requires those who receive its benefits to pay tuition either in money or labor, does not take away the public benefit which flows from its work without profit to it, or change its character as a charitable institution in the legal sense. The tuition was in no aspect of the matter to be full compensation for the benefits bestowed on those who were to resort to the school for its advantages, and whatever it was to receive for it went to the partial support only of the school. No one was to receive pecuniary profit from it. The real expressed purpose in exacting tuition of any kind was to instill self-respect and build character in those who profited from the bounty of those whose good will toward man and solicitude for the public welfare were to make the school possible. That the gift was to a public and not a private charity cannot be doubted. The authorities [there] are numerous and practically in accord."

See authorities cited.

In Parks v. Northwestern University, 218 Ill. 381(3), 75 N. E. 991, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 556, 4 Ann. Cas. 103, it is held that—

"A private corporation organized for the sole purpose of disseminating learning, having no power to declare dividends and depending for its maintenance upon the income from its property and the endowments and gifts of benevolent persons, holds its funds, from whatever source derived, in trust for the object of its organization, and is within the rule exempting a public charity from liability for the negligence of its servants."

The facts in the case under consideration differentiate it from that of Morton v. Savannah Hospital, 148 Ga. 438, 96 S. E. 887. In that case, while the hospital was chartered as a charitable institution, "the greater portion thereof was set aside by its officers and superintendent for the treatment of patients who paid for the services they received." The Supreme Court held (148 Ga. 440, 96 S. E. 888):

"Under circumstances as just enumerated (although the hospital is a charity, and the general rule is that charitable trust funds are not to be depleted by subjection to liability for negligence), the corporation would be liable, but a recovery would be limited to the extent of income derived from treatment of patients who paid for services."

However, in that case it was also held (148 Ga. 438, 96 S. E. 887):

"With the exception just stated, an incorporated hospital, primarily maintained as a charitable institution, is not liable for the negligence of its officers and employees, unless it fails to exercise ordinary care in the selection of competent officers and servants, or fails to exercise ordinary care in retaining such officers and employees."

See Plant System v. Dickerson, 118 Ga. 650, 45 S. E. 483, and cases cited.

In Williamson v. Louisville Industrial School of Reform, 95 Ky. 251, 253, 24 S. W. 1065, 1066 (23 L. R. A. 200, 44 Am. St. Rep. 243), Judge Hazelrigg, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

"If the funds of these institutions are to be diverted from their intended beneficent purposes by lawsuits and judgments for damages for negligent or malicious servants, their usefulness—indeed their existence—will soon be a thing of the past."

[2] It will be noted that in the case sub judice there is no allegation in the petition that the Berry school failed to exercise ordinary care in the selection of competent officers and servants, or failed to exercise such care in retaining its officers and employees. Attention is also directed to the fact that the prayer of the petition in this case is for general damages only. Considering the foregoing facts and authorities, it is clear that the Berry school is a charitable institution, supported primarily by donations from the public; that it is not run for private or corporate gain; and that it would be against public policy, as well as against the settled principles of law, to allow any judgment to be rendered against it because of the negligence of any of its employees or agents, except where it failed to exercise ordinary care in selecting and retaining its employees and servants. This being true, conceding (but not admitting) that errors were committed by the court upon the trial of the case, they were harmless, as the verdict rendered was demanded. The motion for new trial was properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

GLOVER v. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO.
(No. 12414.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 17, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Insurance ⇨136(4)—Nondelivery during insured's good health held not to defeat recovery, where policy would have been delivered if agent had gone to post office.

Where the beneficiary of an insurance policy sues thereon, and the company defends solely upon the ground that the contract of insurance provides that it shall not be binding on the company unless the policy was delivered to and received by the insured during his lifetime in good health, this defense cannot avail where the evidence shows that the first premium was paid and that the contract of insurance was complete in every way, mailed to the agent of the company for unconditional delivery to the insured, and received at the post office of the agent of the insured while the insured was in life and in good health, and the only reason that the policy was not actually delivered by the agent to the insured was that the agent did not go to the post office and get the policy for several days after its receipt at the post office and while the insured was in life and in good health.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Insurance ⇨136(4)—Delivery during good health can be made condition precedent to liability.

Parties to an insurance contract can make the actual delivery of the policy during the good health of the insured a valid and binding condition precedent to the liability of the company.

3. Insurance ⇨136(1)—Actual delivery of policy not essential unless made so by terms of contract.

Actual delivery of an insurance policy to insured is not essential to the validity of a contract of life insurance unless expressly made so by the terms of the contract.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Action by Rillie Glover against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hartsfield & Conger, of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error.

Bryan & Middlebrooks, of Atlanta, and John R. Wilson, of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. Rillie Glover sued the New York Life Insurance Company for $1,000 on an insurance policy on the life of her husband, Guilford M. Glover. The case was submitted to the court without a jury, and a judgment was rendered for the company.

[1] Though dated August 30, 1918, the policy, by its terms, took effect on August 23, 1918. The application for insurance attached to the policy and made part thereof provided: (1) That the insurance hereby applied for shall not take effect unless the first premium is paid and the policy delivered to and received by me during my lifetime in good health; (2) that any payment made by me before the delivery of the policy to and its receipt by me as aforesaid shall be binding on the company only in accordance with the terms of the company's receipt therefor on the receipt form which is attached to this application and contains the terms of the agreement under which said payment has been made, and is the only receipt the agent is authorized to give for such payment. The application further provided that the agent could not "make, modify, or discharge contracts, or waive any of the company's rights or requirements."

The application signed by Glover on August 23, 1918, arrived at the New York office of the company on August 29, 1918, and was favorably passed upon the next day. The policy was signed August 30, 1918, and mailed to the Atlanta office of the company the following day, reaching there September 5, 1918. On the same day it was mailed to Hudgins, the agent taking the application, for delivery. It was agreed that in due course of mail the policy would have reached Camilla, Ga., the post office address of Hudgins, on September 6, 1918. Because of a change in his address, he did not actually receive the policy until some time between September 10 and September 15, 1918. He mailed it to Guilford Glover, R. F. D., Camilla, Ga., on September 25, 1918. Glover was taken ill with typhoid fever on September 10, 1918 and died on October 7, 1918. Counsel agreed that the first premium was paid by Glover, returned to his wife, by her returned to the company, and kept by it subject to her demand. The company's only defense was "that said policy was not delivered to said Glover and received by him during his good health."

[2, 3] That the parties to an insurance contract can make the actual delivery of the policy during the good health of the insured a valid and binding condition precedent to the liability of the company is certain. It is also true that—

"Actual delivery of the policy to the insured is not essential to the validity of a contract of life insurance, unless expressly made so by the terms of the contract." New York Life Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 104 Ga. 87(2), 30 S. E. 273, 42 L. R. A. 88, 69 Am. St. Rep. 134.

The decision in that case is authority for the proposition that the phrase, "unless the policy is delivered to the applicant while living and in good health," does not import an actual delivery, and that in such a case the controlling question on the subject of delivery is "not who has the actual possession, but who has the right of possession." We apprehend that if a contract of insurance unequivocally stipulates for a manual delivery of the policy, and the failure to make such delivery is not the fault of the insurer or of its agents, the reasoning of Justice Lewis in that decision would not apply.

If a decision of this case depended solely upon the question as to whether the words "delivered to and received by" mean an actual delivery, we should be inclined to hold that they do not. Under our law delivery certainly has no such meaning, and the Standard Dictionary defines "receive" as "to obtain by delivery, transmission, or communication." The Iowa Supreme Court, in the case of Unterharnscheidt v. Missouri State Life Insurance Co., 160 Iowa, 223, 138 N. W. 459, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 743, construed the words "delivered to and accepted by" not to mean manual delivery. It should also be borne in mind that the law requires that an ambiguous stipulation in an insurance contract be construed most favorably for the insured.

As we view this case, however, a recovery on the policy was demanded by the evidence, whether the words of the contract import an actual or constructive delivery. In the Babcock Case, supra, the policy reached the local agent about 2 p. m. on November 30, 1895. He made an effort to deliver it. Babcock was found dead on the afternoon of December 1, with a pistol wound in his breast. In rendering the opinion of the court, Justice Lewis used the following significant language:

"That policy was received by its local agent who, through negligence or in disregard of his obligations both to his company and to the other contracting party, failed, without excuse and without authority, to hand the policy to its real owner. In consequence of this failure and negligence, the company contends it is not liable. It thus seeks to take advantage of the wrong of its own agent, by virtually pleading his negligence as a defense to this action. The law should be plain in its terms and unmistakable in its meaning before a court should hold that for such a cause an insurance policy was inoperative."

In the Unterharnscheidt Case, supra, the policy, which was mailed to the agent for delivery to the insured, and in due course of mail should have reached him at Sioux Falls by July 20, 1910, was delivered at his office and remained there until his return on August 7, 1910. The insured became seriously ill July 23, 1910. The court said that—

"The neglect or omission of the agent, under such circumstances, to perform the manual act of placing the policy in the hands of the insured, will not serve to suspend or postpone the obligation of the company upon its contract."

The Babcock Case was quoted extensively and followed in that case. In the decision last quoted it was held that the delay of the agent to deliver the policy for three days precluded the company from successfully defending on the ground that no delivery was had. In the Babcock Case a delay of one day was sufficient to elicit a similar ruling. In the case at bar it appears that but for the change in the address of the agent, the policy could have been actually delivered to the insured at any time between its arrival in Camilla on September 6, and the beginning of the fatal sickness of the insured on September 10. The contract was complete, and there was nothing left to be done except the delivery of the policy during the good health of the applicant. He remained in good health for four days after the policy reached Camilla, and during that time there was nothing whatever for the agent to do except to convey the policy to Glover. This he did not do. We do not think the beneficiary should suffer because of the negligence of the company's agent. After extended discussion of the two decisions herein cited, Justice Steere, of the Michigan Supreme Court, in the case of Bowen v. Prudential Insurance Co., 178 Mich. 63, 144 N. W. 543, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 587, said:

"The strong, sound, underlying principle in both of the foregoing decisions, and which standing alone justifies the results reached, is that the defendants could not escape liability by relying on their own wrongs, and are estopped by their misconduct and negligence, or that of their local agents through whom the applications were made, from denying a delivery which they should have made, and therefore the court could and did say that there was a constructive delivery."

We plant our decision overruling the judgment of the court below squarely on the principle, announced in the Babcock Case, that the insurance company cannot avoid its contract upon the ground that there was no manual delivery of the policy to the insured. The insured was entitled to the possession of the policy, and therefore had constructive possession of it.

A consideration of the other assignments of error not dealt with above is not necessary.

BROOKS v. STATE. (No. 12760.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 17, 1921.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Criminal law \Rightarrow 878(2)—General verdict not sustained when no evidence to support one count.

A general verdict of guilty, upon an indictment containing two counts, the first charging the accused with stealing an automobile, and the second with buying and receiving the automobile, knowing it had been stolen, cannot be sustained, where there is no evidence supporting the charge in the second count, unless that count was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury.

Stubbs & Duke, of Eatonton, and Thos. J. Shackelford, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

Doyle Campbell, Sol. Gen., and A. Y. Clement, both of Monticello, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. It is well settled that where two or more distinct and separate offenses are charged in different counts of an indictment, a general verdict of guilty means guilty under each and every count, and the verdict cannot be sustained unless the charge in each and every count is supported by evidence. Morse v. State, 10 Ga. App. 61 (4), 72 S. E. 534; Dozier v. State, 14 Ga. App. 473, 81 S. E. 368; Innes v. State, 19 Ga. App. 271 (1), 91 S. E. 339; Sewell v. State, 23 Ga. App. 765 (5), 99 S. E. 320.

In the instant case the indictment under which the defendant was convicted contained two counts, the first charging him the theft of an automobile, and the second with buying and receiving the automobile, knowing that it had been stolen. The jury returned a general verdict of guilty, which in law meant guilty under both counts of the indictment, and fixed the punishment as follows: "Minimum one year, maximum three years." There was no evidence adduced upon the trial which authorized the defendant's conviction under the second count, and in his motion for a new trial he excepts to the verdict on that ground. While it appears, from a note of the judge, that during the trial the solicitor general stated to the jury that he abandoned the second count of the indictment, the judge in his charge made no reference to this statement of the solicitor general, but, on the contrary, charged the jury that the state contended that the defendant was guilty under both counts of the indictment, and charged them that if they found certain facts to be true the defendant would be guilty under the second count. The court also instructed the jury as to the form of their verdict if they should find the defendant guilty under the second count. In view of these instructions of the court, it does not appear that the second count was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, notwithstanding the statement of the solicitor general that it was abandoned by the state. The charge of the judge was delivered subsequently to this statement, and the jury were in effect instructed by the judge that the state had not abandoned the count, but was insisting upon it. Nor can we say that a new trial is not required for the reason that the jury fixed one sentence only, which was a sentence that could have been imposed if the defendant had been found guilty under the first count only. While the punishment fixed was moderate and well within the limits of the punishment prescribed for the offense charged in the first count, it was not the lightest punishment which the jury could have fixed for that offense, and it is possible, and not an unreasonable supposition, that they might have made the sentence lighter if they had not found the defendant guilty of both of the separate and distinct felonies charged in the indictment. See, in this connection, Morse v. State, supra, where Judge Powell said:

"The conviction upon the first count cannot be sustained. This being so, the verdict [a general verdict of guilty] is without evidence to support it. The error is not harmless, for under the indictment and the verdict the defendant could be sentenced to the maximum punishment for each offense, and the sentences might be made cumulative. The two counts stand just as if they were two indictments; and the right to impose sentence, where the verdict is general in such a case, is the right to sentence as for two separate and distinct offenses. The law in this respect is well established."

An examination of the record in the Morse Case (now of file in the office of the clerk of this court) shows that only one sentence was imposed on the accused in that case, and that it was a moderate one and well within the limits of the punishment prescribed for the offense charged in the second count of the indictment.

The assignments of error not dealt with above are either without substantial merit or refer to errors not likely to recur on another trial of the case.

Appeal and error \S 1144—Bailment \S 18(4)—Replevin \S 12(1)—Return of property does not defeat suit; suit not defeated by failure to pay bailee's charges where he denied having the property; nonsuit affirmed, with directions to tax costs against defendant, property sued for having been returned.

The court erred in awarding a nonsuit, but, under the peculiar facts of the case, the judgment is affirmed, with direction that the defendant in error be taxed with the costs in the trial court and the costs of bringing the case to this court.

Error from City Court of Dublin; S. W. Sturgis, Judge.

Action by W. W. Pierce against Loo Sing. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

S. P. New, of Dublin, for plaintiff in error.

BROYLES, C. J. This was an action in trover, brought by the owner of a suit of clothes, of the value of $20, to recover possession of the clothes, which he had delivered to the defendant for the purposes of being cleaned and pressed. When the owner demanded the clothes the defendant refused to deliver them, denying that he had them or that the plaintiff had ever delivered them to him. Thereupon the owner filed his suit in trover, and subsequently, one day after the service of the suit, the clothes were put by some unknown person upon the plaintiff's porch, and he recovered them in good condition. The fact that the clothes were redelivered to the plaintiff after the filing and service of the suit, but before the trial, was not sufficient to defeat the suit.

"When a conversion has once taken place it cannot be cured. Even the redelivery of the property will not cure it. Damages for the conversion are still recoverable, and the return of the property goes merely in mitigation of damages. Jordan v. Thornton, 7 Ga. 517, 528." Spiers v. Hubbard, 12 Ga. App. 680, 78 S. E. 138.

Likewise, the suit could not be defeated on the ground that the plaintiff had not paid or tendered the defendant the money due for the cleaning and pressing of the clothes. The refusal of the defendant to deliver the clothes, on the sole grounds that he did not have them, and that the plaintiff had never delivered them to him, amounted to a waiver of the defendant's right to demand payment for the work done on the clothes before their delivery to the plaintiff. Lightsey v. Lee, 8 Ga. App. 762, 70 S. E. 179.

From what has been said it follows that the court erred in awarding a nonsuit. However, it appearing from the evidence upon the trial that the plaintiff had recovered his clothes, and the evidence failing to show that he had been damaged in any amount, the only harmful result to him of the nonsuit was the taxing of the costs of the suit against him. The judgment of the trial court is accordingly affirmed, with direction that the defendant in error be taxed with the costs of the suit in the lower court and with the costs of this writ of error. See, in this connection, Woodruff Machinery Manufacturing Co. v. Griffin, 17 Ga. App. 529 (2 and 3), 87 S. E. 808.

DAVIS v. STATE. (No. 12593.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 940—Newly discovered evidence held insufficient to require new trial.

The special ground of the motion for new trial was based upon certain newly discovered evidence embraced in the affidavits of two witnesses, each of whom swore that about 6 o'clock in the morning he saw a person, not the defendant, go into a vacant building with a sack; one swearing that it contained "something in the shape of about a five-gallon keg or can," and the other swearing that the sack contained "something in the shape of a five-gallon keg or jug," and each swearing that the person went into a vacant store with this sack and contents and in a short time came back without anything. Granting that the sack carried into the vacant building about 6 o'clock in the morning contained a vessel filled with the same whisky which was there in the afternoon, this would not show that in the afternoon the defendant was not in "possession, custody, and control" of the liquor, and would not, therefore, require the grant of a new trial.

2. Criminal law \S 1156(2)—Trial court may grant new trial when verdict against weight of evidence, but if there is any evidence, Court of Appeals cannot interfere.

There was some slight evidence authorizing the verdict; and, the verdict having been approved by the trial judge, under the repeated and uniform rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, a reviewing court is powerless to interfere. When the verdict is apparently decidedly against the weight of the evidence, the trial judge has a wide discretion as to granting or refusing a new trial; but when there is any evidence, however slight, to support a verdict which has been approved by the trial judge, the court is absolutely without authority to control the judgment of the trial court. Barber v. State, 25 Ga. App. 242, 102 S. E. 879. See cases cited.

BAMBERG BANKING CO. v. MATTHEWS
et al. (No. 10749.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 4, 1921.)

Deeds ¶130—After birth of contingent remaindermen grantor held to have no reversion.

Where an owner executed a deed, reserving a life estate in himself and his wife, and creating another life estate in his children, with remainder in fee in the grandchildren, such remainder being a contingent one, the fee only remained in the grantor until the birth of a grandchild or grandchildren, so that a subsequently executed deed, purporting to convey the fee to one of his children, was void.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Bamberg County; Jas. E. Peurifoy, Judge.

Action by the Bamberg Banking Company against Addie Matthews and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified. The deed of 1908, referred to in the opinion, was executed by Amzi August and Sarah August, and delivered to Addie Matthews, conveying the 35-acre tract described in the complaint and in the mortgages to Addie Matthews, her heirs and assignees forever, being in all respects a fee simple deed with general warranty.

Jacob Moorcr, of Orangeburg, for appellants.

E. H. Henderson, of Bamberg, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of Judge Peurifoy. The action was for foreclosure of two mortgages. The defendants interposed a number of defenses. The exceptions are 11 in number. Exceptions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 are overruled. The appellants have failed to convince this court that the concurring findings of master and circuit court are against the preponderance of the evidence.

The question to be determined, as to whether Addie Matthews owns the property in fee simple as found by the circuit court, or whether, as appellants contend, she has an estate for life only, and that the infant defendants, the children of Addie, are remaindermen. The deed of Amzi August, made in October, 1882, is an absolute deed, and must govern; it was duly witnessed, signed, delivered, probated, and recorded. Dower was renounced thereon; it was a perfect deed. It reserves a life estate in grantor and wife, and creates a life estate in the children, remainder in fee in the grandchildren. It is a contingent remainder; the fee only remained in the grantor until the contingency happened, to wit, the birth of a grandchild or grandchildren, in any view of the case. The deed of 1908 was void, under the case of Rutledge v. Fishburne, 66 S. C. 155, 44 S. E. 564, 97 Am. St. Rep. 757. Addie did not own the fee, but only an estate for life, and her children are the remaindermen; and at her death own the land in fee, so the exceptions raising these questions, 8 and 9, are sustained. All other exceptions are overruled.

MITCHEM v. GASTON COUNTY DRAINAGE COMMISSION et al. (No. 447.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Drains \S 18—Special act creating county commission held to commit the administration of the act to its sound judgment and discretion.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 427, a special act creating the Gaston county drainage commission, merely outlined the general purpose and left the practical development and execution of the same to the commission, thereby committing the administration of the act to its sound judgment and discretion.

2. Drains \S 76—One present at hearings of commission cannot complain that he was not served with formal notice.

Where landowner attended meetings of drainage commission when it sat as a body to hear and determine complaints from the landowners, fix the classifications and rate and the amount of assessments, and did not except, or take an appeal from any of the actions of the commission, such owner, or a subsequent grantee, cannot claim that he was not bound by the proceedings because he was not properly or legally served with notice.

3. Drains \S 82(2)—Validity of assessments cannot be attacked in absence of proper exceptions or appeal.

Landowner in drainage district cannot attack assessments unless he takes exceptions and appeals provided for in the statutes, and such is true as to assessment by Gaston county drainage commission No. 1, created by special act (Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 427).

4. Drains \S 91—Collection of assessments not to be stayed because landowner has not been afforded drainage anticipated.

Collection of assessments by drainage commissioners should not be stayed because the scheme has not afforded to landowner the drainage he had anticipated, since the outcome of such enterprises cannot be absolutely predicted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gaston County; Harding, Judge.

Action by D. W. Mitchem against the Gaston County Drainage Commission and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to restrain the collection of drainage assessments levied by the Gaston county drainage commission No. 1 of Gaston county, N. C., against certain lands within such drainage district now owned by the plaintiff. This drainage commission was created by a special act of the Legislature. Chapter 427, Public Local Laws of 1911.

The drainage district was established in 1912 in pursuance of such act, and at the time of its establishment A. O. Stroup was the owner of the 43 acres of land in such district now owned by this plaintiff. Stroup owned the lands when they were classified and when assessments were first levied, and he attended the meetings of the commission and was present at the time the commission sat as a body to hear and determine complaints from the landowners, as provided for in the act.

Stroup did not except to the findings of the commission, or to the establishment of the district with said 43 acres included within it, nor to any action of the commission the day it sat as a body to hear and determine complaints, fix the classifications and rate and the amount of assessments, nor did he except, or take an appeal from any of the actions of the commission.

Plaintiff, Mitchem, afterwards purchased said 43 acres of land with full knowledge that the same was included within the drainage district and that assessments had been levied against the lands. Since plaintiff has owned the lands, other assessments have been levied, and plaintiff has not at any time excepted to or appealed from any of the orders of the commission. He has not paid any of the assessments levied upon the lands. After he had constantly refused to pay, and in order to force collection of the assessments, the lands were advertised for sale by the tax collector. Plaintiff, pending the date of sale, brought this action and obtained a temporary restraining order, which was dissolved at the hearing before Judge Bryson. This action came on for trial before Harding, Judge, and a jury, at April term, 1921, when, at the close of plaintiff's evidence, and upon motion of defendant, the court rendered judgment, as of nonsuit, from which the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Woltz & Woltz and Mangum & Denny, all of Gastonia, for appellant.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff, in his brief, has abandoned all of the irregularities complained of in his complaint except two, which, briefly stated, are: (1) The commission failed to divide the land into five classes; and (2) it abandoned the dredging of the stream.

[1] In order that we may intelligently present this matter, we first direct attention to the act of the Legislature creating this drainage commission. Public Local Laws 1911, c. 427. It is apparent, from a perusal of this act, the Legislature realized that many details of the drainage scheme contemplated by it would have to be threshed out by the local drainage commission. The Legislature outlined the general purpose, but very properly left the practical development and execution of the same to the commission, thereby committing the administration of the act to the sound judgment and discretion of it. We give here a few excerpts from the act which show this to be true:

Section 1. They shall have power "generally to do whatever may be necessary to be done in order to make effectual the drainage of Big Long creek," etc.

Section 2. "Shall also have the authority, in the discretion of the said commission," to do certain things therein mentioned.

Section 3. "The commission shall make a just estimate of all of the lands along Big Long creek and its tributaries within Gaston county and within the terminal points mentioned and designated in section 1, that will in their judgment be benefited, either generally or specially."

Section 8. This section also refers to the drainage commission, as to what things it may do, and (among them), it may make "such changes as they may deem proper."

Section 10 (the latter portion). "That every privilege, power and right to carry out the provisions of this act are granted said commission."

We might cite other provisions of the act, which tend to show that it was the intention of the Legislature to give the commission authority to administer the various provisions, in accordance with its best judgment and discretion; but we deem it unnecessary to do so. It seems clear, we think, that the Legislature was providing for the commission merely a basis upon which to work, but not tying its hands with any prescribed formula or with any set of rules.

[2] The principal question for consideration is whether the fact that the drainage commission did not classify the lands in strict, and even literal, compliance with the act, renders their entire action void and of no effect, as to the plaintiff's interest therein. Counsel for him have argued that he was not bound by the proceedings of the commissioners as he was not properly, or legally, served with notice; but we do not consider it necessary to decide whether or not he was served with formal process, or notice, as we find in the record ample evidence to the effect that the owner was actually present when the assessments were made, and that he made no objection to them, and noted no exception, nor did he attempt, in any proper way, to have them reviewed. All this is to be found in the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, giving him the most favorable, and allowable, construction of it, and it further appears that he took no such position at the hearing, as he now insists on, that he had not received the proper formal notice of the hearing, nor did he ask for further time in order that he might be better prepared with evidence, and otherwise, to protect, or defend, his interests. The case of Newby & White v. Drainage District, 163 N. C. 24, 79 S. E. 266, seems to answer all the objections made in this case, and the purport of that decision is thus substantially stated or summarized in the headnote: A drainage district laid off under the provisions of the act of 1909 (Pub. Laws 1909, c. 442) is a quasi municipal corporation, partaking to some extent of the character of a governmental agency, and neither its existence nor the regularity of its proceedings can be collaterally impeached, in an action for trespass for cutting down trees in constructing the drainage canal. The drainage act of 1909 affords ample opportunity and machinery for the landowner in a district laid off thereunder to assert his rights, including those of damages to his land, with the right of appeal to the superior court; and he is concluded under the express provision of the statute, by the order of the court confirming the final report of the viewers, unless he has preserved his rights in accordance with the statutory requirements. The pendency of a proceeding to lay off a drainage district under the provisions of the act of 1909 is notice as to all the lands embraced in the district, and the grantees thereof are bound by the statutory requirements, as to the procedure to recover damages to the lands, as were their grantors who were parties to the proceedings and who owned the lands at that time.

The plaintiff, testifying in his own behalf, confessed that he could not state positively whether he had received formal notice, and also stated that he did not know whether the notice was written, or merely verbal—but he was there and made no protest against any failure to formally notify him. Mr. Stone testified that plaintiff's assignee, Mr. Stroup, who was then the owner of the land, was at the meeting when the question of assessments and other matters were discussed and settled, and it appears that he apparently was satisfied with what was done. A man who is silent when he should speak will not be heard when common fairness and justice requires that he should be silent. There is supposed to be a seasonable time for all things. The world in its development and progress towards higher and better conditions cannot be stopped, for those who have lagged behind, to be heard on a question so vitally affecting the public good, and especially is this true of judicial proceedings where the complainant has had his day in court or a fair opportunity to be heard, if he has any meritorious ground of objection to what is done or about to be done. The law comes to the aid of the vigilant and not to those who sleep upon their rights.

We said in Drainage Com. v. Parks, 170 N. C. 435-438, 87 S. E. 229, 231:

"The statutes under which this proceeding was brought and conducted to final judgment seem to provide for an appeal at two stages thereof, one, under Public Laws of 1909, c. 442, § 8, when the drainage district has been laid off, and another, under section 17, when the time for an adjudication upon the final report of the viewers has arrived." The complainant "did not appear and except to either of these reports, the preliminary or the final, and the court, therefore, erred in allowing him to do so upon the application of the plaintiff for an additional issue of bonds. He could except then and be heard only as to any matters involved in the petition for the additional issue of bonds which affected his interests, but he cannot be permitted to go back of this and change the formation of the district and the classification and assessments already made, by attacking the reports of the engineer and viewers, and withdrawing a large part of his land from the district, especially after bonds had been issued on the basis of those reports and their confirmation, and sold to innocent holders. It would be unjust to them, if not illegal, as it would greatly impair their security, there being nothing substituted for the land thus taken out of the district, to preserve the value of that security. Broadfoot v. Fayetteville, 124 N. C. 478; McCless v. Meekins, 117 N. C. 35. But whether or no the bondholders could object, if they were parties, upon the ground that their rights would be, in a legal sense, impaired, it is sufficient to say that it would be unjust to them, and there is nothing in the statutes which allows an exception as to matters already settled at such a late stage in the proceedings. This view is sustained by the following decisions on similar statutes"—citing Zeigler v. Gilliatt, 263 Ill. 587, 105 N. E. 707; Trigger v. Drainage District, 193 Ill. 230, 61 N. E. 1114; Hatcher v. Supervisors, 165 Iowa, 197, 145 N. W. 12; Allen v. Drainage District, 106 Miss. 630, 64 South. 418.

In the more recent case of Gibbs v. Commissioners of Mattamuskeet Drainage District, 175 N. C. 5, 94 S. E. 695, the court, by the Chief Justice, states and applies these principles in such way as to leave not a vestige of ground upon which plaintiff can stand and successfully defend his position. And in the case of Carter v. Board of Drainage Commissioners (of the same district) 156 N. C. 183, 72 S. E. 380, the same principle is asserted, and it was also held, as it was in the Gibbs Case, supra, that works of this character being of a quasi public nature will not be interfered with, that is, stopped or delayed, by collateral attacks of those who have lost their right to be heard in the proper way by inexcusable laches, and an injunction which is the relief sought in this proceedings, was denied. In the more recent case of Mann v. Mann, 176 N. C. 353, 97 S. E. 175, which was a motion in the original cause where Mattamuskeet Lake District was established (Carter v. Commissioners, supra), this court reviewed the same subject and the authorities somewhat extensively, and arrived at the same conclusion as formerly in the numerous cases decided by it up to that time, and held, as appears from a part of the syllabus, that a final judgment rendered, in due course, in proceedings to establish a drainage district, may not be amended at a subsequent term of the court to supply an alleged omission to limit the assessments to be made on the land in accordance with that stated in the petition; there being nothing to show that the judgment was not recorded by the clerk as actually given to him, or that it had been omitted by inadvertence of the judge or the mistake of any one. The correction of a final judgment for error rendered by a court having jurisdiction over the parties and subject-matter is by appeal, and it may not be collaterally attacked except for fraud, collusion, etc., or when it is void, and its invalidity appears upon its face, or otherwise in some cases. Where a final judgment has been rendered between the same parties on the same subject-matter, it is not essential that a later action or proceeding be identical in form for it to estop the parties therein, as res judicata. One who has been defeated on the merits in an action at law cannot afterwards resort to a bill in equity upon the same facts for the same redress. Upon this motion, made in the cause to amend a final judgment in proceedings to form a drainage district so as to restrict the amount of the assessments made upon the lands, and especially after the issuance of bonds thereon, the principle is applied that the one of two innocent persons must suffer whose conduct has occasioned the loss. Where, by motion at a subsequent term of the court, a final judgment entered in proceedings to establish a drainage district, under the provisions of a statute, is sought to be amended so as to include a provision limiting the amount of assessments to be made on the lands, the mere failure of the parties at the time to request that the provision be inserted in the judgment does not alone entitle them to the relief sought. A provision in the petition limiting the amount of assessments to be made on lands within a drainage district being formed under the provisions of the statute, which was not inserted in the final judgment rendered in due course, may not at a subsequent term be supplied by amendment, being also contrary to the statutory provisions and invalid.

Ruling Case Law, vol. 9, p. 637, says that the presumption in favor of the regularity of official proceedings puts the burden on the landowner who claims that proper notice of the proceedings has not been given, and, even in cases in which notice is necessary, any subsequent joinder in the proceedings will constitute a waiver. There is no evidence tending to show that either Stroup, or the plaintiff himself, took proper advantage, at any time, of the remedies provided in the act, and it is too late now to hear him. White v. Lane, 153 N. C. 16, 68 S. E. 895.

[3] In Spencer v. Wills, 179 N. C. p. 177, 102 S. E. 275, it was said that we have held in sundry cases appertaining to the same subject, that parties to proceedings of this character, and in reference to their lands situated within the district, are estopped from questioning, by independent suit, the judgment establishing the district, or the validity and amount of the assessments made in the cause or the matter of burdens and benefits affecting the property. These and other like rulings must be challenged, at the proper time, in the course of the proceedings and, unless objection is successfully maintained, the parties are concluded. Also the Court said in the case of Drainage Dist. v. Parks, supra, 170 N. C. at page 439, 87 S. E. 229, that exceptions and appeals are provided for in the statutes, and the time fixed when they must be noted. As complainant did not appear, and except at the proper time, it must be assumed that he was satisfied with what had been done and waived his right. He can file exceptions to any action taken in regard to new matter, but not to the former proceedings, which are not open to him, but past and closed forever. Griffin v. Com'rs, supra, 88 S. E. 575. We further said that this is a question (in speaking of benefits anticipated and not realized) that was settled at the time the report was adopted and the district was established and may not be questioned in a proceeding (injunction) of this character.

[4] It was urged, in the able argument of Mr. Mangum, that neither Stroup, the original owner of the land, nor the plaintiff, who is his assignee, had received any benefit from the drainage; but we think, upon a close study of the record, that it will appear otherwise. But, if it does not, we held in Griffin v. Com'rs, supra, that the collection (of assessments) should not be stayed because the scheme has not afforded to a landowner the drainage he had anticipated.

The claim of plaintiff that no work has been done on his land which facilitates its drainage is clearly untenable. It appears from the testimony that a gorge below his lands has been removed and work in removing a large shoal has been also done, and perhaps more even than that much. Whether the work actually done was as beneficial as plaintiff or his predecessor in title anticipated is a matter not before us, as it was settled at the hearing before the commissioners, when the report was adopted and the district established, and may not now be questioned, as we held in Griffin v. Com'rs, supra. The outcome of these enterprises cannot be absolutely predicted, and they may even result in the abandonment of the project; but probable feasibility has been shown and the district in consequence organized, and preliminary work must then be done and its cost must be met. It is work undertaken by the district, and, in the present case, the district was created upon an adequate showing of basis, and it is not disputed that the plaintiffs received the notice to which they were entitled, or were actually present, and were thus apprised of whatever legal consequences attached to the formation of the district with their lands in it. The same was said in Houck v. Little River Drain. Dist., 239 U. S. 254, 36 Sup. Ct. 58, 60 L. Ed. 266. There was testimony for plaintiff that he attended the meetings of the drainage commissioners, and that he did not take any action about what was done there, until this suit was commenced.

The plaintiff's reliance upon Spencer v. Wills, supra, to show that the landowner may bring suit for damages when there has been a substantial departure from the scheme authorized by the commissioners, is without avail to him, as the principle does not apply to this case, and that case expressly recognizes and supports the rule which underlies our present decision. The case of County Collector v. O. I. Traction Co., 267 Ill. 510, 108 N. E. 687, is manifestly not applicable, as there was a classification here, and if it was erroneous, plaintiff should have excepted to it.

Upon a review of the entire case, we have discovered no error of the court in granting a nonsuit.

No error.

HAYMAN v. DAVIS.. (No. 481.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Work and labor \S 14(1)—Recovery may be had for services performed under contract breached by the other party.

If the father, who had agreed to convey land to his daughter if she would live with him and perform services for him, broke the contract, in such way as to render her performance impossible, he became liable for the services rendered before the breach.

2. Pleading \S 34(1)—Complaint for services rendered under contract to be liberally construed on demurrer ore tenus.

A complaint by plaintiff seeking to recover for services performed by her for her father under a contract broken by him preventing her performance was, on demurrer ore tenus, to be liberally construed.

3. Pleading \S 214(1)—Demurrer ore tenus admits truth of allegations of complaint.

A demurrer ore tenus admitted the truth of the allegations of the complaint.

4. Contracts \S 319(2)—Work and labor \S 14(1)—Party may recover on part performance if completion being prevented by other party.

A party to a contract may, on part performance, and prevention of full performance by the act of the other party, recover damages for the breach, or on quantum meruit for the part performance.

5. Work and labor ¶22—Complaint held to state a cause of action.

A complaint alleging substantially that plaintiff's father had agreed to give her a tract of land if she would live with him, take care of him, and perform services, and that she had done so for a number of years, and that he had prevented further performance by leaving the premises and refusing to permit plaintiff to perform, held to state a cause of action.

6. Election of remedies ¶3(3)—Plaintiff must elect as between suit on contract and for quantum meruit for services.

Where plaintiff sought to recover for services rendered under a contract, full performance of which she alleged had been prevented by her father, the other party thereto, she thereby renounced all right to recover on the contract, and could not recover on both, they being inconsistent remedies, so that she must elect between the two.

Appeal from Superior Court, Randolph County; McElroy, Judge.

This is a civil action brought by Mary Ella Hayman against Nathan M. Davis, who is her father, on a quantum meruit for services rendered to said Nathan M. Davis, covering a period of 22 years.

The complaint alleges that the defendant contracted and agreed with the plaintiff that, if she would live with him, take care of him, do the cooking, washing, mending and work in the house and field as a dutiful daughter, he would give her the tract of land she was, and is now, living on, and that said tract of land should be the consideration for her services. That Nathan M. Davis, after the plaintiff had lived with him and cared for him for 22 years, and fully performed her part of the contract, breached the said contract by leaving the premises referred to, and by refusing to let plaintiff take care of him and carry out her contract as alleged in the complaint.

The defendant demurred ore tenus to the complaint. The court sustained the demurrer and signed judgment dismissing the action, and plaintiff appealed.

Brittain, Brittain & Brittain, of Ashboro, for appellant.

J. A. Spence, of Ashboro, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The plaintiff contended that, as there was no evidence taken at the time of the trial, the court could pass only upon the allegations of the complaint, and it held, and so adjudged, that the plaintiff had not stated a sufficient cause of action. This, the plaintiff insists, was error. There was consent on the part of both the plaintiff and defendant, and if the defendant breached the contract in such a way as to make it impossible for the plaintiff to carry out her contract, as was contemplated at the time of making the contract, and this was done by the defendant without the consent of the plaintiff, the former became liable for the services already rendered before the breach in such amount as they were reasonably worth.

[2] The plaintiff alleges, in her complaint, that she served her father according to the terms of their contract for many years, in the house and in the field, where she did a man's work, and by doing so she impaired her health, so that she is not now able to work and labor, as she formerly could, and has thereby diminished her capacity to earn a living; that her father broke the contract by leaving her alone and without the ability to further serve him and continue performance of the contract so that she can get the full amount of compensation promised to her; and while she does not clearly abandon the special contract, that is, in so many words, the effect of the pleading is, when it is liberally construed, as it should be, that her father has rendered full performance of the contract impossible by his conduct, and, therefore, she elects to treat it as abandoned and fall back upon her right to recover for her services their reasonable value.

[3] The demurrer admits the truth of the allegations of the complaint, the substance of which we have stated. The mere fact of her being ready to accept a deed for the land in full satisfaction should be treated as surplusage, or unnecessary, for she is not entitled to a deed at this time, and, if the contract had been kept, not until her father's death, as the stipulation was that she should work for him during his lifetime; and he is still living, and she was not to get the land until he died. She cannot, of course, have the land and full compensation for her services, and besides, she has no present right of action for the land, but she does allege that defendant, by his conduct, has prevented her from performing the contract, and she asserts her right to damages for such breach, and specifically asks for the value of the services performed by her and for any other amount to which she may, upon the facts, be entitled because of such breach by the defendant.

[4] The general rule is that though performance by one party of a part or the whole of his promise may be a condition precedent to the liability of the other party to perform, still his failure to perform will not discharge the latter, if the latter prevented performance. In such a case the party so prevented is discharged from further performance, and may recover damages for the breach or recover on the quantum meruit for his part performance. Clark on Contracts (Ed. 1904) p. 468. As we said in McCurry v. Purgason, 170 N. C. at page 469, 87 S. E. 247, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 907:

"The law implies a promise by the party to pay for what has been thus received, and allows him to recover any damage he has sustained by reason of the breach, for this is exact justice."

If a contract is made of such a character that a party actually received labor or materials, and thereby derived a benefit and advantage, the labor actually done and the value received furnish a new consideration, and the law thereupon raises a promise to pay to the extent of the reasonable worth of such service to him. This may be considered as making a new case—one not within the original agreement—and the party is entitled to "recover on his new case" for the work done—not as agreed, but yet as accepted by the defendant. Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 492, 28 Am. Dec. 713. That case (Britton v. Turner), says Judge Dillon in McClay v. Hedge, 18 Iowa, 68, has been criticized, doubted, and denied to be sound, yet its principles have been gradually winning their way into professional and judicial favor. It is bottomed on justice and is right upon principle, however it may be upon the technical and more illiberal rules as found in the older cases. The case of McCurry v. Purgason, supra, goes fully into the law on this subject, where the terms of the contract were strikingly similar to those we have here, and cites the authorities in this and other jurisdictions. We there said:

"The complaint and evidence in this case indicate that plaintiff is suing upon the theory that she could not perform her part of the contract by reason of the testator's conduct, and that her withdrawal from the home place was caused thereby. She seeks to recover, not the price or measure of value fixed by the contract for her services, but on an implied assumpsit to pay for the actual services rendered what they are reasonably worth. It was said * * * in Tussey v. Owen, 139 N. C. 457, at pages 461, 462: 'There is a class of cases where, under some circumstances, the rigor of the common-law rule has been relaxed, and a person has been permitted to recover the actual value of his services, although failing to perform the entire contract on his part. In some cases the law implies a promise to pay such remuneration as the benefit conferred is really worth. Dumalt v. Jones, 23 How. (U. S.) 220. But we know of no authority to support the claim that the plaintiff could recover the full contract price, unless she had performed the contract.'"

This plaintiff has not failed to perform her part of the contract, as was the case in one of the decisions cited, but has, on the contrary, been free from any blame. The McCurry Case so fully covers the law of this one that we refrain from further discussion in regard to it.

[5] The complaint should have complied more formally with the rule of pleading that superfluous matter should be omitted, but it is entitled to a liberal interpretation. Blackmore v. Winders, 144 N. C. 215, 56 S. E. 874; Brewer v. Wynne, 154 N. C. 487, 70 S. E. 947. Following this rule, and discarding what is immaterial, we conclude that the complaint does substantially state a cause of action on a quantum meruit. The judge will, no doubt, permit the plaintiff to amend her pleading, so as to state the cause of action with greater legal accuracy, if so desired, though amendment is not absolutely essential.

The demurrer should have been overruled, and the defendant allowed to answer over.

[6] As the plaintiff is suing on a quantum meruit, she thereby renounces all right to recover on the special contract. She is not entitled to recover on both causes, as they are inconsistent remedies, and therefore she is required to make her election between the two.

Error.

VANN v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. (No. 227.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Railroads §350(1)—Negligence held question for jury.

In an action for injuries in a collision between an automobile and a train at a crossing, where the evidence as to negligence was somewhat conflicting, so that that question was properly submitted to the jury, it was not error to overrule a motion for nonsuit.

2. Evidence §506, 513(6)—Expert can give opinion as to matter in controversy and state whether railway crossing was properly constructed.

An expert may give his opinion about the particular matter in controversy, so that he could state whether a crossing of a highway over a railroad track was properly constructed.

3. Appeal and error §926(7)—Witness presumed to have qualified as expert in absence of contrary showing.

In support of the trial court's ruling, it will be presumed on appeal that a witness who was permitted to express an opinion was qualified as an expert, where no question was made as to that fact.

4. Evidence §513(6)—Expert can testify as to measurements at crossing in controversy.

In an action for injuries sustained in a crossing accident, an expert witness can testify to measurements made by him of the crossing at which the accident occurred.

5. Damages \Rightarrow 173(1)—Indebtedness of plaintiff admissible on issue of impaired earning capacity.

Evidence that plaintiff, who before the accident was in sound financial condition, was indebted at the time of the trial, is admissible as bearing upon the issue of impairment of his earning capacity by the injuries he received.

6. Negligence \Rightarrow 122(1)—Burden of proving contributory negligence on defendant.

In an action for injuries in a collision between an automobile and a railroad train, a charge that the defendant had pleaded contributory negligence, and that the burden was on it to show negligence by plaintiff, was correct, under C. S. § 523, requiring that defense to be pleaded and proved.

7. Negligence \Rightarrow 141(3)—Instruction as to intoxication held correct.

In an action for personal injuries, an instruction that, while there was evidence that plaintiff during the afternoon before he was injured had drunk some intoxicating liquors, there was no evidence other than the drinking of the liquor tending to show he was intoxicated thereby at the time of the injury, was correct, where the testimony mentioned was all there was in the case as to plaintiff's intoxication.

8. Railroads \Rightarrow 330(1)—Automobile driver can assume crossing is reasonably safe.

The driver of an automobile approaching a railroad crossing can assume that the railroad had kept the crossing in a reasonably safe condition.

9. Railroads \Rightarrow 330(1)—Care required of traveler assuming crossing is safe.

While the assumption that a railroad crossing is in reasonably safe condition does not exempt an automobile driver approaching it from the duty of exercising proper care for his own safety, that assumption may be considered in determining whether he did exercise proper care under the circumstances.

10. Railroads \Rightarrow 351(12)—Charge on contributory negligence held correct.

In an action for injuries to an automobile driver at a crossing, a charge that, even if the driver was negligent, that fact did not of itself prevent recovery, where there was negligence on the part of the railroad, because that would withdraw the question of proximate cause from the jury, was correct.

11. Damages \Rightarrow 30—Automobile driver injured at crossing accident can recover for damages to automobile.

In an action for injuries resulting from a collision between plaintiff's automobile and a train at a railroad crossing, plaintiff can recover for damages to his automobile in addition to damages for injuries to himself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sampson County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Henry Vann against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

The assignments of error were as follows:

(1) His honor permitted the witness M. O. Bullard to testify as to his opinion as follows: Considering the angle 20 degrees and 30 minutes at which the dirt road crossed the railroad, the bridges should have been on both sides, the east and west side, across the railroad ditches, 56 feet to have covered the entire surface of the public road. This error is covered by the first exception.

(2) The same witness was permitted to testify over objection that said bridges, by actual measurement, were 33 feet; and this error forms the basis of the second exception.

(3) The plaintiff, Vann, was permitted to testify, over objection, that he owed $50,000; and this error forms the basis of the third exception.

(6) At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for judgment as of nonsuit. Motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted. This error forms the basis of the seventh exception.

(7) His honor charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "The defendant company in this action has pleaded contributory negligence. The burden is therefore upon the defendant company to prove to the jury by the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff in this action was guilty of negligence and such negligence contributed to his injury, and that such negligence of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of the injury." This part of the charge was erroneous, as defendant contends, and forms the basis of the eighth exception.

(8) His honor charged the jury, among other things: "While there is evidence in this case that the plaintiff, Vann, during the afternoon before he was injured, had drunk two glasses of cider and also had drunk three or four swallows of apple cider from a jug, there is no evidence in the case, other than the drinking of the cider, tending to show that the plaintiff, Vann, was intoxicated thereby, or was under the influence of any intoxicants at the time of the injury." Defendant contends that this was error, and it forms the basis of the ninth exception.

(9) His honor charged the jury, among other things: "While it is the duty of one crossing a railroad to exercise ordinary care for the safety of himself and his vehicle, he has the right to assume that the railroad company had discharged its duty to the public by keeping its railroad crossing in a safe and convenient condition for the traveling public." This part of the charge forms the basis of the tenth exception.

(10) His honor charged the jury: "The mere fact that the speed of an automobile exceeded that allowed by chapter 107, Laws of 1913, at the time of the injury of plaintiff on the railroad crossing, does not of itself prevent a recovery of the plaintiff, where there is negligence on the part of the railroad, because it would among other things withdraw the question of proximate cause from the jury." This error forms the basis of the eleventh exception.

On August 29, 1914, the plaintiff and his companions were driving in a Ford automobile from Falcon, N. C., to Fayetteville, N. C., and after darkness had set in they attempted to cross over the tracks of the defendant, where the public road from Dunn to Fayetteville intersects with the said tracks, a little above the station at Wade. In so doing the automobile was wrecked, and one of the passengers, Randall Pusey, was killed, and the plaintiff was knocked senseless and otherwise injured. There were two tracks on the crossing, one of which was then being laid, and had not been completed and, as plaintiff alleges, rendered the crossing unsafe, and even dangerous, as the rails were exposed and high above the surface of the ground, and further, the track, and its condition, could not be seen in time to avoid the injury. The other facts necessary to an understanding of the matter will be found in the reported case of Pusey, Adm'r, v. A. C. L. R. Co., 181 N. C. at p. 137, 106 S. E. 452.

The case was submitted to the jury, under the evidence and the charge of the court and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment thereon, and defendant appealed.

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellant.

Fowler & Crumpler and Butler & Herring, all of Clinton, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The evidence as to the negligence was somewhat conflicting, and it was therefore properly submitted to the jury, and the motion for a nonsuit overruled.

We will consider the exceptions in the order of their statement in the record, and in the brief of defendant.

[2, 3] First. It was competent for the witness M. O. Bullard to state whether the crossing was constructed by the correct method, as he was an expert and no question was made as to this fact. An expert, having special scientific knowledge, which fits him to do so, may give his opinion about the particular matter in controversy. We said in Summerlin v. Railroad Co., 133 N. C. 550, at page 557, 45 S. E. 898:

"We must infer from the record one of three things: (1) That there was evidence of the witness' qualification and that the fact of his being an expert was found by the court, or (2) that he was admitted to be an expert, or (3) that there was no question made in the lower court in regard to it. These inferences must be made because we cannot presume error, and the burden is upon the appellant to show it, and in this court we must assume that every fact was proved and everything done necessary to sustain the ruling and judgment of the court below, unless it otherwise appears in the record. Nothing appears in this record tending to show affirmatively that the judge committed any error in respect to the matter we are now considering."

[4] We do not see why, within the same principle, the testimony of the same witness, as to the measurements, was also not competent, and admissible.

[5] Second. The evidence as to plaintiff's present indebtedness, as compared with his sound financial condition when he was injured, bore upon his earning capacity, which he alleges was greatly impaired by the injuries he received when the car was wrecked at the crossing. The impairment of his earning ability is shown by the fact that, owing to it, he has fallen behind and whereas formerly he could, and did, make money and accumulate it, he is now embarrassed in his affairs and deeply involved.

Third. The motion to nonsuit was, as we have said, properly overruled, because there was evidence of negligence fit to be considered by the jury.

[6] Fourth. There was no error in the charge as to contributory negligence. That defense must be pleaded, and the burden to show it is upon the defendant (Consol. Statutes, § 523; Kearney v. Railroad Co., 177 N. C. 251, 98 S. E. 710; Boney v. R. R. Co., 155 N. C. 95, 71 S. E. 87), and as to reasons for the change in the former rule (Horton v. R. R. Co., 157 N. C. 146, 72 S. E. 958, and Owens v. R. R. Co., 88 N. C. 502).

[7] Fifth. The instruction of the court as to the drunken condition of the plaintiff on the evening of the accident was manifestly correct, as the testimony he mentioned in it was all in the case as to such condition, and it was for the jury to say whether or not he was drunk, and his contributory negligence, in this respect, caused the injuries.

[8, 9] Sixth. The plaintiff might well assume, in the ordinary course of things, that the defendant's crossing was in a reasonably safe condition, and had been kept so by the defendant. This question was directly involved, and decided, in Parks v. Railway Co., 124 N. C. 136, 32 S. E. 387, when the learned charge of Judge O. H. Allen to the jury is considered in connection with the opinion of the court. The plaintiff surely had the right to expect that defendant had performed its duty to the public with respect to this crossing. That, of course, did not exempt the plaintiff from the duty of exercising proper care for his own safety, but what was such care on his part must, of course, be determined by a consideration of the assumption he was permitted to make with respect to the condition of defendant's crossing. It will not, we presume, be contended that plaintiff should have assumed that the crossing was in bad condition. All that was required of him was that he should look out for his own safety and exercise that degree of care characteristic of the ideally prudent man, which is ordinary care under the same circumstances. The duty of a traveler on a highway at a railroad crossing is fully discussed in Johnson v. R. R. Co., 163 N. C. 431, 79 S. E. 690, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 598, with a full citation of authorities, though it may not be so closely applicable to the particular facts of this case as Parks v. R. R. Co., supra. But the case of Tankard v. R. R. Co., 117 N. C. 558, 23 S. E. 46, is directly in point, as it was there held that, while it is the duty of one crossing a railroad in a vehicle to exercise ordinary care for the safety of the animal he is driving, which was injured, he has the right to assume that the railroad company has discharged its duty to the public by keeping the crossing in safe condition.

[10] Seventh. It was obviously right to charge the jury that the negligence of plaintiff, if there was such, would not bar his recovery unless it directly and proximately contributed to his injury. His contribution to his own injury would not prevent a recovery by him, if there was negligence by the defendant which, when compared with that of the plaintiff, was the proximate cause of his injuries. McNeill v. R. R. Co., 167 N. C. 890, 83 S. E. 704, where the doctrine of proximate cause was fully discussed by Justice Allen. Negligence, which is merely passive, is harmless. It must be active, and efficient, in producing the injury in order to be proximate to it.

[11] Plaintiff was, of course, entitled to recover damages for his automobile if it was proximately injured by the negligence of the defendant, in addition to damages for the injuries to herself.

The court granted all of defendant's requests for instructions to the jury.

We find no error that was committed at the trial.

No error.

STACY, J., having presided at one of the former trials of this case in the superior court, took no part in the present decision.

(182 N. C. 547)

BUTLER v. HOLT-WILLIAMSON MFG. CO. (No. 288.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 418—Denial of motion for nonsuit not available to defendant, who thereafter proceeded to introduce evidence.

Under C. S. \S 567, a defendant, who moved for dismissal as in case of a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's evidence, and who on denial of motion introduced evidence and again moved to dismiss action as in case of nonsuit at the conclusion of all the evidence, cannot complain on appeal of denial of first motion.

2. Trial \S 165—Evidence considered most favorably to plaintiff on motion for nonsuit at close of all the evidence.

On motion to dismiss the action as in case of nonsuit, at the conclusion of all the evidence, all the evidence introduced at the trial will be construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff.

3. False Imprisonment \S 39—Agency of watchman making arrest held for jury.

In an action against manufacturing company for false arrest and imprisonment following plaintiff's arrest by the company's night watchman, who had been sworn in as a special policeman, the question whether the watchman in making arrest was acting in the capacity of special policeman for the city, or in the capacity of night watchman for defendant, held for the jury.

4. Trial \S 255(9)—Failure to charge on defendant's theory that arrest made by employé, was outside of his authority held error.

In action against manufacturing company for false arrest and imprisonment following plaintiff's arrest by defendant's night watchman, who had been sworn in as special policeman while plaintiff was on defendant's premises in which defendant claimed and introduced evidence to show that the watchman's authority was limited to a certain inclosure, and that arrest was not made therein, court's failure to charge jury that defendant was not liable if watchman's authority was limited to inclosure and arrest was made elsewhere held error, notwithstanding defendant's failure to tender a written request for such instruction.

5. False Imprisonment \S 15(3)—Arrest by employé held outside of scope of employment.

Manufacturing concern, which employed night watchman to work inside inclosure and not elsewhere, was not liable for arrest made by watchman a considerable distance away from the inclosure, since such arrest was not made within the scope of the watchman's authority.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by M. F. Butler against the Holt-Williamson Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

It is not necessary to set out all the evidence. So much is stated as is necessary to explain the questions presented.

The plaintiff brought suit to recover damages for false arrest and imprisonment. Evidence for the plaintiff tended to show the facts to be as herein stated. The defendant corporation was engaged in manufacturing cotton cloth in the city of Fayetteville. On August 3, 1920, about sunset, the plaintiff went to Charles Maultsby's store, which was situated near the defendant's mill, to see Maultsby on a matter of business. Soon afterward he started home and followed a footpath which led through a field over defendant's land on which the defendant's operatives lived; but this path did not extend through the inclosed mill property. On the way the plaintiff met Ed Mazingo, the defendant's night watchman, who inquired where the plaintiff was going, and to the plaintiff's answer that he was going to the street replied, "You can go with me." Plaintiff and Mazingo walked to the street and stopped, and Mazingo asked plaintiff whether he knew any one there, and was referred by plaintiff to Cato Salmon. The two thereupon went to the Holt-Morgan Mill and had a conversation with Salmon, in which Mazingo said he had arrested the plaintiff "down the path." A policeman was then called, and the plaintiff and Mazingo went with him in a car to the courthouse, thence to the police station, and the plaintiff was placed in a cell, where he remained about an hour. The plaintiff then gave bond to appear at the trial the next morning, and was released from custody. Upon the hearing the court held the evidence to be insufficient, and the plaintiff was discharged. Mazingo was defendant's night watchman when the arrest was made, and had no warrant; he was not acting as policeman of the city, and was not on the pay roll; but the mayor had sworn him in as special policeman to serve the defendant as night watchman.

Evidence for the defendant tended to show the facts to be as follows: Mazingo had been employed by the defendant as night watchman, and had served in this capacity about four years. There was a wire fence 8 or 10 feet high, inclosing defendant's mill, warehouses, and yard, and it was Mazingo's duty to stay inside this inclosure, to keep watch on the boilers, and to see that no one interfered with any property inside the fence. Mazingo's instructions, given him by the defendant's superintendent, limited his authority to the inclosure, and he exercised no authority, outside the fence, and had not done so during his four years' service. He had been sworn in as a special policeman of the city of Fayetteville, and had a badge which had been given him by the chief of police. The defendant did not request that he be sworn in as a special policeman, and knew nothing about it. Mazingo was instructed by the city authorities to serve anywhere in the city as policeman. He had made arrests in the city off the defendant's property, and in no case had he made an arrest as night watchman. On the night this plaintiff was arrested Mazingo was not acting as night watchman; he was off duty, and John Stevens had taken his place. Mazingo arrested the plaintiff, who was on a cement tile in the weeds near a woman's house, because he had been told by two or three people that a man of suspicious conduct had gone there. At the time of the arrest the plaintiff told him he was trying to ascertain whether Overton was going to see a certain woman who lived near by. After the plaintiff had been taken to police headquarters a warrant was "written out." The issues as to the wrongful arrest and as to compensatory damages were answered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Oates & Herring and Sinclair, Dye & Clark, all of Fayetteville, for appellant.

Bullard & Stringfield and H. L. Brothers, all of Fayetteville, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. [1, 2] First at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and afterward at the conclusion of all the evidence, the defendant made a motion to dismiss the action as in case of nonsuit. Exception was duly entered to the court's denial of each motion. By the express terms of the statute the defendant has the benefit only of the latter exception. C. S. § 567. Riley v. Stone, 169 N. C. 423, 86 W. E. 343. Therefore all the evidence introduced at the trial must be accepted as true and construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Rush v. McPherson, 176 N. C. 562, 97 S. E. 613.

[3] The evidence introduced by the plaintiff tended to show that the mayor of the city of Fayetteville had administered the official oath to Mazingo, who was to serve the defendant, not the city, in the dual capacity of night watchman and special policeman; that on the evening of August 3, 1920, the plaintiff, while on the defendant's premises, was arrested by Mazingo without a warrant, restrained of his liberty in the mill office, carried thence in a car by Mazingo, and a city policeman to police headquarters, and there confined in a cell for the space of one hour; that he was then released from custody, having given bond to appear for trial on the day following; and that upon the hearing he was discharged by the court for want of sufficient evidence. The record does not show definitely that the mayor of the city administered the official oath to Mazingo at the request of the defendant, but it does tend to show that Mazingo had served the defendant as night watchman for a period of four years. There was other evidence tending to corroborate the testimony of the plaintiff concerning the circumstances under which the arrest was made. While we express no opinion as to its weight, we hold that the evidence was sufficient to justify his honor in declining the defendant's motion.

It is not necessary to discuss all the other exceptions entered of record, for the reason that one instruction which his honor gave the jury entitles the defendant to a new trial. In the argument here the defendant emphasized the contention that if Mazingo in fact made the arrest, he did so without the defendant's knowledge or authority, and that there was no evidence of ratification. Whether Mazingo at the time of the arrest was acting in the capacity of special policeman for the city, or in the capacity of night watchman for the defendant, was a question directly relevant to the defendant's contention. If he made the arrest while purporting to act as night watchman, whether he was acting within the scope of his authority likewise became a vital question. The defendant insisted that Mazingo had no authority to perform any duty or to do any act on its behalf outside the wire fence which inclosed the mill, the dyehouse, and the warehouses; and that as the arrest was effected outside this inclosure the defendant was not liable in damages to the plaintiff.

His honor delivered his charge to the jury just before the midday recess, and, upon reconvening the court, recalled the jury, and gave the following additional instructions, which are numbered merely for the purpose of convenient reference:

(1) "I am not sure that I made the statement to you that I intended to make in connection with the rest of my charge, and that was this: That if the arrest was wrongfully made by Mazingo and made about the company's business and within the scope of his employment, and if you are satisfied by the greater weight of the evidence, then you will answer the first issue Yes."

(2) "I intended in that same connection to tell you that, if Mazingo made the arrest as night watchman while in the performance of his duty to the company, and within the scope of his employment, that would be a wrongful arrest, but before you can answer that issue Yes you would have to determine whether he was doing it about the company's business and within the scope of his employment. You will take this in connection with the rest of the charge I gave you.

(3) "In other words, I called you back because I could not remember whether I told you that it would be a wrongful arrest for Mazingo to arrest the plaintiff if he was then acting as night watchman; that would make it wrongful because as night watchman, according to his own contention, or the contention of the defendant, he had no right to make an arrest outside of the mill inclosure. You will take that in connection with the rest of my charge."

To the paragraphs numbered 2 and 3 the defendant excepted.

All the evidence of the defendant directly relevant to the question tended to show that Mazingo was employed to do certain work inside the wire fence and not elsewhere; that he was not engaged to perform any duty for the defendant beyond the defined area; that he had never exercised, or pretended to exercise, any authority on behalf of the defendant outside this inclosure; that he received his instructions from the defendant, and knew the limit of his authority.

In Labatt's Master and Servant, § 2480, it is said:

"The terms upon which a special policeman is appointed are usually such as to limit the exercise of his powers to a certain area. For wrongful arrest made by him at a place which was clearly outside that area, in respect of an offense previously committed, the party at whose request he was appointed cannot be held liable, even though the act was of such a description that, if the element of locality were abstracted, the aggrieved party would have been entitled to recover."

And in Wood's Law of Master and Servant:

"The question usually presented is whether as a matter of fact or of law the injury was received under such circumstances that under the employment the master can be said to have authorized the act, for if he did not, either in fact or in law, he cannot be made chargeable for its consequences, because, not having been done under authority from him, express or implied, it can, in no sense, be said to be his act." Sec. 279.

The question is discussed by Justice Walker in Daniel v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 816, 67 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 718, in which are cited a number of the leading decisions. Upon a review of these authorities his conclusion is this:

"It may then be gathered from the books as a general rule, which is clearly applicable to the facts of this case, that if the servant, instead of doing that which he is employed to do, does something else which he is not employed to do at all, the master cannot be said to do it by his servant, and therefore is not responsible for what he does. It is not sufficient that the act showed that he did it with the intent to benefit or to serve the master. It must be something done in attempting to do what the master has employed the servant to do. Mitchell v. Crasweller, 76 E. C. L. 246; Limpus v. L. G. O. Co., 32 L. J. (Exch.) 34. Nor does the question of liability depend on the quality of the act but rather upon the other question, whether it has been performed in the line of duty and within the scope of the authority conferred by the master. The facts of this case do not bring it within the principle."

Mazingo testified that he was employed to serve as night watchman in the inclosure, to stay within it, to "look out for the boilers," and to see that no one interfered with any of the inclosed property. His testimony was corroborated by that of the defendant's superintendent.

The arrest was made on a remote part of the defendant's property outside the inclosure. If, then, the jury should find the facts to be as contended by the defendant, it is obvious that Mazingo was not acting within the scope of his authority when he made the arrest.

In paragraph 3 of the instructions referred to his honor expressly told the jury that the arrest was wrongful if made by Mazingo as night watchman, and at the same time permitted the jury, in response to the instruction in paragraph 2, to pass upon the question whether Mazingo as night watchman was acting within the scope of his authority, without applying the instruction to the defendant's version of the evidence.

[4, 5] Without having tendered a written request, the defendant was entitled to the further instruction that if the jury should find from the evidence that Mazingo was employed to do certain work inside the inclosure and not elsewhere, as contended by the defendant, and, laying aside this work, he went outside the inclosure and made the arrest a considerable distance away, particularly at the instance of Royall or Brock, they should answer the issue in the negative, because in that event he would not be acting within the scope of his authority.

In Real Estate Co. v. Moser, 175 N. C. 259, 95 S. E. 449, it is said:

"The instruction given is correct as far as it goes, but the judge failed to state the defendant's contention and to instruct [the jury] that the defendant had a right to withdraw his proposition under certain conditions, and what those conditions were. Even without a specific instruction, it was incumbent upon the judge to do this. For when the judge assumes to charge, and correctly charges, the law upon one phase of the evidence, the charge is incomplete unless it embraces the law as applicable to the respective contentions of each party, and such failure is reversible error." Jarrett v. High Point Co., 144 N. C. 299, 56 S. E. 937; Lea v. Utilities Co., 176 N. C. 514, 97 S. E. 492.

His honor's omission to instruct the jury more definitely upon the law and the evidence relative to the scope of Mazingo's authority was evidently prejudicial, and entitles the defendant to a new trial.

New trial.

J. A. FAY & EGAN CO. v. CROWELL.
(No. 415.)

1. Sales \S 288(2)—Buyer's retention of goods beyond specified period held waiver of breach of warranty.

Where contract for purchase of machinery provided that a retention of the machinery after 30 days from its arrival at destination should constitute a trial and acceptance, and be a conclusive admission of the truth of all representations made by or for the seller and a fulfillment of all its contracts of warranty, express or implied, buyer, having retained machinery for more than such a period without offering to return it, could not avoid payment of purchase-money note on ground that there was a breach of warranty, though during such period he complained of defects therein.

2. Sales \S 288(2)—Buyer cannot complain of breach of warranty without offering to return property within time fixed therefor by contract.

Where contract requires buyer to return property within a specified time if not as represented, and there is no fraud or waiver of the condition, the buyer is not entitled to redress for breach of warranty, without first offering to return property within specified period, whether the goods delivered are different from and inferior to those sold, or whether the property, though corresponding in description with the article purchased, is defective or wanting in quality.

Walker, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanley County; Ray, Judge.

Action by the J. A. Fay & Egan Company against G. Edward Crowell. From a judgment giving it insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. New trial.

Civil action to recover balance due on 10 promissory notes executed by the defendant and delivered to the plaintiff for a certain quantity of mill machinery. Defendant denied full liability, and alleged that said notes "would have been paid in full, if the plaintiff had given defendant proper adjustment and offsets on the machine No. 257, known as the resaw, on account of the defects in said machine as hereinbefore fully set out." Defendant also alleged that the machinery shipped was different from, and less valuable than, that which he had ordered, and that the same was defective in certain particulars; said defects being set up and pleaded by way of counterclaim.

Upon issues submitted, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) In what sum, if any, is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff? Ans. $1,010.00, with interest on same from February 8, 1919.

"(2) Did the plaintiff ship the defendant a different brand resaw machine from that ordered under the contract of January 23, 1919? Ans. Yes.

"(3) What difference in value, if any, was there in the machine shipped by the plaintiff and the one contracted for by the defendant? Ans. $250.00.

"(4) What damage, if any, is defendant entitled to recover on the counterclaim? Ans. $150.00."

From a judgment reducing the amount of plaintiff's recovery in accordance with the jury's answer to the third and fourth issues, the plaintiff appealed.

Sinclair, Dye & Clark, of Fayetteville, for appellant.

R. L. Smith & Son, of Albemarle, for appellee.

STACY, J. On January, 23, 1919, the plaintiff, through its agent, sold to the defendant a certain quantity of mill machinery, guaranteeing the same in every respect, and in payment therefor it was agreed that the plaintiff would accept in exchange the defendant's secondhand machine as part payment, $525 in cash, and his promissory notes for the balance. The contract was in writing and contained the following stipulation:

"That in case of rejection the undersigned will promptly deliver it [the machinery] to consignor, f. o. b. Cincinnati, Ohio; that this contract is not modified or added to by any agreement not expressly stated herein, and that a retention of the property forwarded, after 30 days from its arrival at destination, shall constitute a trial and acceptance, be a conclusive admission of the truth of all representations made by or for the consignor, and a fulfillment of all its contracts of warranty, express or implied."

Within 30 days after the receipt of said machinery, the defendant notified plaintiff's agent by wire that the same was not satisfactory and asked him to "come to Oakboro at once in regard to resaw." The agent did not come, but immediately called over the telephone, and, in answer to plaintiff's inquiry about a missing handwheel, stated that this was not necessary, as the machine was equipped with a "lever shift." Defendant further testified:

"Later on in the year Mr. Whitlock [plaintiff's agent] came up. I told him about it, and showed him the machine, and told him the defect, and he said he would have it adjusted. He never said a word about it not being the machine he sold. I told him it was not the machine, and he said they would have it fixed. I never had any other negotiations with them. Never heard anything, nor they didn't fix it. I had no more negotiations with the company in regard to the machine after that; it just rocked along. I was waiting on them."

The defendant continued to use the machine, and still has it in his possession. There is no contention about the balance of the machinery. The "resaw" alone is in controversy. After the property had been used for several months, the defendant made a further payment of $50 on one of the notes, and he says the payments already made are sufficient to cover the value of the machinery, not including the resaw.

[1] The agreement between the parties to this suit, in regard to the subject-matter of the action, is in writing. It is clear and free from any ambiguity. Hence both sides must stand or fall by the terms of the written instrument—there being no claim or suggestion that the contract was entered into as a result of any fraud, accident, or mistake. Harvester Co. v. Carter, 173 N. C. 229, 91 S. E. 840; Machine Co. v. McClamrock, 152 N. C. 405, 67 S. E. 991. In some of the cases and by a number of writers, it has been styled a "contract of sale and return" (Walsh Mfg. Co. v. Lumber Co., 159 N. C. 507, 75 S. E. 718), because it is stipulated as a part of the warranty that the goods shall be promptly returned if not as represented. It is further specified that a retention of the property for more than 30 days after its arrival at destination shall constitute an absolute acceptance, etc. This may not have been a very wise provision; but the parties have so contracted, and it is but meet that they should abide by whatever obligations they have voluntarily assumed. Burch v. Bush, 181 N. C. 125, 106 S. E. 489. This is the law of contracts fairly and freely made. Clancy v. Overman, 18 N. C. 402; Bland v. Harvester Co., 169 N. C. 418, 86 S. E. 350; Guano Co. v. Livestock Co., 168 N. C. 447, 84 S. E. 774, L. R. A. 1915D, 875, and cases there cited. Any other rule would render all business transactions relating to sales of personal property unsafe, and subject vendors to many hazards and possibly grievous burdens. Parker v. Fenwick, 138 N. C. 209, 50 S. E. 627. The retention by the defendant of the property during the time referred to in the above stipulation amounted to an admission that the representations made by or for the plaintiff were true and avoided all warranties. Fay & Egan Co. v. Dudley, 129 Ga. 314, 58 S. E. 828 (which, by the way, is a case on all fours with the one at bar and involving the identical contract now before us).

[2] It has been the settled holding with us, in a long line of decisions, that where there is an express warranty in the sale of personal property, and it is stipulated as a condition of the contract of sale that the property is to be returned within a specified time, if not as represented, the complaining party is entitled to no redress by reason of a breach of the warranty, in the absence of fraud or a waiver of the condition, without first offering to return the property within the time fixed by the contract. Robinson v. Huffstetler, 165 N. C. 459, 81 S. E. 753, and cases there cited. See, also, 35 Cyc. 437. In the absence of fraud, this rule applies equally to a case where the goods delivered are different from, and inferior to, those sold, as where the property, though corresponding in description with the article purchased, is defective or wanting in quality. If the vendor tender goods of less value than those purchased, the vendee is not bound to accept them. But if he does accept them, under the terms of his agreement, he is deemed to assent to a fulfillment of the contract on the part of the vendor. Pierson v. Crooks, 115 N. Y. 539, 22 N. E. 349, 12 Am. St. Rep. 831. And in the instant case such acceptance and retention afford a "conclusive admission of the truth of all representations made by or for the consignor, and a fulfillment of all its contracts of warranty express or implied." See, also, Farquhar Co. v. Hardy Hardware Co., 174 N. C. 369, 93 S. E. 922, and Ward v. Liddell Co., 108 S. E. 634, at the present term, and cases there cited. The Supreme Court of Utah, in a comparatively recent case, states the law with clearness as follows:

"The rule . . . is . . . well established that, when the quality of an article sold is guaranteed by warranty, one of the conditions of which being that, in case of a defect being discovered, the seller shall be liable only on condition of the production or return of the defective article, such condition is a condition precedent, and must be complied with, or there can be no recovery. [Citing authorities.] The rule deduced from the authorities is that, when the parties have not stipulated as to the course which shall be taken in case of a failure of the warranty, the vendee has his election either to sue on the warranty or to rescind the contract by returning the property and bringing an action for the money received by the seller. But it is competent, however, for the parties to provide by contract that a particular course shall be pursued on a failure of the warranty." Wasatch Orchard Co. v. Morgan Canning Co., 32 Utah, 229, 89 Pac. 1009, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 540.

See, also, Frick Co. v. Boles, 168 N. C. 654, 84 S. E. 1017, and cases there cited.

In the light of the foregoing authorities, and upon the record, we think his honor should have directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the balance due on the unpaid notes.

WHITE v. CAROLINA REALTY CO.
(No. 445.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations §705(1)—Concurring negligence of automobile driver no defense in action for injuries to passenger.

In an action for injuries to an automobile passenger in a collision with defendant's truck, the automobile driver's concurring negligence was no defense, if defendant's negligence was also one of the proximate causes of the injury.

2. Negligence §15—Both joint wrongdoers liable for whole damage.

Where the negligence of two persons proximately contributed to the injury of third person not contributorily negligent, both are liable for the whole damage.

3. Contribution §5—None among joint tortfeasors.

There is no contribution among joint tortfeasors.

4. Negligence §93(1)—Automobile driver's negligence not imputable to passenger.

The negligence of the driver of an automobile will not be imputed to a passenger not the owner of the car and exercising no control or authority over the driver.

5. Trial §296(3)—Instruction not requiring negligence to have been proximate cause not erroneous in view of other instructions.

In action for injuries to occupant of automobile sustained in collision with defendant's truck, instruction making defendant liable if it was negligent, without requiring such negligence to have proximately caused injury, held not erroneous, where other instructions, including that immediately following, required the negligence to have proximately contributed to injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Harding, Judge.

Action by W. L. White against the Carolina Realty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged negligent injury to plaintiff in a collision between a Ford automobile, in which the plaintiff was a passenger, and a truck belonging to the defendant.

Upon denial of liability and issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the plaintiff's injury caused by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.

"(2) What damages, if anything, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? A. $2,500."

Clarkson, Talliaferro & Clarkson, of Charlotte, for appellant.

F. M. Redd and D. E. Henderson, both of Charlotte, for appellee.

STACY, J. This is an action brought by W. L. White to recover damages for an alleged negligent injury caused by a collision between a Ford automobile, in which the plaintiff was riding as a passenger, and the defendant's truck, said collision occurring on West Trade street in the city of Charlotte at an early morning hour on September 23, 1920.

There was evidence tending to show that the defendant's truck was standing at the intersection of Linden avenue and West Trade street in a manner violative of a traffic ordinance of the city, when the Ford automobile owned and driven by one E. H. McQuay, and in which the plaintiff was riding as a passenger, ran into and collided with the defendant's truck, causing serious and permanent injuries to the plaintiff. The accident occurred about 7:30 a. m. during a heavy equinoctial storm, when the fog, rain, and wind made it difficult for the occupants of the car to see very far ahead.

The evidence was conflicting as to the exact position of the truck at the time of the injury and as to whether the defendant's driver had violated any of the traffic ordinances of the city of Charlotte; but, under his honor's charge, the jury have found these matters in accordance with the plaintiff's contention.

From all the evidence it clearly appeared that the plaintiff was a passenger in McQuay's car and exercised no authority or control over its management and had nothing to do with the manner in which it was driven.

Upon these, the facts chiefly relevant, we think the defendant's motion for judgment as of nonsuit was properly overruled.

[1-3] Conceding that McQuay, the owner and driver of the Ford machine, was negligent, as it is quite apparent from the evidence he was, yet this would not shield the defendant from suit if its negligence was also one of the proximate causes of the plaintiff's injury. Crampton v. Ivie, 126 N. C. 891, 36 S. E. 351. There may be two or more proximate causes of an injury; and where this condition exists, and the party injured is free from fault, those responsible for the causes must answer in damages, each being liable for the whole damage, instead of permitting the negligence of the one to exonerate the others. This would be so though the negligence of all concurred and contributed to the injury, because with us there is no contribution among joint tort-feasors. Wood v. Public Service Corp., 174 N. C. 697, 94 S. E. 459, 1 A. L. R. 942.

In Harton v. Tel. Co., 141 N. C. 455, 54 S. E. 209, the following statement of the law is quoted with approval:

"To show that other causes concurred in producing or contributing to the result complained of is no defense to an action of negligence. There is indeed no rule better settled in this present connection than that the defendant's negligence, in order to render him liable, need not be the sole cause of plaintiff's injuries. * * * When two efficient proximate causes contribute to an injury, if defendant's negligent act brought about one of such causes, he is liable."

See, also, 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 495, and note.

His honor correctly charged the jury that, if the negligence of McQuay, the owner and driver of the Ford car, was the sole and only proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, the defendant would not be liable; for, in that event, the defendant's negligence would not have been one of the proximate causes of the plaintiff's injury. Bagwell v. Railroad, 167 N. C. 615, 83 S. E. 814. But if any degree, however small, of the causal negligence, or that without which the injury would not have occurred, be attributable to the defendant, then the plaintiff, in the absence of any contributory negligence on his part, would be entitled to recover, because the defendant cannot be excused from liability unless the total causal negligence or proximate cause be attributable to another or others.

"When two efficient proximate causes contribute to an injury, if defendant's negligent act brought about one of such causes, he is liable." Wood v. Public Service Corporation, supra, and cases there cited.

[4] There is no contention that the negligence of McQuay, the driver of the Ford car, is in any way imputable to the plaintiff, who at the time occupied the position of a passenger in said car. In a number of cases it is stated, as a general rule, that the negligence of the driver of an automobile will not be imputed to one who is a passenger therein, unless such passenger be the owner of the car, or unless he exercise some kind of control or authority over the driver. This position has been approved by us in a number of decisions and is undoubtedly the prevailing view. Pusey v. Railroad, 181 N. C. 137, 106 S. E. 452, and cases there cited; 2 R. C. L. 1207.

[5] The defendant relies upon its exception to the following portion of his honor's charge:

"If the plaintiff has satisfied you by the greater weight of the evidence that the defendant was negligent, as I have attempted to apply the rules of law, as the court observes it from the evidence in this case, you will answer the first issue 'Yes.'"

This excerpt, standing alone, might appear to be erroneous, but in the very next sentence his honor continued:

"If the plaintiff has failed to satisfy you that the defendant was negligent, or that, if he was negligent, that it was not a proximate cause of the injury, then you would answer the first issue 'No.'"

In other portions of the charge the court correctly stated the law as bearing upon this point; and when we consider the charge as a whole, as we are required to do, it is clear that the jury could not have been misled by this slight inadvertence. Besides, it was immediately corrected in the following sentence; and this shows the necessity of examining the charge, not disconnectedly, but as a whole, or at least the whole of what was said regarding any one phase of the case, or law bearing thereon. Moore v. Lbr. Co., 175 N. C. 205, 95 S. E. 175.

No sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict and judgment having been shown, the exceptions must be overruled; and it is so ordered.

No error.

(182 N. C. 559)

JORDAN et al. v. INTERURBAN MOTOR LINES, Inc., et al. (No. 474.)

*(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Trial \S 60(1)—Evidence as to injury properly admitted where there was other evidence that it was caused by accident.

In an action for injuries sustained in an automobile collision, a doctor's testimony as to the condition of plaintiff's ribs, which he testified had been concaved by a blow received in the accident, was properly admitted, where there was other evidence that the condition was caused by the accident.

2. Witnesses \S 287(4)—Redirect examination as to matter inquired about on cross-examination held proper.

In an action for injuries, where defendant, to show that plaintiff's health had previously been in a frail condition, cross-examined her husband as to whether she had ever fainted, he was properly permitted, on redirect examination, to state the circumstances under which she had the prior fainting spell shown.

3. Appeal and error \S 1053(3)—Examination of defendant sued for injuries as to receipts of business not prejudicial.

In an action against the owners of a jitney bus for the negligence of its driver, examination of one of the defendants as to dividends from the business was harmless, where the charge stated what plaintiff must show in order to recover, and what special damages she could recover, and did not allow the use of such testimony nor permit a recovery of punitive damages, especially where such defendant's answer was that he had received no dividends since he sold out.

4. Appeal and error \S 1064(1)—Court's reference to fact that driver of jitney was without license held harmless.

In an action for injuries sustained in a collision with a jitney bus, the court's reference in the charge to the fact that the driver was without a license was harmless, where it was merely stating the allegations of the complaint, and the charge allowed no recovery on this account, but based plaintiff's right to recover solely on the negligence of the driver.

5. Highways \S 184(4)—Misstatement of statute held not misleading.

In an action for injuries sustained in an automobile collision, an instruction that the statute prohibited the operation of a motor vehicle on the highways recklessly, etc., and provided that certain rates of speed "shall be a violation of this section," was not misleading because of the omission of the word "deemed" after the words "shall be," as in the statute.

6. Appeal and error \S 215(2)—Judge's attention should have been called to misstatement of contentions.

If the judge in his charge in stating the contentions of the parties did not state them correctly, his attention should have been called to it at the proper time so that he could make the necessary correction.

7. Master and servant \S 304—Owners of jitney bus liable for driver's negligence.

The owners of a jitney bus are liable for an injury caused by the driver acting within the scope of his employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Randolph County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by Minnie Jordan and husband against the Interurban Motor Lines, Incorporated, and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The witness Kirkman testified that he owned the jitney line, or practically all of it, before the accident, and that since the accident he had sold a one-half interest therein. He was then asked what dividends had been declared "since then," and answered that he had not received any dividend, since he sold out.

The court charged, in part, as follows:

The plaintiff alleges that the Interurban Motor Lines Company operated a jitney between High Point and Greensboro, and that the driver of the jitney was the agent of the Interurban Motor Line Company, and that he was operating without license; and under the ordinances of the city of High Point he was required to have a license before he was permitted to drive ——. It was admitted that the defendant, the Interurban Motor Line, Inc., is the owner of the jitney, which is a corporation that was operating a line of jitneys between High Point and Greensboro, and that Earle Murphy was the driver of the jitney on the occasion in question. The law is that the principal is liable for the negligence of its agents, when they neglect their duties, and it is admitted that on the occasion in question Earle Murphy was driving the jitney when it collided with the Ford car, and it is further admitted that he was driving as the agent of the defendant, and therefore, if the plaintiff has shown by the greater weight of the testimony that Earle Murphy was negligent, then the court instructs you that his negligence was the negligence of the motor line.

(To the foregoing charge the defendant excepted.)

The statute provides that, in the first place, no person shall operate a motor vehicle upon the public highways of this state recklessly or at a greater rate of speed than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the width, traffic, and use of the highway, or so as to endanger the property or the life or limb of any person; provided, that a rate of speed in excess of 18 miles per hour in the resident portion of any city, town, or village, and a rate of speed in excess of 10 miles per hour in the business portion of any city, town, or village, and a rate of speed in excess of 25 miles per hour on any public highway outside of the corporate limits of any incorporated city or town, shall be a violation of this section.

This statute does not permit a man to run 25 miles per hour outside of the city except under certain conditions, neither does it authorize him to run at the rate of 18 miles per hour in the resident portion of the city, or 10 miles per hour in the business portion of the city, except under certain conditions. The rate of speed must at all times be reasonable and proper, with due regard for the width, traffic, and use of the highway, and must not be such as to endanger the property, life, or limb of any person. If any person operates a motor vehicle upon the public highways of the city recklessly, it does not make any difference whether he is running five or 25 miles per hour or more; it is a violation of this act.

(To the foregoing part of the charge the defendant excepts.)

It is further contended by the plaintiff that the driver of this jitney was required, under the ordinances of the city of High Point, to have a license, and that he did not have a license, and it is admitted by the said Earle Murphy that he did not have any license. The court instructs you that it was the duty of Earle Murphy to use the same care a person of ordinary prudence would have exercised under the circumstances. If you should find that the plaintiff was injured as alleged and that Murphy was negligent as alleged, and that said negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, you will answer the first issue yes.

(To the foregoing charge the defendant excepted.)

This is a civil action brought to recover damages for personal injuries of the feme plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by a collision of her automobile and that of the defendants, which was driven by Earle Murphy, commonly known as Clyde Murphy; the collision being due to the negligence of the said Murphy in driving the defendants' automobile on the road from High Point to Greensboro. As Murphy, who was driving what is known as a jitney bus, was attempting to pass a Buick automobile, which was standing on the right-hand side of the road, he met the car in which the feme plaintiff was riding, and the two cars collided and threw the plaintiff into the windshield of her car and thence upon the ground several feet away, causing her serious and painful injury; that the plaintiff's car gave the driver of the jitney bus sufficient space to pass the two other cars in safety, but by careless and even reckless management of Murphy's car, by him, the accident occurred.

J. A. Spence, of Ashboro, for appellants.

Walter Royal, of High Point, and Hammer & Moser, of Ashboro, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). First. There was evidence tending to sustain the cause of action, as alleged in the complaint.

[1] The first objection of the defendant is that the court permitted Dr. Jackson, an expert witness, to testify as to the condition of two of the feme plaintiff's ribs, which he said had been concaved by the blow she received in the accident. The feme plaintiff testified that she was sore on that side of her body, and, upon examination, the doctor discovered that the ribs were in a concaved condition. The defendant complains that the plaintiff had not first proven that this condition was caused by the accident; but there was ample evidence of this fact, and the testimony of the doctor was therefore competent to show what her physical condition was. There is no merit in this exception.

[2] Second. The defendant cross-examined the husband of the feme plaintiff, who was her witness, and he testified that his wife had fainted once before, and, in order to show what was the cause of her fainting, on redirect examination, the witness was permitted to state the circumstances under which she had the "fainting spell," and we do not see why this was not competent, as the evidence on cross-examination was offered to show that her health had previously been in a frail condition before she received the injuries and the redirect testimony was in explanation of it. State v. Orrell, 75 N. C. 317; 2 Elliott on Evidence, p. 195; Smith v. Ry. Co., 147 N. C. 603, 61 S. E. 575; State v. Allen, 107 N. C. 805, 11 S. E. 1018.

[3] Third. The testimony of Mr. Kirkman, one of the defendants and the owner of the bus, as to the dividends received from his business, was not sufficiently harmful to be noticed, if it was at all prejudicial. The judge absolutely stated what plaintiff must show in order to recover any damages and then what special damages she could recover, and the jury were restricted in this way and were not allowed to use the question addressed to Mr. Kirkman as to the profits of his business. There was evidence of recklessness of the driver, and perhaps of wantonness; but his honor did not permit a recovery of punitive or exemplary damages, and, even if the court erred in permitting Mr. Kirkman to refer to the dividends of the business, it was surely harmless in view of the strict charge of the judge. But a conclusive answer to this objection is that Mr. Kirkman stated that he had received no dividends since he sold out, and that was in direct response to the question as it was formulated by defendants' counsel, so that there was really no evidence upon the question one way or another, and in this respect it was perfectly harmless.

[4] Fourth. The reference by the court to the fact that Earle (or Clyde) Murphy was driving the jitney without license from the city of High Point was manifestly innocuous, because the plaintiffs were not allowed, under his honor's charge, to recover anything on that account, or for that reason, but another, and more decisive answer to the objection is that the judge was merely stating the allegations of the complaint, or the contentions of the plaintiffs, and in his charge upon the law he gave no heed to this allegation, but based the right of plaintiffs to recover solely upon the negligence of the driver of the jitney bus, and stated the law correctly in this respect, and the jury could not have acted upon any other ground without disregarding the instructions of the court, and this is not to be presumed.

We recently considered the statute in regard to the speed of automobiles on the public highways of the state and on the streets of cities and towns, in the case of State v. Mills, 181 N. C. 530, 106 S. E. 677, and the court charged the jury in this case according to the principles therein stated.

[5] Fifth. The exception in regard to the substitution of the words "deemed a violation of the statute" for the words "shall be a violation of this section" is without any substantial merit. The jury could not possibly have been misled by the judge's discussion of the statute and his statement of what would be considered as negligence if the requirements of the statute were not observed. There certainly was nothing prejudicial in this part of the charge.

The other exceptions are formal, and need not be considered, except one of them.

If the plaintiffs' evidence in this case should be accepted as true, which was a question for the jury, there was negligence on the part of the driver of the jitney bus, as the plaintiff gave him sufficient space within which he could safely pass, by the exercise of ordinary care, both the other automobiles; that is, the Buick automobile, which was standing on one side of the road, and the plaintiff's automobile, which had been placed out of his way on the other side, and even off the paved portion of the road.

[6] The sixth assignment of error was taken to the part of the charge of the court in which the judge was stating the contentions of the parties, and, if he did not state them correctly, his attention should have been called to it at the proper time, so that he could make the necessary correction. McMahan v. Spruce Co., 180 N. C. 636, 105 S. E. 439; Spears v. Power Co., 181 N. C. 447, 107 S. E. 442.

[7] The driver of the jitney bus was the agent of the defendants, and they were liable, as principal, for what he did which caused the injury to the plaintiff, under the familiar maxim that what one does by another he does by himself, which is but one way of stating the rule that the principal is liable for the acts of his agent if committed within the scope of his authority and when he is about his principal's business. Jackson v. Tele. Co., 139 N. C. 353, 51 S. E. 1015, 70 L. R. A. 738; Fleming v. Knitting Mills, 161 N. C. 439, 77 S. E. 309; and Rivenbark v. Hines, 180 N. C. 242, 104 S. E. 524.

Upon review of the whole case, we are satisfied that no error has been committed, and we therefore affirm the judgment.

No error.

(182 N. C. 553)

GROVES et al. v. WARE et al. (No. 451.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Insane persons \S 95—Lack of personal service of summons held mere irregularity to be corrected by motion.

The requirement of C. S. \S 451, that a defendant who is non compos mentis defend by his general or testamentary guardian and, if he have none, that he be served with summons, whereupon the court may appoint a guardian ad litem to defend in his behalf, should be strictly observed; but, a guardian ad litem having been appointed, accepted service, and presumably performed his statutory duties, a failure to serve summons on such defendant personally is only an irregularity to be corrected, if at all, by motion.

2. Insane persons \S 100—Judgment not set aside merely because of lack of personal service of summons.

A judgment against an insane person, who was defended by a guardian ad litem will not be set aside for failure to serve summons on him personally.

3. Insane persons \S 2—Certificate of superintendent of private sanatorium insufficient to authorize appointment of guardian.

Under C. S. \S 2286, declaring the certificate of the superintendent of a governmental asylum for insane sufficient evidence to authorize the clerk of the superior court to appoint a guardian, a certificate of the superintendent of a private sanatorium for the insane did not authorize such appointment.

4. Constitutional law \S 313—Act authorizing restoration to sanity on inquiry by jury of six held not in violation of due process clause.

C. S. \S 2287, authorizing the restoration of an insane person to sound mind and memory, with power to make contracts and sell his property, on inquiry by a jury of six, is not unconstitutional as depriving a person of his property without due process of law; such prohibition not necessarily implying that all trials shall be by a jury of 12.

5. Jury \S 32(2)—Statute providing for sanity inquiry by jury of six held not unconstitutional.

C. S. \S 2287, authorizing an inquiry into the sanity of an insane person by a jury of six, and providing that if the jury find him to be sane he may make contracts and sell his property, is not in violation of Const. art. 1, \S 19, guaranteeing the right to trial by a jury of 12, for such right applies only to cases in which the prerogative existed at common law or was procured by statute when the Constitution was adopted, and not to those where the right and remedy are thereafter created by statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gaston County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by H. H. Groves and others against J. White Ware and others. From a judgment

overruling defendants' demurrer to the complaint, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The following is a concise statement of the plaintiffs' allegations: L. F. Groves died leaving a last will and testament, in which he named as devisees his widow, Sarah E. Groves, and his sons, H. H. Groves, L. C. Groves, E. E. Groves, and Forest M. Groves. H. H. Groves and L. C. Groves duly qualified as administrators with the will annexed of the estate of said L. F. Groves, and thereafter entered upon the discharge of their duties as such administrators. Forest M. Groves had been, and at that time was, confined in the Westbrook Sanatorium in or near the city of Richmond, in the state of Virginia, which is a private sanatorium for the treatment of insane persons and others suffering from nervous and mental disorder. After said administrators had qualified, Dr. James K. Hall, who was in charge of said sanatorium, certified that Forest M. Groves was of insane mind and memory, not capable of managing his financial affairs, and that the said Groves was confined in said sanatorium. Thereafter application was made to the clerk of the superior court of Gaston for the appointment of a guardian for Forest M. Groves, on the ground that said Groves was insane, and the clerk, after notice to said Groves, issued letters of guardianship to E. E. Groves, who took the required oath and qualified as the guardian of said Forest M. Groves. After said E. E. Groves had been appointed guardian, a special proceeding was instituted before the clerk by Sarah E. Groves, widow, against H. H. Groves, L. C. Groves, E. E. Groves, and E. E. Groves, as guardian of Forest M. Groves, for the allotment of the widow's dower in the real estate of her deceased husband, and upon report of the jury allotting dower, said report was confirmed by said clerk. Subsequent thereto an ex parte proceeding was instituted by H. H. Groves, L. C. Groves, E. E. Groves, and Forest M. Groves, by his guardian, for the partition of the real estate claimed by said devisees as tenants in common, and upon the report of commissioners appointed for the purpose of making such partition, a decree was entered by said clerk confirming the report of said commissioners, and the land was accordingly partitioned among said tenants. After this partition was made, H. H. Groves and his wife conveyed the land or a part of the land allotted to H. H. Groves to the defendants J. White Ware, J. E. Simpson, and J. A. Estridge, at the purchase price of $26,000, which was secured by a deed of trust. J. E. Simpson paid as a part of the purchase price $8,666.67, and the defendants Ware and Estridge refused to complete their payments on the ground that said land had not been legally partitioned, in that E. E. Groves had not been legally appointed guardian for said Forest M. Groves, and that Forest M. Groves had not been personally served with summons. A petition was filed by E. E. Groves for the purpose of having said Forest M. Groves declared sane, and afterward a jury was summoned to inquire into the sanity of said Forest M. Groves, who after investigation, made report that Forest M. Groves was no longer insane, but was of sound mind and memory, and capable of managing his own affairs. Thereafter on the 8th day of April, 1921, the clerk of the superior court made an order confirming the report of said jury. After this order of the clerk had been made, Forest M. Groves tendered to Sarah E. Groves a quitclaim deed for all his right, title, and interest in and to the land allotted her as dower, reserving his rights as remainderman in the same, and tendered also a quitclaim deed to the defendants Ware, Simpson, and Estridge for the lands conveyed to them by H. H. Groves and wife, and in addition a quitclaim deed to L. C. Groves and E. E. Groves for the land allotted to them. The widow and the tenants in common have tendered quitclaim deeds to each other, mutually releasing to each other the interest which each tenant had in the land allotted to the other tenants. H. H. Groves indorsed to the Groves Mill Company, Inc., of Gastonia, the note executed as evidence of the purchase price of the land sold by him to the defendants Ware, Estridge, and Simpson.

The defendants filed a formal demurrer to the complaint, which is as follows:

"The defendants demur to the complaint herein on the grounds that the same does not state a cause of action, particularly in that the said Forest M. Groves was not legally served with summons nor legally brought into court, and that the proceedings for his restoration to a normal and mental condition are not legal, and that the said H. H. Groves and wife cannot deliver to the defendants Ware, Estridge, and Simpson a good, legal, and indefeasible title to the lands which were conveyed by the said H. H. Groves and wife to the said Ware, Estridge, and Simpson, and that the said H. H. Groves has no legal right to collect the purchase money therefor."

Judge Thomas J. Shaw heard the argument at chambers in the city of Charlotte on November 7, 1921, and rendered judgment overruling the demurrer. The defendants excepted and appealed to the Supreme Court.

J. W. Timberlake, of Gastonia, for appellants Ware, Estridge, and Simpson.

Mangum & Denny, of Gastonia, for appellee. Clarence M. Austin, of Gastonia, for Forest M. Groves.

ADAMS, J. The legal propositions upon which the demurrer is based are these: (1)

Forest M. Groves was not personally served with summons; (2) the pretended appointment of his guardian is void; (3) C. S. § 2287, is unconstitutional. We shall consider the propositions seriatim.

[1] Section 451 of Consolidated Statutes provides that if any defendant in an action or special proceeding is non compos mentis, he must defend by his general or testamentary guardian, and if he shall have no general or testamentary guardian, and shall have been served with summons, the court may appoint a guardian ad litem to defend in his behalf. The requirement of the statute as to the service of a summons on a person who is non compos should be strictly observed; but the question here presented concerns the legal effect of a failure to make such service. The guardian ad litem accepted service and presumably performed his statutory duties. In Matthews v. Joyce, 85 N. C. 258, Chief Justice Smith said:

"While according to recent decisions jurisdiction over the person of infants is acquired only as in the other cases by the service of process on them, and then it is competent to appoint, in case there is no general guardian, a guardian ad litem, to act in their behalf and to protect their interests, so as to bind them by judicial action, a different practice has long and almost universally prevailed in this state, and this power of appointment has been generally exercised without the issue of process, for the reason that no practical benefit would result to the infant from such service on him, and the court always assumed to protect the interests of such party, and to this end committed them to the defense of this special guardian."

[2] Practically to the same effect is the language of Justice Hoke in Rawls v. Henries, 172 N. C. 218, 90 S. E. 140:

"The facts in evidence strongly tend to show that the proceedings were in all respects regular and that defendant's title has never been open to question; but were it otherwise, and by reason of the fact that summons was not personally served on the minor, our authorities are very uniformly to the effect that the interest of the minor having been presented and an answer having been filed by his general guardian or guardian ad litem, the failure to serve on the minor personally was only an irregularity, to be corrected, if at all, by motion in the cause. Harris v. Bennett, 160 N. C. 339; Glisson v. Glisson, 153 N. C. 185; Rackley v. Roberts, 147 N. C. 201; Carraway v. Lassater, 139 N. C. 145; Carter v. Rountree, 109 N. C. 29; Matthews v. Joyce, 85 N. C. 258. And these authorities are to the effect that, even when properly applied for, an irregular judgment is not to be set aside as a conclusion of law because of the irregularity, but only on a show of merits and when the complaining party has proceeded with proper diligence."

[3] It is insisted in the next place that the clerk's order appointing a guardian for Forest M. Groves is void, because the clerk had no legal right to make such appointment upon the certificate of Dr. Hall. Consolidated Statutes, § 2286, is as follows:

"If any person is confined in any hospital for insane persons, in any state, territorial or governmental asylum or hospital, in this state or any other state or territory, or in the District of Columbia, the certificate of the superintendent of such hospital declaring such person to be of insane mind and memory, which certificate shall be sworn to and subscribed before the clerk of the superior court or any notary public, or the clerk of any court of record of the county in which such hospital is situated, and certified under the seal of court, shall be sufficient evidence to authorize the clerk to appoint a guardian for such idiot, lunatic, or insane person."

It was evidently intended by the General Assembly that the certificate of insanity should be received and accepted as evidence only when made by the superintendent of a hospital which is subject to state, territorial, or governmental control, and not when made by the manager or superintendent of a private institution, who occupies no public official position and is not directly subject to governmental supervision. The complaint alleges that Westbrook Sanatorium is a private institution, and for this reason we are of opinion that the certificate of Dr. Hall was not such as the statute contemplates, and did not authorize the clerk's appointment of the guardian.

[4] The complaint alleges, however, that Forest M. Groves was restored to sound mind and memory, and thereafter ratified the proceedings both for partition and for the allotment of the widow's dower. The demurrer admits this allegation. But the defendants contend that the alleged order of restoration to sanity was based upon a proceeding which is unconstitutional; that the jury was composed of six men, instead of twelve; and that Forest M. Groves was deprived of his property without due process of law. This contention presents the third ground of objection to the complaint.

C. S. § 2287, provides that when any insane person becomes of sound mind and memory, a petition in his behalf may be filed before the clerk of the superior court of the county of his residence setting forth the facts; whereupon a jury of six freeholders shall be summoned to inquire into the sanity of the person alleged to be sane, and if the jury shall find him to be sane such person may make contracts and sell his property.

The complaint alleges that the fact of Groves' restoration was inquired into and determined by a tribunal created under the provisions of this statute.

[5] It is not necessary to discuss the question at length. That a state cannot deprive a person of his property without due process of law does not necessarily imply that all trials in the state courts shall be by a jury composed of twelve men. Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S. 603, 20 Sup. Ct. 448, 494, 44 L. Ed. 597; Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 92, 23 L. Ed. 678. Nor is the contention of the defendants necessarily determined in their favor by article 1, § 19, of the Constitution of North Carolina. The right to a trial by jury which is provided in this section applies only to cases in which the prerogative existed at common law, or was procured by statute at the time the Constitution was adopted, and not to those where the right and the remedy with it are thereafter created by statute. 16 R. C. L. 194. In Lindsay v. Lindsay, 257 Ill. 328, 100 N. E. 982, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 916, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 222, the Supreme Court of Illinois in a discussion of the question presented here said:

"On the trial of the case before the county court, a jury of twelve men was demanded and was denied. The statute, as we have said, provided for trial by a jury of six. Upon this question the court said: 'The constitutional provision that "the right of trial by jury, as heretofore enjoyed, shall remain inviolate," does not apply. This is not a proceeding according to the course of the common law, in which the right of a trial by jury is guaranteed, but the proceeding is a statutory one, and the statute, too, enacted since the adoption of the Constitution. There was not, at the time of such adoption, the enjoyment of a jury trial in such a case. In reference to this subject, generally, Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, p. 819, remarks: "But in those cases which formerly were not triable by jury, if the Legislature provide for such a trial now, they may doubtless create for the purpose a statutory tribunal composed of any number of persons, and no question of constitutional power or right could arise."'"

The proceeding under section 2287 was not according to the course of the common law, and the constitutional inhibitions do not apply. The judgment overruling the demurrer is affirmed.

Affirmed.

(182 N. C. 502)

LOWDERMILK v. BUTLER. (No. 416.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Corporations §619—Conveyance can be made in name of corporation by order of directors within three years after dissolution.

Under C. S. § 1198, continuing corporate existence for three years after termination or annulment of charter, and section 1194, making the directors the trustees to wind up the affairs of the corporation and prescribing their powers and duties, a valid conveyance of property belonging to the corporation can be made in the corporation's name by their order after its voluntary dissolution.

2. Corporations §619—Joinder as assignee of agent for dissolution does not affect conveyance by corporation.

The fact that the agent appointed for the dissolution of a corporation joined the corporation in a sale by it under the power contained in a mortgage, and the execution of a deed by order of the directors, on the theory that he was the assignee of the mortgage, does not invalidate the sale by the corporation.

3. Courts §93(1)—Rule of property recognized by several decisions should not be disregarded.

A rule of property established by numerous decisions covering a period of more than half a century, though it may not be absolutely binding on the courts, should not be lightly disregarded, and will be followed even though the question would be otherwise decided if it were being raised for the first time, unless circumstances are shown which indicate that greater harm will result from continuing to follow it than would result from changing it.

4. Courts §93(4)—Rule of stare decisis subject to exceptions.

The rule of stare decisis is not an inextinguishable one, but is subject to exception in the case of grave and palpable error widely affecting the administration of justice, where the opinion is in conflict with prior decisions and unsupported by reason or authority, or where it is not probable that property rights will be seriously affected.

5. Judgment §768(2)—Delay for more than a year in filing transcript of justices' judgment defeats lien.

A delay for more than one year after the judgment is rendered by a justice of the peace in filing the transcript thereof in the superior court defeats the lien of the judgment.

6. Mortgages §158—Mortgagee has interest in purchase-money mortgage with power of sale after assignment thereof.

A corporation holding a purchase-money mortgage with power of sale has an interest therein because of the power after assignment of the mortgage, so that such assignment does not defeat the priority of the mortgage over the lien of a judgment rendered before the property was conveyed to the mortgagor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Moore County; Ray, Judge.

Action by Kenneth F. Lowdermilk against Benjamin F. Butler to settle title to land. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This is an action to settle the title to land, described in the pleadings, the plaintiff and defendant each claiming under the Piedmont Plantation Company, as the origin of title.

The Piedmont Plantation Company conveyed the land to A. Legler April 20, 1912, and on the same day A. Legler, to secure the purchase money, made a mortgage to it. The mortgage was recorded June 4, 1912, and the deed thereafter on August 27, 1912.

On May 28, 1913, the Piedmont Plantation Company and R. W. Pempelly (who claimed in the deed to be the assignee of the mortgage), after sale under the power contained in the mortgage, conveyed the land to the plaintiff by deed, which is copied in the record.

To establish title in himself, and disprove title in plaintiff, the defendant relied on the following records and deeds introduced in evidence by him:

(1) A judgment in favor of C. S. Fry and against Alexander Legler, rendered before a justice of the peace on September 25, 1909, and docketed in the superior court of Moore county on July 21, 1911, on a transcript of said judgment from the justice of the peace. The transcript itself was issued by the justice of the peace on the same date as the rendition of the judgment, and was docketed in the superior court more than 12 months from said date, but prior to the date of the original deed from Piedmont Plantation Company to Alexander Legler, and some time before the mortgage from Legler to Piedmont Plantation Company, upon which plaintiff relies to make out his title, was recorded.

(2) Deed from D. Al. Blue, sheriff of Moore county, to George H. Humber, dated August 21, 1913, and recorded August 23, 1913, in Book of Deeds No. 57, at page 244. This deed is set out in the record in full, from which it will appear that it was made pursuant to a sale of the land in controversy under an execution issued on the judgment of C. S. Fry against Alexander Legler aforesaid, at which sale George H. Humber became the purchaser.

(3) The evidence of M. M. Stutts, shown in the record, that Alexander Legler was a non-resident of the state during the year 1913, the date of the sale of the land by the sheriff of Moore county under the execution to George H. Humber.

(4) Several successive deeds, beginning with that of George H. Humber and wife, conveying ultimately such title as Humber received under the sheriff's deed to the defendant.

(5) The record of the dissolution of Piedmont Plantation Company, a corporation, as contained in Record Book of Incorporations No. 2, at page 32, in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Moore county. This record is fully set out in the case on appeal, from which it will appear that by voluntary proceedings as provided by law Piedmont Plantation Company was dissolved as a corporation by the Secretary of State, on the 5th day of July, 1912, prior to the execution of its deed to plaintiff, on which he relies for title, which is dated May 28, 1913.

The following is section 1194 of the Consolidated Statutes, relating to conveyances of property belonging to dissolved corporations:

"Directors to be Trustees; Powers and Duties.—On the dissolution in any manner of a corporation, unless otherwise directed by an order of the court, the directors are trustees thereof, with full power to settle the affairs, collect the outstanding debts, sell and convey the property, and, after paying its debts, divide any surplus money and other property among the stockholders. The trustees have power to meet and act under the by-laws of the corporation, and, under regulations to be made by a majority, to prescribe the terms and conditions of the sale of such property, and they may sell all or any part for cash, or partly on credit, or take mortgages or bonds for part of the purchase price for all or any part of the property. They have power to sue for and recover the said debts and property in the name of the corporation, and are suable in the same name for the debts owing by it, and are jointly and severally responsible for such debts only to the amount of property of the corporation which comes into their possession as trustees."

There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and from the judgment thereon the defendant appealed.

U. L. Spence, of Carthage, for appellant.
H. F. Seawell, of Carthage, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). We will consider the questions raised by this appeal in the order of their statement in the assignments of error, briefs, and argument before us.

[1] First. The plaintiff attacks the last deed on the ground that on July 5, 1912, the Secretary of State certified to the clerk of the superior court of Moore county, that the Piedmont Plantation Company on that date had filed its consent in writing to the dissolution of the corporation, executed by the requisite number of stockholders, Raphael W. Pempelly being the agent therein named and in charge thereof, and that the corporation could not thereafter convey its property. This contention, as we think, is based upon a misconception of the statute. The corporation did not cease to exist at the date of the filing of the certificate of dissolution, as contended by appellant, but continued three years from that date as a body corporate, by express provision of Consol. Statutes, § 1193, which is that all corporations whose charters expire by their own limitation or are annulled by forfeiture or otherwise shall continue to be bodies corporate for three years after the time when they would have been dissolved, "for the purpose of prosecuting and defending actions by or against them, and of enabling them gradually to settle and close their concerns, to dispose of their property, and to divide their assets," etc. But the defendant relies upon the provisions of the next section (1194), which is above set out in our statement of the case. It appears therefrom that the "directors, as trustees, may sell and convey the corporate property upon such terms as they may prescribe," but this does not exclude the idea that, in conveying the property, they may not do so in the name of the corporation in whom the legal title was originally vested. It may be conveyed in the name of the corporation by their order or direction, or perhaps they may convey it in their own names as directors and trustees. It appears in this record, and in the certificate of probate, as a fact judicially found by the clerk of the superior court, that the deed was made in the name of the corporation by order of the directors, who, under the statute, were the trustees. So that the statute was fully complied with.

[2] By reason of his appointment as agent in the dissolution proceedings of the corporation, it is probable that R. W. Pempelly concluded he was thereby made the assignee of the mortgage, and, out of abundance of caution, joined the corporation in the sale of the land and in the execution of the deed to the plaintiff. If he was not such assignee, his joining in the sale and in the execution of the deed were harmless acts.

Second. The defendant, through his counsel, further contends that on September 25, 1909, C. S. Frye recovered a judgment for $26.89 against A. Legler before a justice of the peace of Moore county, which was filed and docketed in the superior court on July 21, 1911, more than a year after its rendition, and that execution issued on it from the superior court, and the land in controversy was levied on as the property of A. Legler and sold and conveyed by the sheriff to G. H. Humber, from whom, by mesne conveyances, the defendant claims title.

It is well to observe, in passing, that the judgment roll introduced in evidence by defendant shows that all of the executions issued to the sheriff on this judgment were returned by him without action, even down to May 6, 1913, and the clerk was still issuing executions thereon so late as April 1, 1921.

[3] In order to sustain the claim of title by the defendant under the sheriff's sale and deed, the appellant's counsel frankly admitted that it is necessary for this court to overrule several of its well-considered decisions heretofore rendered and to upset a doctrine which has existed and been recognized as a rule of property for well-nigh half a century. Williams v. Williams, 85 N. C. 383; Woodard v. Paxton, 101 N. C. 26, 7 S. E. 469; Cowen v. Withrow, 114 N. C. 558, 19 S. E. 645. No good reason has been advanced for such action on our part. What this court would decide if the question were res nova or presented now on its legal merits for the first time it is futile to declare, as we are satisfied that those cases should stand unmolested after such repeated adjudications, as it is to the interest of the state that there should at some time and somewhere be an end of controversy. Some questions may fairly and justly be considered as closed by the former decisions of this court, and especially where rights of property are involved, and even those of contracts in some cases, in order that it may be known how to deal safely in our daily transactions. We should impart firmness and stableness to them, so that what we have declared to be the law in the past may not be easily assailed and overthrown in the future, thereby impairing public confidence in the integrity, permanency, and reliability of what we may decide to be the rule of reason and of conduct which is sanctioned by the law. This is essential that our judgments may acquire permanency and become trustworthy, and never subject to change, unless, after maturer consideration, we may be convinced that there is palpable error, and that it is better to retrace our steps and change our former decisions because of the greater benefit to be derived therefrom. But such instances are very rare, and, if possible, should be reduced to the minimum, as change in our opinions is far more apt to result in harm than in any indispensable benefit. "Stare decisis, et non quieta movere," the Latin phrase, which means to stand by decided cases and uphold precedents, by maintaining former adjudications, rather than unsettle those things which have been established, is one of the ancient maxims which has improved by its age, and is worthy of the greatest reverence and the fullest acceptance. It was said many years ago that a point which has often been adjudged should be permitted to rest in peace. Spicer v. Spicer, Cro. Jac. 527, 79 Eng. Reprint, 451; 1 Kent's Com. 477. The rule expresses the principle, in tangible form, upon which rests the authority and binding force of judicial decisions as precedents in subsequent litigations. When more mildly expressed, the rule means, in general, that when a point has been once settled by judicial decision, it forms a precedent for the guidance of the courts in similar cases. The Madrid (C. C.) 40 Fed. 677, 679.

[4] But it has been said that, where grave and palpable error, widely affecting the administration of justice, must either be solemnly sanctioned or repudiated, the maxim, "Fiat justitia ruat coelum," should apply, and not the rule of stare decisis. Ellison v. Georgia, etc., R. Co., 87 Ga. 691, 13 S. E. 800. As a general rule, where a principle of law has become settled by a series of decisions, it is binding on the courts and should be followed. But it has been determined that a single decision is not necessarily binding. Again the maxim stare decisis is not imperative; and an opinion is not authority for what is not mentioned therein and what does not appear to have been suggested to the court from which the opinion emanates. A decision in conflict with prior decisions, and not supported by reason or authority, will not be adhered to where it is not probable that property rights will be seriously affected and positive authority of a decision is co-extensive only with the facts upon which it is founded. 11 Cyc. 745, and notes; Gage v. Parker, 178 Ill. 455, 53 N. E. 317; Larson v. Bank, 86 Neb. 595, 92 N. W. 729. It has been well and wisely said that precedents are to be regarded as the great storehouse of experience, not always to be followed, but to be looked to as beacon lights in the progress of judicial investigation, which, although at times they be liable to conduct us to the paths of error, yet may be important aids in lighting our footsteps on the way to truth. Leavitt v. Morrow, 6 Ohio St. 71, 67 Am. Dec. 334.

After all has been repeated that has been or can be said pro or con upon this important question, we concur in the view taken by a court of the highest authority in another case that, whatever difference of opinion may have existed in this court originally in regard to these questions, or might now exist if they were open for reconsideration, it is sufficient to say that they are concluded by the former adjudications. The argument upon both sides was exhausted in the earlier cases. It could subserve no useful purpose again to examine the subject. Parker v. W. L. Cotton, etc., Co., 2 Black (67 U. S.) 545, 17 L. Ed. 333.

It all comes to this, that former precedents should not be reversed except upon strong and imperious necessity. The federal Supreme Court and some courts in other jurisdictions have held that a decision is not an authority upon a question not considered by the court, though involved in a case decided. Durousseau v. U. S., 6 Cranch, 307, 3 L. Ed. 232; Buel v. Van Ness, 8 Wheat. 312, 5 L. Ed. 624; New v. Oklahoma, 195 U. S. 252, 25 Sup. Ct. 68, 49 L. Ed. 182; U. S. v. More, 3 Cranch, 159, 2 L. Ed. 397; Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 82, 13 Sup. Ct. 22, 36 L. Ed. 896; McCormick H. Mach. Co. v. Aultman Co., 169 U. S. 606, 18 Sup. Ct. 443, 42 L. Ed. 875; and other cases cited in notes to 2 Digest U. S. S. C. Reports (L. Ed.) p. 2327.

We admit that the rule which requires us to uphold former decisions upon the same subject is not an inexorable one, nor is it mandatory upon the court. Hertz v. Woodman, 218 U. S. 205, 30 Sup. Ct. 621, 54 L. Ed. 1001. There is some flexibility in it, and it has been said that it should not be employed to perpetrate error (15 Corpus Juris, p. 956, § 357), but the court will not listen readily, and surely not with favor, to appeals for reversals of former adjudications, where manifest error is not first shown. But there is none such shown here. With regard to this rule we have ourselves quite recently said that the people are supposed to have confidence in their highest court, at least to the extent of ascribing to it the virtue of consistency and a desire to see that by no lack of stability in its decisions shall any citizen be jeopardized or prejudiced in his rights, because he has simply acted upon the supposition that what the court has so solemnly determined will again be its decision upon the same state of facts, or that, at least, if it does change its mind, his rights and interests will be thoroughly safeguarded. If courts proceeded upon any different theory in the decision of causes, the people would be left in a state of uncertainty as to what the law is, and could not adjust their business affairs to any fixed and settled principles which would, of course, produce most mischievous, if not disastrous, consequences. Hill v. Railroad Co., 143 N. C. 581, 55 S. E. 854, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 606. See, also, Mason v. Cotton Co., 148 N. C. 492, 62 S. E. 625, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1221, 128 Am. St. Rep. 635, and Williamson v. Rabon, 177 N. C. 302, 98 S. E. 830. A great law-writer once said about this rule of the law that he did not wish to be understood to press too strongly the doctrine of stare decisis, when he recollected that there are more than 1,000 cases to be pointed out in the English and American books of reports which have been overruled, doubted, or limited in their application. It is probable that the records of many of the courts in this country are replete with hasty and crude decisions; and such cases ought to be examined without fear, and revised without reluctance, rather than to have the character of our law impaired, and the beauty and harmony of the system destroyed by the perpetuation of error. Even a series of decisions are not always conclusive evidence of what is law; and the revision of a decision very often resolves itself into a mere question of expediency, depending upon the consideration of the importance of certainty in the rule, and the extent of property to be affected by a change of it. Lord Mansfield frequently observed that the certainty of a rule was often of much more importance in mercantile cases than the reason for it, and that a settled rule ought to be observed for the sake of property; and yet, perhaps, no English judge ever made greater innovations and improvements in the law, or felt himself less embarrassed with the disposition of the elder cases, when they came in his way, to impede the operation of his enlightened and cultivated judgment. The law of England, he observed, would be an absurd science, were it founded upon precedents only. Precedents were to illustrate principles and to give them a fixed certainty. His successor, Lord Kenyon, was said to have acted like a Roman dictator appointed to recall and reinvigorate the ancient discipline. He controlled or overruled several very important decisions of Lord Mansfield as dangerous innovations and on the ground that they had departed from the precedents of former times, and disturbed the landmarks of property, and had unauthorizably superadded equity powers to a court of law. "It is my wish and my comfort," said that venerable judge, "to stand super antiquas vias. I cannot legislate, but by my industry I can discover what my predecessors have done, and I will tread in their footsteps." The English courts seem now to consider it to be their duty to adhere to the authority of adjudged cases when they have been so clearly and so often or so long established as to create a practical rule of property, notwithstanding they may feel the hardship or not perceive the reasonableness of the rule. There is great weight in the maxim of Lord Bacon that "Optima est lex, quæ minimum relinquit arbitrio iudicis; optimus iudex, qui minimum sibi." The great difficulty as to cases consists in making an accurate application of the general principle contained in them to new cases presenting a change of circumstances. If the analogy be imperfect, the application may be erroneous. The expressions of every judge must also be taken with reference to the case on which he decided; we must look to the principle of the decision, and not to the manner in which the case is argued upon the bench; otherwise the law will be thrown into extreme confusion. The exercise of sound judgment is as necessary in the use as diligence and learning are requisite in the pursuit of adjudged cases. Considering the influence of manners upon law and the force of opinion, which is silently and almost insensibly controlling the course of business and the practice of the courts, it is impossible that the fabric of our jurisprudence should not exhibit deep traces of the progress of society, as well as of the footsteps of time. The ancient reporters are going very fast, not only out of use, but out of date, and almost out of recollection. The modern reports, and the latest of the modern are the most useful, because they contain the last, and, it is to be presumed, the most correct, exposition of the law, and the most judicious application of the abstract and eternal principles of right to the refinements of the science of the law as relating to property. They are likewise accompanied by illustrations best adapted to the inquisitive and cultivated reason of the present age. But the old reporters cannot be entirely neglected.

[5] Counsel for the defendant in this case very ably and zealously pressed upon us the necessity for overruling several decisions of this court of comparatively recent date (Williams v. Williams, 85 N. C. 383; Woodard v. Paxton, 101 N. C. 26, 7 S. E. 469; Cowen v. Withrow, 114 N. C. 558, 19 S. E. 645), on the ground that they were opposed to the mandate of a statute in regard to docketing justices' judgments and the lien acquired thereby, but we do not think that this is the case, but, on the contrary, that they are not plainly inconsistent therewith, even though a contrary construction may have been permissible. If the reasoning of the court is not unanswerable, it is not palpably illogical or erroneous, and defendant has, therefore, not made out a case which will induce us to reconsider those decisions. C. S. Fry was dilatory in docketing his judgment against Alexander Legler, which was done more than one year after its rendition, and those cases clearly decide that this was too late and he acquired no lien thereby. We adhere without hesitation to the former precedents.

[6] It may not be absolutely important in this case to decide that question, as we are of opinion that, if the Fry judgment had been docketed within the time prescribed by the statute, the lien of the judgment could not prevail against the title of the plaintiff acquired by him under the deed to Legler, the mortgage back from him to the Piedmont Plantation Company, and the deed from them to the plaintiff. The fact, if it be so, that the debt secured by the mortgage had been assigned to R. W. Pempelly did not show that the plantation company had no further interest in the matter, because it held as mortgagee the legal title, which carried with it the power of sale, and it was necessary for the company to join with Pempelly in the sale under the power and in the deed to plaintiff, in order to a valid exercise of the power (Williams v. Teachey, 85 N. C. 402) and the conveyance of the legal and equitable title, though for the purposes of this action the company, having the legal title, could convey such an interest as would enable the plaintiff, its assignee, to recover in ejectment. Wittkowski v. Watkins, 84 N. C. 456, where Justice Ruffin said:

"The position taken for the plaintiffs in regard to the point of evidence raised on the trial cannot be questioned. They were so clearly entitled to recover the possession of the land in dispute upon the strength of their legal title as mortgagees, even if their sale to Jones and his reconveyance to them should be held to be invalid, as to make it perfectly useless to inquire into that matter. That may become of interest to the parties at some future day, but could not possibly affect the issues involved in the present action, and therefore was correctly excluded upon the ground of its immateriality."

Plaintiff contended that the title never rested in Legler for even a moment, as he conveyed back to the company, by way of mortgage, at the same time he received the legal title from it, under Moring v. Dickerson, 85 N. C. 406, and Hinton v. Hicks, 156 N. C. 24, 71 S. E. 1036, and therefore that the lien of the judgment, if it ever existed, did not attach to the land, and, while this may be so, it is not necessary that we should decide as to it, and we do not, as we have held that defendant's judgment was never a lien, because not docketed within the time fixed by statute. Whether the fact that the mortgage of Legler back to the company was registered before the deed of the company to him would play any part in the solution of the matter we also leave undetermined and as an open question.

We conclude that in no view of the case should the judgment of the court below be disturbed by us.

No error.

MANNING, Atty. Gen., v. RAMA RURAL COMMUNITY OF MECKLENBURG COUNTY. (No. 450.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 30, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨7—Incorporation of rural community embracing parts of several school districts held invalid.

Under C. S. §§ 7380, 7381, providing for the incorporation of rural communities when embracing one entire school district, a certificate of incorporation of a rural community composed of parts of three school districts was issued without warrant of law, especially in view of the stipulation in section 7380 requiring the county board of education to enlarge the boundaries on written request of a majority of the school committeemen or trustees "of said school district," thus showing the Legislature's intent that the territorial boundaries as designated should be considered of the substance and essential to a valid incorporation.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨18—Attorney General may sue to annul charter of fraudulently incorporated rural community.

Under C. S. § 1187, authorizing the Attorney General to sue to annul the charter of a corporation on the ground it was procured on a fraudulent suggestion or concealment of a material fact, he may sue to annul the charter of a rural community obtained on the false suggestion that it consisted of one entire school district, as required by sections 7380, 7381, and when in fact it was composed of parts of three, with knowledge of such facts by the petitioners for incorporation, though there was no corrupt purpose or intent to deceive.

3. Constitutional law ⇨56 — Courts may be given jurisdiction of Attorney General's action to annul charter of fraudulently incorporated rural community.

Since the Legislature, in the exercise of its power to create corporations and establish proper rules for their regulation and control, can confer on the courts jurisdiction to determine whether in a given instance their rules have been complied with, which is a judicial question, the court is not without jurisdiction of an action by the Attorney General, under C. S. § 1187, to annul the charter of an incorporated rural community, on the ground it was obtained on a fraudulent suggestion that it embraced one entire school district as required by sections 7380, 7381, and concealment of the fact it included parts of several.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Ray, Judge.

Action by the State, on the relation of James S. Manning, Attorney General, against the Rama Rural Community of Mecklenburg County. From a judgment overruling its demurrer, defendant excepts and appeals. Affirmed.

The action is instituted by the state, on relation of the Attorney-General, to annul the charter of the Rama Rural Community on the grounds alleged in the complaint, that the requirements of the statute under which the charter purported to have been issued (Consolidated Statutes, § 7380) had not been complied with, and that on the facts presented the alleged charter was not authorized by said statute, the complaint, among others, containing allegations that the petitioners in their written application for the charter had made it appear that the proposed community embraced one entire school district, and had concealed from the Secretary of State the essential fact that it contained parts of three school districts in said county, each of which constituted a separate special school tax district in said county, the said statute providing that a charter of this kind in question may only be issued for territory embracing one entire school district.

Defendants demurred, and for the reasons chiefly (1) that the courts are without jurisdiction to question the acts of the Secretary of State in issuing the charter, or his findings of fact concerning the same; (2) that relator of plaintiff has no legal right to maintain the action; (3) that the complaint does not contain facts sufficient to justify the relief sought nor any other relief within the scope of the pleadings, etc.

Judgment overruling the demurrer, and defendant excepted and appealed.

T. L. Kirkpatrick, H. L. Taylor, Clarkson, Tallafarro & Clarkson, Thos. W. Alexander, and Jake F. Newell, all of Charlotte, for appellant.

John M. Robinson, Edgar W. Pharr and Pharr, Bell, & Sparrow, all of Charlotte, for appellee.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. [1] Chapter 123 provides for incorporation of rural communities on petition of a majority of their registered voters, and when embracing "in area one entire school district." Section 7380, the first of the chapter, requires this allegation as a part of the petition, and section 7381 provides that the Secretary of State, to whom the petition shall be addressed, shall issue the certificate of incorporation if the petition is in due form. It thus appears that this privilege is only conferred upon communities of the kind described, and it being admitted by the demurrer that the defendant, the community in question here, is composed not of one entire school district, but of parts of three different school districts. The petitioners have not brought themselves within the terms of the statute, and the certificate of incorporation has been issued without warrant of law. The position that only communities embracing in area "one entire school district" have the right of incorporation under the law finds full support, if any were needed, from a stipulation in section 7380 that—

"After any school district has been incorporated under the provisions of this article, the boundaries of such school district may be changed only in the manner prescribed by law for changing the lines of a special school tax district, except that the county board of education shall proceed to enlarge such boundaries in accordance with law upon the written request of a majority of the school committeemen or trustees of said school district and a written request of a majority of the board of directors of the incorporated rural community"

—thus again showing the intent of the Legislature that the territorial boundaries as designated should be considered of the substance and essential to a valid incorporation under the law, a principle of interpretation recognized and approved in an opinion of the court at the present term in Woosely v. Commissioners of Davidson County, 109 S. E. 368.

[2] It was chiefly insisted for the defendant that the demurrer should be sustained from lack of authority in the Attorney General, as relator, to institute and maintain the action. It was formerly held that the Attorney General, of his own motion without legislative sanction, could not bring an action to vacate a legislative charter. Under the present law, however, this authority has been provided for in certain designated instances appearing in Consolidated Statutes, § 1187. As appertaining to the question presented here, this power was given in terms as follows:

"An action may be brought by the Attorney General in the name of the state against a corporation for the purpose of annulling its charter upon the ground that it was procured upon a fraudulent suggestion, or concealment of a material fact, by the persons incorporated or by some of them, or with their knowledge or consent," etc.

Among the other allegations pertinent to the inquiry, the complaint in section VII contains the following:

"That the said purported certificate of incorporation of the defendant, Rama Rural Community of Mecklenburg county, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit B, is absolutely null and void, and the attempted incorporation of said community is of no effect for the reasons that:

"(a) The boundaries of the said Rama Rural Community of Mecklenburg county did not, at the time of the application for or issuance of said certificate, and does not now, embrace in area one entire school district, as provided by law, but, on the contrary, the said boundaries did, and still do, embrace parts of Progress school district, the Sardis school district, and the Oak Grove school district, as stated in paragraph 6 above, the same being three separate and distinct school districts of Mecklenburg county.

"(b) The said certificate of incorporation was procured upon the suggestion of a material fact by the persons purporting to be thus incorporated, or by some of them, or with their knowledge and consent, in that it was suggested to the Secretary of State, for the purpose of obtaining said certificate of incorporation, that the boundaries of said Rama Rural Community of Mecklenburg county embraced in area one entire school district, when as a matter of fact the said boundaries, to the knowledge of said incorporators, or some of them, embraced parts of three separate and distinct school districts of Mecklenburg county.

"(c) The said certificate of incorporation was procured upon the failure to disclose a material fact by the persons purporting to be incorporated, or by some of them, or with their knowledge and consent, in that the said certificate of incorporation was obtained by a failure to disclose to the Secretary of State the fact that the boundaries of the said Rama Rural Community of Mecklenburg county did not embrace in area one entire school district, but on the contrary embraced parts of three separate and distinct school districts.

"(d) By the express provisions of chapter 123 of the Consolidated Statutes, under which the said Rama Rural Community purports to have been incorporated, the people of a rural community can be incorporated only upon the condition that said community embraces in area one entire school district, and inasmuch as the purported incorporation of the defendant attempted to incorporate a community which embraced parts of three separate and distinct school districts of Mecklenburg county, the said attempted incorporation is utterly irregular, illegal, and null and void.

"(e) In obtaining said certificate of incorporation the signers thereof purported to be incorporating a school district, designated as Rama Rural Community school district, when as a matter of fact there was not and never has been such a school district in Mecklenburg county."

Upon these averments, admitted by the demurrer to be true, it appears that this charter has been obtained upon the false suggestion that the community consisted of one entire school district, and on concealment of the real conditions that in fact and truth it was composed of parts of three separate and distinct school districts of Mecklenburg county, and that these facts were known to the said petitioners or some of them.

It is not necessary that there should be a corrupt purpose or intent to deceive on the part of the petitioners, but a false statement as of an essential fact, or the withholding of essential facts with knowledge of their existence on the part of the petitioners, or some of them would, in our opinion, constitute a legal fraud within the purview of this statute and justify a maintenance of the action.

[3] The suggestion that the court is without jurisdiction to examine into and decide the question presented because the exclusive power over the subject is vested in the Legislature cannot be maintained. It is true that under our system of government the power to create corporations and to establish proper rules for these regulations and control is with the General Assembly (Clark on Corporations, pp. 33, 34), and it is also true that in the exercise of that power they can confer on the courts, and have done so in this instance, authority and jurisdiction to inquire and determine whether in a given instance their rules have been complied with, this last being distinctly and clearly a judicial question. In Re Applicants for License, pp. 1-6. There is no error in overruling the demurrer, and the judgment to that effect is affirmed.

BAYLOR v. HOOVER.

1. Brokers \S 85(1)—In suit for commission, held not error to admit contract of husband and wife, and to show that it was the contract of the husband only, and accepted as such.

In an action by a real estate agent to recover a commission for procuring a purchaser who without authority signed his wife's name to the contract as joining with him therein, it was not error to permit plaintiff to introduce the contract in evidence, and to permit him to prove, as he contended, that it was the contract of the husband only, and accepted by defendant as such, though the latter had attempted in a prior suit to hold both parties as purchasers on a failure to comply therewith.

2. Estoppel \S 68(3)—Rights of real estate agent to collect commission from owner not prejudiced because he aided the owner in a suit on a contract of sale as a joint contract.

Where a real estate agent aided a landowner in a suit on a contract for the sale of land on the theory that the contract was a joint contract of the purchaser and his wife, he is not precluded in a subsequent suit against the owner for his commission, from offering the contract in evidence upon the theory that it was a contract of sale entered into by the husband only.

3. Brokers \S 86(1)—Evidence held to sustain verdict for broker suing for commission.

In an action for commission for sale of land, evidence held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

4. Judgment \S 533—Statement of court in former action against husband and wife, as alleged purchasers, that a sale of land had not taken place, not controlling in an action by real estate agent against owner of land for commission.

Where the owner of land sued a purchaser and his wife on a contract of sale as codefendants, a statement of the court that a sale had never taken place does not control in an action by the real estate agent against the owner to recover his commission, on the theory that the contract of sale was entered into by the husband alone.

Error to Corporation Court of Staunton.

Action by J. Earl Hoover against G. Frank Baylor. In the first trial, judgment for plaintiff was reversed and remanded. From judgment for plaintiff at the second trial, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. A. Glasgow, of Staunton, for plaintiff in error.

S. D. Timberlake, Jr., of Staunton, for defendant in error.

SAUNDERS, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of the city of Staunton. In the proceedings in the corporation court Hoover was plaintiff and Baylor defendant. The question for determination is whether, upon the law and facts in issue, Hoover, a real estate agent in Staunton, is entitled to recover commissions from Baylor under the terms of the following contract of authorization to sell Baylor's farm;

"I hereby authorize J. Earl Hoover to sell my property as listed above, until otherwise notified in writing. And if sold, I agree to pay said J. Earl Hoover a commission of 5 per cent. on the total amount of the sale. I reserve the right to sell myself, or give it to any other person to sell. G. Frank Baylor."

It appears, that after Baylor placed his farm in the hands of Hoover for sale, the latter became very active, and, after interviewing various parties, finally succeeded in interesting one Charles T. Carson. Hoover and Baylor give very different accounts of what followed in the negotiations between the parties, but this controversy was submitted to a jury, and they appear to have given credence to Hoover and his witnesses. According to the testimony for the plaintiff, after Hoover had interested Carson, he took him to see Baylor, and the three drove out to see the latter's farm. After a thorough examination of the place, Carson said that the farm was what he was looking for, and "he was willing to buy it, provided he could get such terms as he would have to have." Thereupon he and Baylor talked the matter over, and came to a full and complete agreement upon the terms of sale. The parties returned to town, and an attorney of repute was employed to draw a contract. Mr. Baylor gave Mr. Kennedy, the attorney, the necessary data, and the contract was drawn up accordingly. This contract begins as follows:

"This contract of sale, made and entered into in triplicate the third day of January, 1916, by and between G. Frank Baylor, of Augusta county, Va., of the first part, and Charles T. Carson and Helen Carson, his wife, of West Virginia, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the consideration hereinafter named, the said party of the first part doth hereby sell unto the parties of the second part, and the parties of the second part do hereby purchase from the said party of the first part, that certain farm," etc.

In the body of the contract are various references to the parties of the second part. The contract was signed as follows:

"G. Frank Baylor. [Seal.]
 "Charles T. Carson. [Seal.]
 "Helen A. Carson,
 "Per C. T. Carson. [Seal.]"

Following the execution of this contract, Carson paid Baylor $500. Carson returned to West Virginia to make his arrangements to take possession of the place which he had purchased. Later his wife visited the farm, and was very much dissatisfied with what she saw. Thereafter Carson refused to carry out the contract, or to accept a deed from the vendor. All efforts to induce compliance on his part having failed, Baylor brought an action for damages against Carson and wife for failure to carry out the contract. Under an instruction of the court, Mrs. Carson was relieved from liability, but Baylor recovered a judgment against the husband for $1,500. This judgment proved unavailing, Carson having disposed of his real and personal property in anticipation of an adverse verdict. Upon the termination of the proceedings against Carson, Hoover called upon Baylor for the balance of his commissions, having received only $50 on account of same. Baylor refused to pay this claim, alleging that Hoover had not effected a sale. Thereupon, Hoover sued Baylor and recovered a verdict for $700, subject to a credit of $50 as commissions for negotiating the sale of the farm in question. A writ of error was awarded to the judgment on this verdict, and the same was reversed for errors of law, and remanded for a new trial. On the second trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $550. The judgment on this verdict is under review in the instant case.

Baylor, the plaintiff in error, assigns several errors:

First and Second: The trial court erred in allowing the plaintiff and other witnesses to testify in contravention of the contract of sale which indicated that Charles T. Carson and Helen, his wife, were joint purchasers of the Baylor farm. These witnesses were allowed to testify that Mrs. Carson was not a purchaser, and was never proposed as such, and that, while her name appeared in the contract as a joint purchaser with her husband, it was put there merely to indicate that when the deed was made, the same should be made to the said Carson and wife jointly.

Third: The court erred in overruling the motion to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, and for the admission of improper evidence.

The issue of fact submitted to the jury in the instant case under proper instructions was whether the plaintiff, as agent of Baylor, produced to the latter a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy his farm on terms acceptable to him, and a valid contract was made between vendor and vendee.

The court instructed the jury by instruction No. 1 for the plaintiff as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that a real estate agent, in order to be entitled to his commissions, must procure and produce to the owner a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to buy on terms authorized by the owner, or acceptable to him. When the real estate agent has done this, and the owner of the land has entered into a valid contract with such purchaser, the duty of the real estate agent is performed, and he is entitled to his commissions."

The evidence for the plaintiff appears to have satisfied the jury that such a purchaser had been produced by Hoover, and a valid contract had been entered into between said purchaser and Baylor. As a part of his evidence in his action for commissions, Hoover introduced the contract between Baylor and Carson. On the face of this contract Carson and wife were joint purchasers, but Mrs. Carson had successfully resisted the attempt to charge her with liability in the action of Baylor against Carson and wife, supra, on the ground that her husband had no authority, under seal or otherwise, to sign her name to the contract of sale of the Baylor farm, as a joint purchaser.

The contention of the plaintiff, Hoover, in his action against Baylor, was that C. T. Carson was the sole purchaser of the Baylor farm, and was offered to and accepted as such by Baylor; that the name of the wife was inserted by Kennedy, the draughtsman, at Carson's instance, not as a joint purchaser, but merely to indicate that the deed was to be made to him and his wife jointly; that her name was included in the contract under these circumstances, and for the purpose indicated, and that Baylor was present and heard what passed between Kennedy and Carson in the foregoing connection.

[1-3] When Hoover undertook to submit his testimony to show that the contract supra was a contract of sale of C. T. Carson only, and that it was intended and understood by Carson and Baylor that Carson alone was the purchaser of the Baylor farm, the defendant (Baylor) objected on the ground that this evidence was not competent; that a person could not claim under an instrument without confirming it—that is to say, he cannot at once accept and reject the same instrument. The principle of law advanced is sound and controlling in an appropriate case. But Hoover was not introducing the contract for its apparent, but for its real, meaning and effect. Prior to that time it had been judicially ascertained in a controversy between Baylor and Carson and wife that the instrument was a valid and binding contract as to the husband, although not operative as to the wife. It was the contention of Hoover that he had introduced Carson, and Carson only, to Baylor as a purchaser; that the terms of a sale had thereupon been agreed upon and reduced to written form, and that the paper introduced was Carson's contract, valid as to him, and accepted as such by Baylor. If Carson was the sole purchaser, if the contract contained the terms of sale agreed on between Carson and Baylor, and if it was binding on the former, it was immaterial that Mrs. Carson's name had, with his (Baylor's) acquiescence, been inserted in the instrument under a misconception. Hoover relied upon, and introduced the Carson contract as he understood it to be, and as he offered to prove it to be. He was not a party to that contract. It is not to the prejudice of Hoover's rights that in another action Baylor undertook to hold both Carson and wife under the writing, and induced Hoover to employ counsel in aid of that effort, and even paid a part of counsel's fee. Hoover did not offer the contract as a complete, valid contract, according to its apparent effect, claiming under one feature and repudiating or contradicting another, but offered it as the sole and exclusive contract of C. T. Carson according to its real meaning, purpose and effect. It is not considered that it was error in the trial court to allow the plaintiff (Hoover) to introduce this contract and to permit him to prove that it was C. T. Carson's contract, and as such in all respects valid and binding. The testimony of Hoover and Kennedy in contravention of the testimony for the defendant establishes the following material contentions of the plaintiff: That he secured Carson, and Carson only, as a buyer; that he took Carson to Baylor; that Baylor showed his entire farm to Carson; that they agreed upon the terms of sale; that the three went to Kennedy's office to have the same reduced to writing; that Baylor gave Kennedy all of the data for drawing the contract; that Carson said that he wanted his wife's name inserted; that Kennedy thereupon asked him the following question: "Is your wife going to be one of the purchasers; if so, she must sign the contract"—that Carson replied, "No;" that Carson said that he wanted the deed to be made jointly to him and her; that Mrs. Carson's name was included in the contract under the foregoing circumstances, and, as Kennedy understood, as "a guide for drawing the deed, as Carson wanted it made;" that Baylor was present and heard what passed between Carson and Kennedy; that Carson's request to have his wife's name inserted, not as a purchaser, but as a guide, when the deed came to be made, "was an unusual request, and as such impressed itself upon Kennedy."

It appears by implication in the record that at the time of his contract of purchase Carson, who was a carpenter and contractor, had $3,000 in bank, and was the owner in his own name of a farm in Augusta county, subsequently sold for a recited consideration of $2,000, and that Mrs. Carson was assessed with no property, real and personal, in Augusta county. It further appears that Baylor now has his farm, the cash payment of $500, less $50 paid to Hoover, and a judgment for $1,500 against Carson. This judgment may hereafter be enforced by proper proceedings against Carson's Augusta farm, which Mrs. Carson admits was sold to her son, "to get it out of the way." Mrs. C. T. Carson, who was introduced by the defendant, stated, among other things, that she had never authorized her husband by a power under seal to enter into a contract to buy the Baylor farm, or authorized or empowered him otherwise to buy said farm for her, and that she had nothing to do with the transaction.

The second assignment of error presents the same question of law raised by the first assignment. Hence, in overruling that assignment, as we do, substantial disposition is made of the second.

The third assignment of error is that the trial court erred in failing to sustain the motion to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, and for the admission of improper evidence. Having held that the evidence to which objection was made was properly received by the court, the motion to set aside the verdict on the ground of the admission of improper evidence must, of necessity, be overruled. The case was submitted to the jury under instructions that fully and correctly set out the law of the case appropriate to the respective contentions of the litigants, and the issues of fact were resolved by the jury in favor of the plaintiff.

[4] Conceding that credence should be given to the testimony for the plaintiff, that testimony fully sustains the verdict of the jury. Plaintiff in error seems to think that the case of Baylor v. Hoover, 123 Va. 659, 97 S. E. 309, in which the judgment of the court in the first trial of this controversy was reversed, is in some way decisive of the instant case on the merits of the controversy of fact. The paragraph relied on and cited by plaintiff in error from the opinion in said case is as follows (Whittle, J., delivering the opinion):

"Defendant [i. e., Baylor] listed his farm for sale with plaintiff at a named price, 'and, if sold,' agreed to pay him a commission of 5 per cent. 'on the total amount of the sale.' In point of fact the farm was never sold, though the evidence shows defendant did all in his power to consummate the sale that plaintiff under took to negotiate."

The trial court was reversed, in the case, supra, on two grounds:

First: On the ground that a peremptory instruction was granted by the court on request of the plaintiff, directing a verdict for the plaintiff on the basis of the latter's evidence. This action of the court was held to be fundamentally erroneous, in that the instruction given ignored defendant's theory of the case, and omitted all evidence tending to sustain it, such action being in contravention of the settled doctrine that an instruction which in substance directs a verdict must cover every phase of the case.

Second: On the ground that, as the evidence presented conflicting theories of the case, each party was entitled to instructions submitting his theory to the jury. In addition to reversal the case was remanded for a new trial, "leaving the parties free at the next trial to request such instructions as they may be advised are proper in the case as then presented."

The statement cited from the opinion, to wit, that "in point of fact the farm was never sold, though the evidence shows defendant [i. e., Baylor] did all in his power to consummate the sale that plaintiff undertook to negotiate," is not considered to be controlling in the instant case as a determination of fact.

Baylor endeavored to hold Mr. and Mrs. Carson as joint purchasers, but it was his, not Hoover's, contention that he (Hoover) had undertaken to negotiate a joint sale. The opinion refers to two theories of the case, and reversed the trial court on the ground that it ignored one of them. The plaintiff's theory was that he had furnished a single buyer, C. T. Carson, who had been accepted by Baylor, and had entered into a valid, binding contract. The theory of the defendant was that the plaintiff had produced joint purchasers, Mr. and Mrs. Carson, and that no valid, binding contract had been made with them. If the opinion supra referred to a joint sale, when it said the "farm was never sold, though * * * defendant did all in his power to consummate the sale," the reference was correct, since a jury had ascertained, in the case of Baylor v. Carson and Wife, that the latter were not joint purchasers.

It would hardly seem that the opinion referred to the sale to C. T. Carson, relied upon by the plaintiff, when it made the statement that "the farm was never sold." The sale to Carson was the sale that the plaintiff insisted had been made. His right to recover commissions was based upon the establishment of that sale. Plaintiff's evidence on the first trial that he had produced Carson, and Carson only, as a purchaser, and that a contract had been agreed upon between the latter and Baylor, was apparently so convincing, and the evidence supporting a contrary view so negligible, that the trial court gave an instruction ignoring the defendant's theory. It was on this account that the trial court was reversed and the case remanded, in order that the opposing theories might be presented to the jury under adequate instructions.

In view of the fact that the case was remanded to be tried on the merits, it seems in the highest degree unlikely that the court, in a statement not necessary to have been made, should have undertaken to decide the case against the plaintiff on the very question of fact directed to be submitted to the jury under instructions that would properly present the opposing theories of the litigants. If the Baylor farm "was never sold" to Carson, it followed as a matter of course that Hoover would not be entitled to commissions. His claim to commissions rested on that sale. Briefly put, no sale, no commissions. If the case of Baylor v. Hoover is an adverse adjudication of Hoover's contention that a sale had been made to Carson alone, then there was really nothing to be tried when the case was remanded. The very crux of Hoover's case was that such a sale had been effected. A decision contrary to that contention was conclusive of his case. We do not regard this case as intending to afford a prejudgment of the facts in issue in the case in judgment, or as intending to take from the jury the right to determine whether the Baylor farm was sold to C. T. Carson, and a valid written contract of sale effected between the parties, thereby entitling the agent to his commissions.

On the whole, we are of opinion that the instant case was properly tried, and that there are no errors in the record. The action of the trial court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

HART v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §564(4) — Commonwealth held to have proved venue.

In a prosecution for rape, where it was testified that the scene of the crime was on a road between the home of the prosecutrix, less than a half mile west of the city, and the limits of the city of Staunton, held, that venue was proved.

2. Criminal law §304(6)—Judicial notice taken of location of city within county.

The court will take judicial notice that the city of Staunton is located within the county of Augusta, and is so located therein that the county surrounds and extends to a distance of over 15 miles to the west of the corporate limits.

3. Criminal law §304(5)—Judicial notice taken of distances on map.

Courts will take judicial notice of distances as calculated by a map.

4. Criminal law §1213—Death for attempted rape not cruel or unusual punishment.

Punishment of death for the crime of attempt to commit rape was not contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution or Const. Va. 1776, § 9, which forbids cruel and unusual punishments, such punishment being within the limits prescribed by Code 1919, § 4767.

5. Criminal law §1213 — Statute permitting jury to punish attempt to rape by death not invalid.

Code 1919, § 4767, is not unconstitutional because it authorizes cruel and unusual punishment, in that it empowers juries, in their discretion, to impose the punishment of death for an attempt to commit rape, under Const. Va. 1776, § 9.

6. Criminal law §1213—What constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment."

Under Const. § 9, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments, only such punishments were prohibited as were regarded as cruel and unusual when such provision of the Constitution was adopted in 1776, namely, such bodily punishments as involve torture or lingering death, such as are inhumane and barbarous, as, for example, punishment by the rack, by drawing and quartering, leaving the body hung in chains, or on the gibbet, exposed to public view, and the like.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Cruel and Unusual Punishment.]

7. Criminal law §1213 — Electrocution not "cruel or unusual mode of punishment."

The punishment of death by electrocution is not a "cruel or unusual mode of punishment," under the Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution, and Const. Va. 1776, § 9.

8. Criminal law §304(2) — Common knowledge that attempted rape is as heinous as consummated offense.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the crime of attempted rape is well-nigh, if not altogether, as heinous as the consummated offense of rape, and that public indignation is as much aroused by the one offense as the other, where the full accomplishment of the criminal purpose is thwarted only by some extraneous circumstance, and that, unless there is a prompt conviction and a severe penalty imposed, a lynching is liable to result.

9. Criminal law §577 — Accused held given reasonable opportunity to employ counsel.

In prosecution for rape, where no motion was made for a continuance of the case, and there was a hung jury on a first trial, held that accused was given reasonable opportunity to employ counsel and prepare for trial, the same counsel representing accused on both trials.

10. Rape §53(1)—Verdict for attempted rape held not contrary to evidence.

In prosecution for rape, a verdict of guilt of attempted rape held not contrary to the evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Augusta County.

Henry Hart was convicted of an attempt to rape, and brings error. Affirmed.

In this case the accused was indicted in Augusta county on December 9, 1920, upon the charge of rape committed in that county upon the person of the prosecutrix, who was of the age of about 17 years. On the same day there was a trial by jury in said county, the accused being represented by counsel assigned by the court. The jury not having reached an agreement upon a verdict, the case was continued over to the next day, December 10th. On that day, it being found that the jury could not agree upon a verdict, by the consent of the accused and of the attorney for the commonwealth, and with the assent of the court, one of the jurors was withdrawn, the other members of the jury were discharged, and a new trial was ordered. Thereupon, on the same day, other persons qualified to serve as jurors were ordered to be ascertained and summoned according to law to attend the court the next morning at 10 o'clock, from whom a jury might be selected for the trial of the accused. On the next day, December 11th, the accused, being represented by the same counsel, was tried in said county before a jury duly constituted. That trial resulted in the verdict mentioned below.

The facts proven on the trial last mentioned are certified, and such facts and all of the proceedings in court on such trial appear in the record before us as follows:

"Certificate of Facts.

"Virginia Garber, at the time of the assault on her made by the defendant, Harry Hart, was about 17 years old. She was rather small for her age, and is a simple, good, unsophisticated country girl, who lives with her mother about half a mile west from the corporate limits of the city of Staunton on what is known as the Buttermilk Spring road. At the time of the assault, which was on the 8th of December, 1920, she was working and had worked for some time at a laundry in Staunton, and was accustomed to go to her work about 6 o'clock in the morning, and on the morning of the assault left at her accustomed hour, by her accustomed way, to go to work. Six o'clock at that season of the year is in the early dawn of the day—about daybreak; the sun rises at 7:15. Harry Hart, her assailant, is a full-grown negro man, aged 21 years, married, and lived with his wife and child in the same neighborhood in which Miss Garber lived, and was familiar with her customs and habits to the extent that he knew that she was in the habit of going along this road at this time to her work. The point in the road at which she was assaulted was a secluded one, shut off from the front by a sharp bend in the road, with a high bank on the left-hand side thereof coming to Staunton. Hart, on leaving home, took with him an old overskirt belonging to his wife, which he said was to be used by him to wipe up with at the infirmary at the Staunton Military Academy, where he worked, there having been a case of scarlet fever there, and slipped up behind Miss Garber and threw it over her head, and at the same time put his hand over her mouth to prevent any outcry. She struggled to the extent of her ability, and freed herself sufficiently to cry out once for help, and sufficiently loud for her sister, who was on her home porch somewhere about 300 yards off, to hear her. She continued to struggle to escape from him to the best of her ability and until she was about exhausted. The soft ground over which they struggled showed that this struggle had been long and serious. While the struggle was going on, two young white men, Cressman and Southards, traveling westward on this road, walking, came suddenly around the sharp bend in it, and saw this negro man and a woman struggling in the road. They recognized the fact that the man was a negro, but the light was dim at that hour and they did not recognize that the woman was a white woman. They saw that he had something over her face, either a cloth of some sort or his hand. These men thought that this was a negro having some difficulty with his wife or woman, and it was not their part to interfere, and they did not interfere.

"Miss Garber attempted to call out to them as they passed her in the road, within a few feet of her, but her voice was so muffled that she was unable to make herself heard, but these men after they had gone a short distance along this road past the scene of the struggle stopped about 20 or 30 feet from the accused and the woman. Hart looked back over his shoulder and saw that they had stopped and were observing him. He thereupon turned the girl loose. She saw the two white men, but did not then call to them, except when they were passing her as aforesaid, but started to walk to the nearest house in that section that was lighted and showing any signs of life, 414 yards away, went to it and called when she arrived, and, to throw off suspicion on the part of Hart, said that she had a letter for its owner, a Mrs.

Smith. When she got into the house, she immediately told of the assault, remained there until it was light enough to return to her home, when she related to her mother her experience. Her mother, in the shortest possible time, laid the facts before the police of Staunton. After Hart had turned her loose and after she had started for this house, he followed, they talking together as they went, and he said he would walk a little distance behind in order that anybody who saw them might not "think anything." Hart threw the overskirt in a ditch by the roadside a short distance from the point of the assault, and said that his reason for so doing was that he was frightened at what he had done.

"During the attack and towards the close of it, about the time that Cressman and Southards stopped, Hart took his hand from Miss Garber's mouth, but told her not to make any outcry. She then said to him that she was a good Christian girl, and wanted to continue to be one, to which he replied that she was the first Christian girl he had ever seen, and he would not harm her if she was a Christian girl; but he did not turn her loose, as has been stated before, until he saw that Cressman and Southards, who had passed him, had stopped in the road and were looking back to see what was going on.

"After the matter had been reported to the police, they took up the trail, and in a short time arrested Hart, who was working at the Staunton Military Academy. He was questioned, and gave an account of himself and of his movements which seemed to be satisfactory, and, as the girl could not identify him, he was turned loose and returned to the Staunton Military Academy. His account of himself was, in the meantime, investigated and found to be false, and in a short time he was rearrested, and, upon being questioned, admitted that he was the man they were looking for.

"At the first trial, Hart testified in his own behalf, and there was a hung jury. At the second trial, he testified in his own behalf also, and said that, while he had assaulted Miss Garber, it was not his intention to push that assault to its ultimate conclusion, but it was then shown that, under cross-examination, at his first trial he had admitted not only the assault on Miss Garber, but that he had intended when he made this assault upon her to rape her.

"Soon after Hart was arrested his underclothes which he had on at the time of the assault were examined, and there was found thereon stains of seminal fluid that seemed to be fresh.

"Miss Garber was not injured or bruised or thrown down, nor were her clothes torn. Hart did not put his hands under her clothes, nor use any vulgar language, or make to her any improper proposal. When he relaxed his efforts to consummate the assault, he kissed her. The evidence of those who knew him more or less casually was that he bore a good reputation as a law-abiding citizen before this trouble arose."

The foregoing were all of the facts that were proven, and thereupon the court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that an attempt in criminal law is an apparent unfinished crime, and hence is compounded of two elements, viz.: (1) The intent to commit the crime; and (2) a direct act done towards its commission, but falling short of the execution of the ultimate design. It need not, therefore, be the last proximate act to the consummation of the crime in contemplation, but is sufficient if it be an act apparently adapted to produce the result intended."

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused, with purpose and intent of committing a rape upon the prosecuting witness, Miss Garber, committed an overt act toward the accomplishment of such purpose which was of such a character apparently adapted to produce the result intended, then they should find the accused guilty of an attempt to commit rape, even though they may further believe that he subsequently voluntarily abandoned his purpose, and did no further act towards its accomplishment."

The court also, at the request of counsel for the prisoner, gave sundry instructions on his behalf, but these do not appear in the record on the appeal.

After the jury had heard all of the evidence, and had received the said instructions of the court, and had heard the argument of counsel, and before they retired from the jury box, the court charged them orally from the bench as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, you will now retire to the jury room to consult over a verdict, and, after you have retired, consider all of the evidence in the case carefully, and if, after a careful and painstaking consideration of all of the evidence in the case, you should believe that the defendant is not guilty, then say so and no more; but, if you should believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of attempt to commit rape, as charged in the indictment, then you will find him guilty, and fix his punishment at death, or, in your discretion, by confinement in the penitentiary not less than three nor more than eighteen years."

Thereupon the jury retired to the jury room to consult, and in a short time returned to the court and delivered the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find the accused, Harry Hart, guilty of attempted rape, under the within indictment, and ascertain and fix his punishment at death."

Thereupon the defendant, by counsel, moved the court to set aside the verdict of the jury and to grant him a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and to the evidence, but the court forthwith overruled the motion of the defendant, and rendered judgment against the defendant upon the said verdict, to which action of the court the defendant thereupon excepted.

Carter Braxton and Curry & Curry, all of Staunton, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile,

Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The assignments of error raise the questions which will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. Did the commonwealth prove the venue—that is, that the crime was committed in the county of Augusta?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

It is true that it is not expressly proved that the place at which the crime was committed was in the county of Augusta; but it is expressly proved that the prosecutrix lived about half a mile west from the corporate limits of the city of Staunton, on a certain road; that she was on her way, going along said road from her home toward her place of work in said city when she was assaulted; and that the point in the road at which she was assaulted was on the side of the road "coming to Staunton." It is further expressly proved that the cry of the prosecutrix for help, given while she was being assaulted, was "sufficiently loud for her sister, who was on her home porch, somewhere about 300 yards off, to hear her." The language of this statement of facts is, it is true, in itself obscure, since it is possible that the "home porch" referred to as being "about 300 yards off" may have been the home porch of the sister, and a different place from that of the home of the prosecutrix. But, in view of the context, in which no home of the sister is elsewhere mentioned, but the home of the prosecutrix is elsewhere therein expressly mentioned, the most natural and reasonable construction to be given to the language last quoted is that it refers to the home of the prosecutrix. This construction, as will also be observed, would give to the pronoun "her" the same meaning with that in which it is certainly first and last used in the phrase in question. This would locate the offense as having been committed about 300 yards east of the home of the prosecutrix, which would be about that distance less than approximately a half-mile west of the corporate limits of Staunton, and would accord with the other proved facts.

The only reasonable inference which can be drawn from these facts is that the place of the crime was west of, outside of, and less than one-half mile from the corporate limits of the city of Staunton.

[2] The location and boundaries of the county of Augusta and of the city of Staunton are designated in the legislation and referred to in the general laws of the state; and, moreover, it is geographical fact, shown by any map in common use, and thus a matter of common knowledge, that the city of Staunton is located within the county of Augusta, and is so located therein that the county of Augusta surrounds, and, beyond all question, extends for a distance of over 15 miles to the west of, the corporate limits of the city of Staunton. The court will therefore take judicial notice of that fact. McNeel v. Herold, 52 Va. (11 Gratt.) 309, 815, 316; 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. As said in McNeel v. Herold, supra, 52 Va. (11 Gratt.) 309:

"The objects sometimes called for are so connected with the general history or geography of the country, or its legislation, that they will be taken notice of by the courts and deemed of general notoriety and sufficiently identified without further proof. * * * In other cases, the objects called for possess but a local notoriety, or furnish a description * * * which must be verified and applied by means of facts to be ascertained on the spot. * * *

As said in 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, supra, p. 906:

"It has been held that courts will take judicial notice of the geographical position of the towns within their jurisdiction, but not as to foreign towns and cities. To this latter rule, however, there have been adjudged exceptions."

As said in Whart. on Law of Evidence, § 339:

"A court is bound to take judicial knowledge of the leading geographical features of the land; * * * the courts of a particular state know the boundaries of the state and its divisions into towns and counties and the limits of such divisions, * * * the positions of leading cities and villages in such states. * * *

[3] As is also said in the learned work last cited, § 335, supra:

"So the courts will take notice * * * of distances as calculated by a map."

In Indianapolis & Cincinnati R. Co. v. Case, supra, 15 Ind. 42, the plaintiff sued in Shelby county for the value of an animal alleged to have been killed by the railroad company in that county. The statute required the action to be brought in the county in which the animal was killed. The defendant railroad company raised the question of the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that the plaintiff failed to prove that the injury was committed in Shelby county. In the opinion of the Supreme Court this is held and said:

"No witness stated that the animal was killed in that county; yet several stated that it was killed on the railroad between two * * * geographical points, which we will judicially notice are in that county."

In Same v. Stephens, supra, 28 Ind. 431, the action was brought in Boone county for the killing of a horse in that county. The proof was "that the horse was killed about half a mile northwest of Hazelrigg Station." Held, that the court would take judicial knowledge of the geographical position of that station, and that the place in which the horse was killed, about 1½ miles west of it, was in Boone county.

In Hinckley v. Beckwith, 23 Wis. 328, the law was that the depositions of certain witnesses could not be read at the trial if they did not live more than 30 miles from the place of the trial. The place of trial was in Waupaca county. It appeared from the depositions that one of the witnesses resided at Necedah, in Juneau county, and the other in Leola, in Adams county. The court said:

"The place of residence of each witness is stated in his deposition; and the court, taking notice of the geographical divisions of the state, must know that they resided more than [30 miles] from the place of trial."

In Central, etc., Co. v. Gamble, supra, 77 Ga. 584, 3 S. E. 287, the court said:

"The declaration alleges that the injury complained of was done in the county of Talbot; and while the proof upon this question is not direct, yet it establishes that it occurred between two points—Bostick and Geneva—both located on the line of the railroad, in that county. At each of these points there are post offices, and we have held that the court will take judicial notice of the fact that they are located in the county."

It is true that there are decisions to the effect that courts will not take judicial notice of the distance between places in the same county, nor of the local situation and distances in a county (Anderson's Case, 100 Va. 864, 42 S. E. 865), nor that the boundary of a city or county is "located at a given spot" (Greenleaf on Ev. [16th Ed.] § 6). But these holdings have reference to places which are not incorporated, or located by general legislation, and which do not appear on maps in common use, and therefore have merely a local notoriety, or to cases in which the location in question, as judicially known from the legislation on the subject or from maps in common use, refers to a place so near the boundary line or lines in question as to leave the matter in doubt as to whether the location is within or outside of certain lines. In such case further specific evidence is needed to resolve the doubt. But in the instant case the geographical fact aforesaid, when considered in the light of the facts expressly proved, locate the locus of the crime so far within the boundary lines of the county, and outside those of the city, as to leave no room for reasonable doubt on the subject.

Therefore when the facts proved as aforesaid are considered along with the fact of which the court will take judicial notice, as aforesaid, it appears that the venue has been proved by the commonwealth beyond any reasonable doubt.

The circumstance that the police of the city of Staunton were called upon by the mother of the prosecutrix to arrest the accused, and that neither the sheriff of the county of Augusta, nor any one of his deputies, was called upon to make the arrest, is urged as circumstantial evidence that the crime was committed within the corporate limits of the city of Staunton; and West's Case, 125 Va. 747, 99 S. E. 654, is relied upon in argument for the accused on this subject. The conclusion drawn in the West Case, however, from the circumstance that the police of the city were called upon to make the arrest, was merely that it was one among a number of other circumstances which tended to show that the crime was committed within the jurisdiction of the police. But by statute the jurisdiction of the corporation courts of cities, and hence of the police of cities, extends one mile beyond the corporate limits. So that, in the instant case, the circumstance that the police of the city of Staunton were called upon to make the arrest could, at most, be considered only as a circumstance of no probative value upon the issue of fact under consideration, since it is equally consistent with the conclusion that the crime was committed outside of and within one mile of the corporate limits of the city of Staunton, as with the conclusion that it was committed within such corporate limits.

[4] 2. Was the punishment of death for the crime of an alleged attempt to commit rape, under the facts of the instant case, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution, or to section 9 of the Constitution of Virginia (1776), which forbids cruel and unusual punishments?

This question must be answered in the negative.

That the punishment was not contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment, see Collins v. Johnston, 237 U. S. 502, 509-510, 35 Sup. Ct. 649, 59 L. Ed. 1071.

As said by the Supreme Court in the case last cited:

"To establish appropriate penalties for the commission of crime, and to confer upon judicial tribunals a discretion respecting the punishment to be inflicted in particular cases, within limits fixed by the law-making power, are functions peculiarly belonging to the several states; and there is nothing to support the contention that the sentence imposed in this case [fourteen years' imprisonment for perjury] violates the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, either in depriving appellant of his liberty without due process of law, or in denying to him the equal protection of the laws"—citing Supreme Court cases.

[5] The punishment fixed by the verdict of the jury was within the limits prescribed by the statute (Code 1919, § 4767). The inquiry next to be considered, therefore, is the following: Is the statute unconstitutional because it authorizes cruel and unusual punishment in this, that it empowers juries in their discretion to impose the punishment of death for the attempt to commit rape?

The statute under consideration, so far as material, is as follows:

"Sec. 4767. * * * If the offense attempted be punishable with death, the person making such attempt shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years, *except that attempts to commit rape shall be punishable with death, or in the discretion of the jury, * * * by confinement in the penitentiary not less than three nor more than eighteen years.*"

The italicized language was added to the statute by an act of assembly approved January 15, 1894 (Acts 1893-94, p. 29), amending and re-enacting section 3888 of the Code of 1887.

Section 3888 of the Code of 1887, so far as material, reads as follows:

"If the offense attempted be punishable with death, the person making such attempt shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years, except that in cases of attempt to commit rape, the term of confinement in the penitentiary shall not be less than three nor more than eighteen years."

The present statute prescribing the punishment for rape upon a female at the age of 15 years or more, against her will, provides that the person guilty of such crime "shall, in the discretion of the jury, be punished with death or confinement in the penitentiary not less than five nor more than twenty years." Acts 1918, p. 139. The age of consent has been changed from time to time, being the age of 12 under the Code of 1887, § 3680, made 14 by Acts 1895-96, p. 673, 16 by Code 1919, § 4414, and 15 by Acts 1918, p. 139. Subject to these changes in the age of consent, the punishment for rape was not less than 10 nor more than 20 years under the Code of 1887, § 3680, and was changed to not less than 5 nor more than 20 years by Acts 1895-96, p. 673, and has so remained since that time.

[6] It has been uniformly held by this court that the provisions in question in the Virginia Constitution, which have remained the same as they were originally adopted in the Virginia Bill of Rights of 1776, must be construed to impose no limitation upon the legislative right to determine and prescribe by statute the quantum of punishments deemed adequate by the Legislature; that the only limitation so imposed is upon the mode of punishments, such punishments only being prohibited by such constitutional provision as were regarded as cruel and unusual when such provision of the Constitution was adopted in 1776, namely, such bodily punishments as involve torture or lingering death—such as are inhumane and barbarous—as, for example, punishment by the rack, by drawing and quartering, leaving the body hung in chains, or on the gibbet, exposed to public view, and the like. Aldridge's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 447, 449, 450; Wyatt's Case, 6 Rand. (27 Va.) 694; Bracey's Case, 119 Va. 867, 872, 89 S. E. 144.

In Aldridge's Case, supra, 2 Va. Cas. 449, 450, the penalty imposed by the judgment of the trial court on a "free person of color" for the crime of grand larceny was that he be sold as a slave, transported, and banished beyond the United States, and that he be given, in addition, 39 stripes on his bare back. This punishment was authorized by the statute, and the judgment was held to be valid. The court said:

"As to the ninth section of the Bill of Rights, denouncing cruel and unusual punishments, we have no notion that it has any bearing on this case. That provision was never designed to control the legislative right to determine ad libitum upon the adequacy of punishment. * * * We had existed for a considerable time as a community, regulated by laws guarded by penal sanctions, when this Bill of Rights was declared. We consider these sanctions as sufficiently rigorous, and we knew that the best heads and hearts of the land of our ancestors had long and loudly declaimed against the wanton cruelty of many of the punishments practiced in other countries; and this section in the Bill of Rights was framed effectually to exclude these, so that no future Legislature, in a moment perhaps of great and general excitement, should be tempted to disgrace our Code by the introduction of any of those odious modes of punishment."

In Wyatt's Case, supra, 6 Rand. (27 Va.) 694, the statute involved provided:

"That henceforth when any person shall be convicted of any crime, or offense, now punishable by imprisonment in the public jail and penitentiary house for a period not exceeding two years, such person shall, instead of the punishment now prescribed by law, undergo imprisonment in the jail of the county or corporation where such conviction shall take place, for a period not more than six months, nor less than one month, at the discretion of the court, and * * * shall moreover be punished with stripes, at the discretion of the court, to be inflicted at one time, or at different times during such confinement, as such court may direct, provided the same do not exceed thirty-nine at any one time."

The court held that the statute was not contrary to the section of the Bill of Rights under consideration, and in this connection said:

"The punishment of offenses by stripes is certainly odious, but cannot be said to be unusual. This court, regarding the discretion delegated by the act in question, as being of the same character with the discretion always exercised by common-law courts to inflict fines and imprisonment, and subject to be restrained by the same considerations, does not feel itself at liberty in this case to refuse to obey the legislative will, nor to execute that will by its judgments."

[7] The punishment of death by electrocution (which is the present mode of inflicting the death penalty in Virginia), as is well settled, cannot in itself be regarded as a cruel or unusual mode of punishment. People ex rel. Kemmler v. Durston, 119 N. Y. 577, 24 N. E. 6, 7 L. R. A. 715, 16 Am. St. Rep. 859; In re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519; Hobbs v. State, 133 Ind. 404, 32 N. E. 1019, 18 L. R. A. 774; State v. Wanisley, 68 W. Va. 103, 69 S. E. 475; State v. Woodard, 68 W. Va. 66, 69 S. E. 386, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1004; McElvaine v. Brush, 142 U. S. 155, 12 Sup. Ct. 156, 35 L. Ed. 971—to mention only a few of the authorities on the subject.

As said in consideration of the Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution (which is practically in the same language as section 9 of the Virginia Constitution) in Re Kemmler, supra, 136 U. S. 436, 447, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 933, 34 L. Ed. 519, 524:

"Punishments are cruel when they involve torture or a lingering death; but the punishment of death is not cruel, within the meaning of that word as used in the Constitution. It implies there something inhuman and barbarous—something more than the mere extinguishment of life."

However, there has been for a long while a difference of judicial opinion on the subject under consideration. And while a large majority of the American courts have taken the same view of the subject as that of the Virginia court, a minority of them have held that the constitutional provision in question imposes a limitation, not alone upon the legislative right to determine and prescribe by statute the mode of punishments, but also upon the quantum of punishments, upon the theory that punishment should be proportional to the gravity of the offense, and that punishment may by its length, or other severity, be so disproportioned to the offense as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition. There is a comprehensive review of the authorities on the subject in the majority and minority opinions of the Supreme Court in the case of Weems v. United States, 217 U. S. 349, 30 Sup. Ct. 544, 54 L. Ed. 793, 19 Ann. Cas. 705, which renders it unnecessary for us to do more in review of the authorities than to refer to those opinions. Only seven of the judges of the Supreme Court sat in that case and only six of those were on the bench when the case was decided, of whom two dissented, leaving the majority opinion that of only four judges, a minority of the whole court of nine judges. Mr. Justice White filed an elaborate dissenting opinion, in which Mr. Justice Holmes concurred. The majority opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice McKenna. The latter opinion adopted the aforesaid view of the minority of the American decisions on the subject under consideration; but as the number of judges holding that view was less than a majority of the full court, that case cannot be considered to have settled the question, and it may be fairly said to be still an open question in so far as the authority of the Supreme Court is concerned.

However, we do not mean to say that the question under consideration is a closed question in Virginia. We feel that there is great force in the view that a statute might be enacted prescribing a punishment in quantum so severe for a comparatively trivial offense that it would be so out of proportion to the crime as to shock the conscience; that we would hold, and the courts of the state should hold, the statute void as in conflict with section 9 of the Virginia Constitution, although the mode of the punishment were not unusual. But such holding, even according to the majority opinion in the Weems Case, would have to be based upon the conclusion that plainly there could be found nothing in the conditions existing in the state and the circumstances of terror and danger accompanying the species of crime dealt with to give character and degree to it commensurate with the punishment prescribed by the statute, and that the legislative action was manifestly induced by some momentary impulse or passion, and was not well founded when considered from the standpoint of penal justice.

As said in the majority opinion in the Weems Case:

"We disclaim the right to assert a judgment against that of the Legislature of the expediency of the laws or the right to oppose the judicial power to the legislative power to define crimes and fix their punishment, unless that power encounters in its exercise a constitutional prohibition. * * * There must be a comprehension of all that the Legislature did or could take into account—that is, a consideration of the mischief and the remedy. * * * There is a certain subordination of the judiciary to the Legislature. The function of the Legislature is primary, its exercises fortified by presumptions of right and legality, and is not to be interfered with lightly, nor by any judicial conception of their wisdom or propriety. * * * We have expressed these elementary truths to avoid the misapprehension that we do not recognize to the fullest the wide range of power that the Legislature possesses to adapt its penal laws to conditions as they may exist and to punish the crimes of men according to their forms and frequency. We do not intend in this opinion to express anything that contravenes those propositions."

Referring with approval to the holding in Territory v. Ketchum, 10 N. M. 718, 65 Pac. 169, 55 L. R. A. 90, that a statute, which imposed the death penalty upon any person who should make an assault upon any railroad train, car, or locomotive, for the purpose and with the intent to commit murder, robbery, or other felony upon a passenger or employee, etc., was not in violation of the Eighth Amendment to the federal Constitution, the Supreme Court majority opinion continues as follows:

"The Supreme Court of the territory * * * rested its decision upon the conditions which existed in the territory and the circumstances of terror and danger which accompanied the crime denounced. So also may we mention the legislation of some of the states enlarging the common-law definition of burglary, and dividing it into degrees, fixing a severer punishment for that committed in the nighttime from that committed in the daytime, and for arson of buildings in which human beings may be from arson of buildings which may be vacant. In all such cases there is something more to give character and degree to the crimes than the seeking of a felonious gain, and it may properly become an element in the measure of their punishment."

[8] The same is true of the case before us. It is a matter of history of the state, and of common knowledge among its people, that the crime of attempted rape is well-nigh, if not altogether, as heinous as the consummated offense of rape. It is well known that public indignation is as much aroused by the one offense as the other, where the full accomplishment of the criminal purpose is thwarted only by some extraneous circumstance. And the almost universal repugnance which exists in the public mind to the making of the degree of the crime depend upon whether there has been an actual penetration or merely an attempted penetration, and the general aversion to the putting of the prosecutrix through the indecent and harrowing ordeal of having to testify in court upon such a subject, are well known. The likelihood of the resort to lynch law, unless there is a prompt conviction and a severe penalty imposed, and thus a resultant grave shock to the peace and dignity of the commonwealth, is well known to exist, almost, if not quite equally, in the case of an attempted as of a consummated rape. These are considerations which the Legislature properly could, and which, therefore, we must conclude the Legislature did, take into account as an element of the measure of the punishment in enacting the statute under consideration, and fully justified the severity of the extreme penalty allowed by the statute to be imposed, even from the standpoint of the holding of the majority opinion in the Weems Case. Indeed the changes in the statute itself since the Code of 1887, which have been referred to, making the maximum and minimum punishment more nearly alike for attempted rape with that for the consummated crime, furnishes internal evidence in the statute itself that the Legislature in its enactment in its present form has followed and conformed the law to a matured public sentiment on the subject of the punishment deemed commensurate with the crime, and has not acted under the influence of any momentary impulse engendered by excitement or passion.

It will be observed, however, that the statute law on the subject still recognizes some difference in the heinousness of the respective offenses, in that the minimum penalty prescribed for rape is 5 years, whereas that for attempted rape is only 3 years, in the penitentiary; and the maximum confinement in the penitentiary for rape is 20 years, whereas that for attempted rape is 18 years.

Therefore, without at this time deciding the general question of whether the constitutional provision under consideration does or does not impose a limitation upon the legislative power of prescribing the quantum of punishments for crimes, we hold that the statute in question in the instant case is not violative of the Constitution, and that the punishment imposed upon the accused in the instant case, in accordance with the authority of such statute, was a lawful punishment, and cannot be disturbed by us as prohibited by the Constitution of Virginia.

The authorities, consisting of 1 Bish. New Cr. Law, § 604 (5); 1 Wharton's Cr. Law (11th Ed.) §§ 238, 308, referred to and relied on in argument for the accused on the subject of punishments, address themselves to the philosophic theories upon which penal legislation is, or should be, based, and do not at all treat of the power, or lack of power, in the courts to hold such legislation invalid because not in accord with what may be considered the correct theory. The former subject has furnished a theme for endless discussion among philosophers, criminologists, and other writers, both in ancient and modern times. See sections 1, 10, 12, of 1 Wharton's Criminal Law, and notes thereto, among which is a reference to a philosophic article by Sir Edward Fry, which points out that there are cases in which the attempt to commit an offense completes the crime so far as it relates to the criminal, as (to quote the example instanced by the learned writer), where "the gun has been loaded, the victim has been tracked, the watch has been kept through long hours of patient wickedness, the gun has been aimed and discharged, but the victim escapes." The writer adds:

"On the primary principles of punishment, that man appeared to be worthy to be punished as a murderer."

So, in the instant case, the cloth to smother the outcry has been gotten ready, the victim has been tracked, the watch has been kept through the hours of wickedness needed to accomplish the waylaying (how long does not appear in the record), the assault has been made upon a girl of 17 and continued in the darkness in a manner demonstrating an absolutely fixed intent to accomplish the crime intended; this conduct is persisted in against the desperate struggles of the victim until she is about exhausted, but the victim escapes. The jury were fully warranted by the facts proved in concluding that the escape was not due to any voluntary relenting on the part of the assailant, but solely to one of two extraneous and unexpected happenings, or to both of them, namely: to the fact that he looked back over his shoulder and saw that the two men, Cressman and Southards "had stopped about 20 or 30 feet from the accused and * * * were observing him," at which time "he turned the girl loose"; or to the fact that, in the struggle, the discharge of seminal fluid, mentioned in the certificate of facts, had rendered the accused impotent to accomplish his purpose for the time being. And the parting kiss, and the blandishments, bestowed under the circumstances, were sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in believing that the aforesaid purpose of the accused still remained fixed, notwithstanding the unanticipated miscarriage of the undertaking upon that occasion, if haply he might later find, or make, another and a more propitious occasion. And this continued purpose, coupled with the presence of the two observers, was sufficient evidence to account to the jury for the fact that no other violence was used against the prosecutrix following the abortive assault.

[9] 3. Was the accused given reasonable opportunity to employ counsel and prepare for trial?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

We find nothing in the record indicating that the accused was not given reasonable opportunity to employ counsel and prepare for trial. No motion was made for a continuance of the case. We cannot assume that if there had been any reasonable ground for a continuance a motion would not have been made by the counsel assigned by the court, who represented the accused upon his two trials in the court below. There is no indication in the record that the accused was not entirely ready for trial on both occasions. The fact that there was a hung jury on the first trial would indicate that the defense of the accused was fully and ably presented by his counsel on that trial. The second trial occurred two days after the beginning of the first trial, and the same counsel then represented the accused as on his first trial.

In Harris v. State, 9 Okl. Cr. 658, 132 Pac. 1121, relied on in behalf of the accused, the trial was had on the very day the amended information was filed on which the defendant was tried. But this was over the objection of the defendant made at the time, the court overruling his motion for a delay (which, by the way, asked for a postponement of only 24 hours), and forcing him into immediate trial.

The sole remaining question presented for our decision by the assignments of error is the following:

[10] 4. Is the verdict contrary to the evidence?

This question also must be answered in the negative.

It is contended in behalf of the accused that the verdict is so plainly contrary to the evidence as to shock the conscience of and to satisfy the court that the jury must have been influenced by passion or prejudice. We find ourselves unable to agree with this view of the subject.

In this connection we refer to what we have said above concerning the facts of the case and the inferences we think the jury were reasonably warranted in drawing therefrom. To what we have there said we think it necessary for us to add but little here.

Woodson's Case, 107 Va. 895, 59 S. E. 1097, is strongly relied upon in argument for the accused as authority for the position that there is not sufficient evidence in the instant case to show that the accused intended to attempt to commit the crime of rape. The distinguishing feature in Woodson's Case was that in that case there was no attempt to use force—only solicitation. In the instant case there was no solicitation, and there is the uncontroverted fact of the use of violent force by the accused in the effort to overcome the desperate struggle of the prosecutrix, which force was continued until the latter was almost exhausted, and was then terminated only because of one or both of the extraneous reasons above indicated, as the jury were warranted in believing from the facts proved.

As to the intent with which the assault was made: The mode of the attack and the manner in which the force was exerted, unaccompanied by any explanation or indication in the facts certified tending to show any other motive, was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the accused intended the natural result indicated by his conduct as intended—namely, the rape of the prosecutrix. Moreover, it was shown in evidence that on his first trial the accused admitted that the assault was made with that intent.

There are various other positions taken in argument for the accused, which are not taken in the assignments of error, and which therefore ordinarily would not be considered by us. But, in view of the fact that human life is involved, we have not allowed this consideration to deter us from considering every argument presented in behalf of the accused. We deem it sufficient to say, however, concerning the positions not embraced in the assignments of error, that we have carefully considered them all, and have been unable to find any merit in them.

This case must therefore be Affirmed.

(121 Va. 814)

SNARR v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law \S 365(2)—Testimony as to defendant's arrest for driving automobile while intoxicated, in prosecution for transporting liquor, held admissible.

In prosecution for unlawful transportation of liquor following discovery of liquor in defendant's possession after being arrested for driving automobile while intoxicated, testimony as to his arrest on such other charge held admissible as against contention that it related to another offense, being part of the res gestæ.

2. Criminal law \S 899—Defendant waived objection to testimony as to certain facts by testifying and by cross-examining witnesses as to such facts.

In prosecution for unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquors, defendant, having cross-examined witnesses for state as to his arrest on the charge of driving automobile while intoxicated and circumstances preceding arrest, and having himself fully testified as to such facts, could not complain of the admission of testimony as to such facts, having waived objections thereto.

3. Intoxicating liquors \S 138—Carried by automobile driver in pocket of coat not carried in his "baggage" within prohibition act.

Prohibition Act, \S 39, permitting traveler to carry certain amount of liquor in his "baggage," did not permit automobile driver to carry whisky bottle in coat being worn by him, such liquor being carried on his person, and not in his "baggage," within the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Baggage.]

4. Intoxicating liquors \S 131—Transportation of liquor unlawful, though not for purpose of sale.

Under Acts 1918, c. 888, \S 3, making it unlawful "to manufacture, transport, sell, keep or store for sale" the transportation of liquor is unlawful, regardless of whether it is transported for the purpose of sale, since the words "for sale" merely qualify the preceding words "keep or store," and not the words "manufacture" and "transport."

5. Criminal law \S 419, 420(10), 1169(12) — Witnesses \S 246(1) — Testimony on court's examination that witness had heard defendant had driven automobile while intoxicated held hearsay and reversible error.

In prosecution of a physician of good reputation for unlawful transportation of liquor, in which defendant disclaimed having intentionally violated the law and asked for instruction precluding a jail sentence under Acts 1918, c. 388, § 5, court's examination of witness as to whether witness had heard, prior to the transaction leading to defendant's arrest, that defendant had operated automobile while under the influence of liquor, and answer of witness that he had so heard, held irrelevant, hearsay, and prejudicial error on appeal from judgment based on verdict fixing punishment as confinement in jail.

6. Criminal law \Rightarrow 369(6)—Statute precluding imposition of jail sentence in event of unintentional violation does not justify admission of evidence of other offenses.

Acts 1918, c. 388, § 5, providing that, if it shall appear to the court in the prosecution for a violation of the prohibition act that there has been no intentional violation, the court shall instruct the jury not to impose a jail sentence, did not authorize the court in prosecution for unlawful transportation of liquor to make inquiries as to other possible offenses by defendant in violation of prohibition law, but merely relates to the punishment to be inflicted in case it appeared that the violation of a particular charge was unintentional after a trial under the same rules of evidence and according to the same methods of practice and procedure as in other criminal cases.

7. Criminal law \Rightarrow 1152(1)—Exercise of discretion not reviewed unless abused or unless ruling was based on irregular and inadmissible evidence.

In prosecution for violation of the prohibition act, refusal to charge jury not to impose jail sentence under Acts 1918, c. 388, § 5, requiring court to so charge, if it shall appear that the violation of the statute was not intentional, will not be reviewed on appeal except in case of clear abuse of discretion or where based upon irregular and inadmissible evidence.

8. Intoxicating liquors \Rightarrow 242½, New, vol. 13A Key-No. Series—Requiring reputable physician to execute bond against violation of prohibition act on conviction of transportation of liquor held improper.

In prosecution for transportation of liquor, in which defendant was a physician of good reputation and of high standing, and claimed the violation of the statute to have been unintentional, action of court in requiring defendant to execute a bond conditioned that he would not violate the prohibition act for the term of one year under Acts 1918, c. 388, § 43, held improper in absence of evidence that defendant was likely to again violate the act.

Error to Circuit Court, Rockingham County.

S. S. Snarr was convicted of unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

E. D. Ott, of Harrisonburg, and M. L. Walton, of Woodstock, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile,

Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. The accused was convicted of the unlawful transportation of intoxicating liquor, and sentenced to pay a fine of $50 and be confined in the county jail for one month.

The facts shown are that he is a physician of high standing and reputation in his community, who left his home at Mt. Jackson for Harrisonburg, driving his own automobile, his purpose being to meet his brother, a physician and surgeon of Harrisonburg, intending to go from there to Staunton to board a train at 7:30 in the evening for Danville, to attend the wedding of a nephew, which was to take place there the next day. Before starting he took a drink of intoxicating liquor in his own home. He claims that he discovered that there was something wrong with the steering gear of his automobile before he left Mt. Jackson; that when he called the attention of a mechanic to it he was told, in substance, that the trouble was slight, and that probably it would not give him any serious trouble. On his way he had two collisions with other travelers on the highway, as the result of the second of which his car was left in the ditch on the side of the road and could not be further operated. He claims that the cause of these collisions was the failure of the steering apparatus of the machine to operate properly. On the other hand, the commonwealth attributes his inability to control his car and these collisions to the fact that he was very much intoxicated. After the second collision, he transferred his valise to a motortruck which was returning towards Mt. Jackson, his purpose being to return home. On this return journey he was overtaken by the sheriff and his deputy, who had a warrant charging him with reckless driving, which warrant had been issued upon the complaint of a commercial traveler with whose machine he had collided, for which offense he has since been tried and fined. When the officers arrested him upon this warrant he had in his overcoat pocket, which he was at that time wearing, a pint bottle partly filled with whisky. There is some confusion in the testimony as to the precise quantity of liquor remaining in the bottle. This prosecution and conviction is the result of this discovery.

It was shown by a large number of highly reputable witnesses, and no attempt was made to contradict them, that the accused is a man who had a very high reputation for truth and veracity; that he was well beloved and respected both as a physician and as a man; and that he was in full practice. He testified that he did not know that he violated any law; that when he left home the partly filled bottle was put in his valise, and that afterwards, when he took the truck to return home, the bottle rattled against a mirror, or perhaps some other articles in the valise, and for fear that one or the other might break he took the bottle out and put it in his overcoat pocket; that he thought that the law allowed him thus to carry not exceeding one quart of intoxicating liquor for his personal use.

Taking up the errors which are assigned, we find that certain witnesses for the commonwealth were allowed to testify as to the events which preceded the finding of the liquor in his overcoat pocket, and it is claimed that, inasmuch as the prosecution is for the unlawful transportation of liquor, the testimony relating to the other misdemeanor with which he had been charged—that is the reckless driving—was impertinent and irrelevant to the issue.

[1, 2] Of course, this rule is universally accepted, but it would have been difficult for the witnesses to have detailed the pertinent facts without at least some allusion to this charge of reckless driving. The officers, for instance, had to explain why they were about to arrest him, and the testimony which was received merely gave the attending circumstances. It was properly admissible as part of the res gestæ. In addition to this, the attorneys for the accused, on cross-examination, inquired into these occurrences which preceded the discovery of the liquor at the time of his arrest, and the accused himself also fully related his recollection of all the circumstances immediately preceding his arrest. He therefore must be held to have waived his original objection to this testimony, so that, even if incompetent, it furnishes no ground for reversal. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Taliaferro, 95 Va. 522, 28 S. E. 879; Moore Lumber Corp. v. Walker, 110 Va. 775, 87 S. E. 374, 19 Ann. Cas. 314; Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Barger, 112 Va. 688, 72 S. E. 693.

Another assignment of error is the giving to the jury at the instance of the commonwealth an instruction which reads thus:

"The jury are instructed that, if they believe from the evidence that the accused, S. S. Snarr, had on his person while traveling on the Valley turnpike ardent spirits, even though the quantity be only six ounces, then he is guilty of unlawfully transporting liquor, as charged in the indictment."

[3] It is urged that this instruction ignores that provision of section 39 of the prohibition act (Laws 1918, c. 388) which permits a traveler to carry "in his baggage for the bona fide use of himself or his family, and not as a means of evading the intent and meaning of this act, ardent spirits not in excess of one quart." It is insisted that this provision authorizes one to carry with him, under his personal control, not to exceed one quart of intoxicating liquor, without reference to the manner in which it is carried.

It seems to us that the language of the act is so clear as hardly to need interpretation, and that it fails to sustain this contention. The language creates an exception to the general inhibition, and permits a traveler to carry a limited quantity of liquor in the baggage. The general inhibitions of the statute are qualified by the language of the permission authorizing it to be carried in the baggage, and the inference therefrom is that it cannot be carried on the person outside of his baggage.

We have been referred to several cases arising between travelers and common carriers defining baggage. A typical case is that of Toledo, Wabash & Western R. Co. v. Hammond, 33 Ind. 379, 5 Am. Rep. 221, in which the traveler's opera glasses, which were in his trunk, which was lost, were held to be a part of his baggage, and it is shown from the definitions referred to in that case that baggage consists of apparel, ornaments, a few books for the amusement of reading, a watch, ladies' jewelry, and, according to 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. 180, it is said:

"From analogy to the foregoing articles, it will be obvious that the term 'baggage' must comprehend an almost infinite number and variety of articles not enumerated here."

Then in Macrow v. The Great Western Railway Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 612, 3 Albany Law Journal, 476, this definition of "baggage" is found:

"We hold the true rule to be that whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities, or the ultimate purpose, of the journey, must be considered as personal luggage. This would include not only all articles of apparel, whether for use or ornament, * * * but also the gun case or the fishing apparatus of the sportsman, the easel of the artist on a sketching tour, or the books of the student, and other articles of an analogous character, the use of which is personal to the traveler, and the taking of which has arisen from the fact of his journeying."

Then the question of what is baggage has arisen under the statutes imposing customs duties on importations, and it has been held that a package of precious stones found in the pocket of a passenger is forfeitable under the federal statute (U. S. Comp. St. § 5490) forbidding the concealment of dutiable articles and imposing duties on such articles "found in the baggage of any person arriving within the United States." Two Hundred and Eighteen and One-Half Carats Loose Emeralds v. United States, 154 Fed. 830, 83 C. C. A. 475.

These questions raised in these two lines of cases, however, are not similar to that here involved. This question is not whether intoxicating liquor is baggage, nor is there any question as to the concealment of imported articles with intent to evade the customs duties. The language here does not require us to ascertain whether or not, under certain circumstances, intoxicating liquor may or may not constitute baggage of the traveler. The statute assumes that the traveler has baggage, and expressly authorizes him to carry as much as one quart of ardent spirits therein. Elaboration is confusing rather than illuminating. As above indicated, the express permission to carry in the baggage is here equivalent to an inhibition against carrying it on the person; and intoxicating liquor carried in the pocket of the traveler's clothing which he is at the time wearing is being carried on his person, and not in his baggage. It may very well be that a traveler, by means of a shawl strap, or some other container, may lawfully carry one quart of liquor in his overcoat pocket, that overcoat being not on his person, but carried as a separate bundle or package; but, the evidence here being that the overcoat was at the time worn by the accused as a part of his apparel, it seems to us perfectly clear that the liquor was carried on his person, and not in his baggage. So that the refusal of the instruction was clearly right.

The law prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons has long been in force, and we think we risk nothing in saying that one who carries a weapon in his baggage does not violate the statute prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons on his person, and by implication the prohibition against the carrying of intoxicating liquor upon the person is by this statute as clear and undoubted as the prohibition against carrying weapons concealed on the person.

It is not difficult to appreciate the policy which permits one to carry a limited quantity of liquor concealed from common view in his baggage, while it prohibits the carrying of liquor upon the person, easily accessible for immediate use as a temptation to public drinking, both to the traveler himself and to others.

[4] It is also claimed that this instruction was erroneous because it was clear that the liquor was not being transported for sale. This contention is based upon the language of section 3, reading thus:

"It shall be unlawful for any person in this state to manufacture, transport, sell, keep, or store for sale, offer, advertise or expose for sale, give away or dispense or solicit in any way, or receive orders for or aid in procuring ardent spirits, except as hereinafter provided." Acts 1918, p. 578.

We think the language clearly does not bear the construction contended for. The words "for sale" there merely qualify the words immediately preceding, "keep, or store." It is lawful under some circumstances to keep or store a limited quantity of intoxicating liquor, but it is unlawful to keep or store such liquor for sale, except as it is expressly authorized for sacramental, medicinal, scientific, mechanical, or pharmaceutical purposes. The context and punctuation of the sentence demonstrates this. It is generally unlawful to manufacture liquor, whether for sale or not, as well as to transport liquor, whether for sale or not, and as to these offenses there is no qualification suggested by the structure of the sentence, for immediately following the prohibition against transportation of liquor is the prohibition against the sale of liquor as an independent misdemeanor under the statute. Burton v. Commonwealth, 122 Va. 847, 94 S. E. 923.

There is no error in the instruction; for under the circumstances it was unlawful for the accused to transport liquor in this state, except in his baggage, whether for sale or not.

The court also refused other instructions based upon the same erroneous view of the law, and what we have said is sufficient to indicate our opinion that these were also properly refused.

The assignment of error which raises the gravest doubt and demands the most careful consideration is based upon that provision of the statute, section 5 (Acts 1918, p. 579), reading thus:

"* * * But where upon the trial of any charge of a violation of this act, it shall appear to the court trying the case that there has been no intentional violation of any provision thereof, but an unintentional or inadvertent violation thereof, then such court shall instruct the jury that they cannot impose a jail sentence."

The accused asked the court to instruct the jury under this section not to impose a jail sentence, upon the ground that there had been no intentional violation of the act, but the court refused to do so. This refusal to give this instruction should be considered in connection with an exception to certain evidence to which the accused also excepted.

While the witness Paxton Williamson was under examination, and after he had testified to the excellent reputation of Dr. Snarr for veracity as a physician and as a citizen, the record shows the following questions and answers:

"The Court: Did you ever hear of his operating his car too rapidly, as a fast driver, reckless driver, when under the influence of liquor?"

"Witness: Your honor, I can't say to my certain knowledge that I ever saw Dr. Snarr—"

"The Court: Did you ever hear of Dr. Snarr operating his car when under the influence of liquor?"

"Mr. Ott: Your honor, please, with all deference to the court, I want to object to the questions you have asked. I did not know the charge here was reckless driving, but thought it was for bootlegging. (Objection overruled. Exception.)"

"Witness: No, sir; I can't say that I have. I want to qualify my statement to this extent:

Rumor has it that he operated a car under the influence of liquor, but whether he did or not I do not know.

"The Court: The question of the court was, did you ever hear that he did that, ever hear any rumor of that sort?"

"Witness: In this case at the bar I have heard it.

"The Court: But prior to this occurrence on the pike down there did you ever hear that he had operated his car while under the influence of liquor?"

"Witness: I don't think I have.

"The Court: You never heard it before that time?"

"Witness: No, sir; I don't think I did.

"The Court: Did you ever hear anybody speak of any other occasion when it was done by him?"

"Witness: That Dr. Snarr operated his car when under the influence of liquor?"

"The Court: Yes, sir; prior to this case here.

"Witness: Yes, sir; I have."

[5] The accused was on trial for the unlawful transportation of liquor, and it is clear that this testimony was irrelevant and immaterial on that issue. Under the inquisitorial questions of the court, the witness was led to testify that he had heard prior to the case on trial that Dr. Snarr had operated his car while under the influence of liquor. The testimony did not remotely affect the charge that the accused had unlawfully transported liquor, and its relation to the general reputation of Dr. Snarr was also remote. The examination proceeded further, and the witness testified that he did not know anything about the truth or falsity of that accusation; that he had seen Dr. Snarr quite frequently in his car; never saw him when he was operating his car under the influence of liquor; that he had a large practice; was going about in his car every day; was regarded as one of the best citizens in the community; and was generally loved in the community as a physician and as a man. One result of the introduction of the testimony is to show that the witness had heard that Dr. Snarr had violated some other provision of the law. Our first impression as to this testimony, which seems to us so clearly inadmissible, both because it was hearsay and irrelevant, was that it should be held to be harmless error, because the other evidence showed without contradiction that Dr. Snarr was carrying intoxicating liquor upon his person, and, the jury having given him the minimum penalty, this error constitutes no ground for reversal, because no prejudice to the accused was shown. Upon mature consideration, however, we feel that the error was injurious, when considered in connection with Dr. Snarr's testimony that his violation of the statute was inadvertent, because he thought that he had the right to carry that quantity with him in any way that he saw fit.

[6] This clause of the statute was enacted with the manifest purpose to relieve against undue hardship which might arise where it was shown that the offense was inadvertent, slight, with little relation to the general intent to prohibit traffic in intoxicating liquor, and in such cases to provide a slighter punishment to be inflicted on guilty persons, if it appeared to the trial court that the ends of justice would be thereby subserved. It was not the legislative intent to change the rules of evidence or the methods of practice and procedure in criminal cases; nor was it thereby intended that the conduct of prosecutions under this act should differ from prosecutions for other misdemeanors. The General Assembly apparently intended to provide that, if in such a prosecution this defense was made, where not made as a mere subterfuge by habitual or deliberate violators of the law, and it did not appear from the other legitimate evidence introduced upon the trial that there had been other violations of the statute, then that there should be no imprisonment. Such other violations might very well incidentally appear from the evidence. For instance, under a prosecution for the unlawful transportation of liquor, it might appear that liquor was being illegally sold or unlawfully dispensed during the journey. We do not think, however, that it could possibly mean that during the trial for a specific offense the court could divert attention from the crime charged, for which the accused was being prosecuted, and investigate other possible offenses in order to determine whether the extreme or the modified punishment should be inflicted. To make such an investigation before the jury would certainly have a tendency to prejudice the accused as to the specific offense for which he was being tried, and to induce the jury to inflict a heavier punishment therefor, leaving him still liable to be prosecuted for the other offenses. Of course, it could not mean that the judge should exclude the jury and suspend the trial in order that he might make independent investigations as to these other offenses prohibited by the statute.

These considerations lead us to conclude that the introduction of this testimony was highly prejudicial to the accused.

We note from the Attorney General's brief and in the memorandum of the court that it appears to be assumed that the prisoner must have been violating the law against drinking on a public highway, because the bottle was partly emptied, and because the prisoner's intoxication was apparent. We do not think that the testimony justifies this conclusion as inevitable. He left home at about 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, and expected to be in Staunton, a distance of something like 50 miles away, by 7:30 of the same day. He does not tell us the precise quantity of liquor which he took before leaving home, but says that he took a "right good drink." We do not know the percentage of alcohol in the liquor, and its intoxicating effect would depend as well upon this as to some extent upon his habits and physical condition. It seems to us that it is a surmise that he had violated the law against drinking on the highway, that there is nothing improbable in his positive statement that the only drink he had taken was the one he took in his home, and that it is neither impossible nor even improbable that his intoxicated condition resulted from that lawful act. Feeling, as the members of this court do, that if they had been vested with the discretion which is vested in the trial court, the instruction would have been given, we are of opinion that the error in admitting this irrelevant testimony must have prejudiced the prisoner's cause with the learned and upright judge when he was asked to instruct the jury not to impose a jail sentence, and therefore that he should review his own judgment on that point. That the accused is a man of very high character cannot be doubted from the testimony; and we think that the case is of that general character which was in the contemplation of the General Assembly when it provided for an amelioration of the punishment. Of course, the law is no respecter of persons, and the higher the position, character, and intelligence of the accused, the more certain and sure should be his punishment for any violation of the law; but the good or bad reputation of the accused for veracity in every case affects his credibility, either favorably or unfavorably, and we find nothing in this record to justify discrediting the testimony of Dr. Snarr on this point.

Our conclusion is that the court erred in admitting this testimony, if it was admitted for the purpose of showing other violations of the prohibition statute, for which violations, if they can be proved, he was liable to punishment, and that his punishment in this case should not be enhanced solely because of such inadmissible evidence.

[7] The provision of the statute of which we have been speaking was not intended to change the maxim that ignorance of the law excuses no man, but it does mean that the commonwealth, in the administration of its criminal laws, does not intend to inflict excessive punishments which do not fit the crime under investigation. The statute imposes upon the trial courts the responsibility of applying the ameliorative punishment of fine without imprisonment in every case where it appears that the crime is inadvertent and where punishment by fine is sufficient to vindicate the law. The exercise of discretion so vested in the trial court will not be reviewed by this court except in cases of clear abuse of that discretion, or where based upon illegal and inadmissible testimony, but that the statute was enacted for application to cases of this general character we have no doubt.

[8] The court also required the accused, under section 43 (Acts 1918, p. 608), to execute a bond of $1,500, conditioned that he would not violate any of the provisions of the act for the term of one year. The bond authorized by the statute is intended as a precautionary measure to prevent future violations of the law by a convicted person who is likely to do so. Apparently there are many men habitually engaged, for gain, in the illegal manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquor in violation of the statute. When these habitual or other deliberate lawbreakers are convicted, bonds like this should be required, but in a case like this, where a useful citizen of high reputation has violated one of the provisions of this statute, and there is no evidence indicating that he is likely again to do so, it seems to us that to require him to give such a bond is an unnecessary humiliation, and not in the contemplation of the General Assembly.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the court erred in the admission of the testimony which we have criticized, that under the peculiar circumstances this was prejudicial error, and hence that the verdict should be set aside; so that the case will be remanded for a new trial in accordance with the views here expressed.

VIRGINIA HOT SPRINGS CO. v. SCHRECK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error \S 914(1)—Notice of proceeding by motion for judgment assumed returned in prescribed time.

Notice of proceeding by motion for judgment will be assumed to have been returned to the clerk's office within five days after service, as prescribed by Code 1919, \S 6046; the date of service not appearing from the record, and no objection being made on this account.

2. Judgment \S 184—Notice of proceeding by motion for judgment must be returnable within 90 days from date.

By analogy to Code 1919, \S 6055, requiring "process from any court" to be returnable within 90 days after its date, the notice which section 6046 requires for commencing a proceeding by motion for judgment, without fixing any appearance day therefor, and which therefore must be returnable within a reasonable time, will be held returnable within such 90 days, and, so being made returnable after such time, is, as a writ to commence the proceeding, a void process, giving the court no jurisdiction to hear and determine the controversy; and motion to quash the notice and dismiss the proceeding should be sustained.

Error to Circuit Court, Bath County.

Proceeding by motion for judgment by one Schreck against the Virginia Hot Springs Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, with directions.

J. T. McAllister, of Hot Springs, and Allen & Walsh, of Charlottesville, for plaintiff in error.

John W. Stephenson & Son, of Warm Springs, Geo. A. Rivercomb, and Timberlake & Nelson, of Staunton, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. [1, 2] This is a proceeding by notice of a motion for a judgment for damages which the plaintiff, Schreck, alleged he had sustained by the wrongful conduct of the defendant, Virginia Hot Springs Company. The proceeding was taken under section 6046 of the Code (section 3211, Code 1904), which requires the notice to be returned to the clerk's office within 5 days after service. The date of service does not appear from the record, but no objection is made on this account, and we assume that it was within the 5 days required by the statute. The notice was returned to the clerk's office November 3, 1919, and notified defendant that the judgment would be asked on the 1st day of the March term, 1920 (March 20, 1920), the day appointed therefor by law. The notice passed over the November term, 1919 (November 20), although there was ample time to mature the case for that term, and notified the defendant to appear 138 days after it was returned executed to the clerk's office. Section 6055 of the Code (section 3220, Code 1887) declares that unless otherwise provided, "process from any court, whether original, mesne, or final * * * shall be returnable within ninety days after its date," and we have held that process which on its face is not so returnable is void. Lavell v. McCurdy, 77 Va. 763. We have also held in a number of cases that a proceeding by motion for a judgment under section 6046 is an action at law. Gordon v. Funkhouser, 100 Va. 675, 42 S. E. 677; Reed & McCormick v. Gold, 102 Va. 37, 45 S. E. 868; Newport News, etc., R. Co. v. Bickford, 105 Va. 182, 52 S. E. 1011.

It will be observed, however, that the language of the statute is, "process from any court," etc., and it is said that the section does not apply to motions of this character, which are controlled entirely by section 6046, and that the latter section is complete in itself, and fixes the time of service and return of the process, but leaves open the question of the day for the appearance of the defendant. It is insisted that if any limitation was intended to the appearance day of the notice it would have been prescribed by section 6046. It is further insisted that the question is put at rest by Kain v. Ashworth, 119 Va. 605, 89 S. E. 857. That case was rested upon the construction of section 3211 of the Code of 1887 as amended in 1914 (now section 6046), read in connection with other sections of that Code, especially section 3207 (now section 6041), and it was held that a motion for a judgment under section 3211 of the Code of 1887 as amended (now section 6046) could be sent out of the county to be executed, although the only ground of jurisdiction was that the cause of action arose in the county where the motion was returnable, and process in a formal action, under such circumstances, could not be sent out of the county to be executed. Shortly thereafter the Legislature amended the statute in this particular so as to provide expressly that, in such case, the notice should not be sent out of the county to be executed (Code, § 6046), thus making the rule in this respect the same whether the proceeding was by a regular formal action or by motion. To this extent the Legislature manifested an intent to harmonize process in the different forms of procedure. Kain v. Ashworth, therefore, is not controlling in the present controversy.

We have held in a number of cases that the notice under section 6046 takes the place of the writ and declaration. Morotock Ins. Co. v. Pankey, 91 Va. 259, 21 S. E. 487; Security Loan Co. v. Fields, 110 Va. 827, 67 S. E. 342, and cases cited. This does not mean, of course, that they are identical; but that the notice serves as a citation of the defendant mentioned therein, and also states the ground of the action. No rules are taken as in a regular action, but the procedure is largely informal. The notice, however, so far as it serves as a substitute for the declaration, must state, in substance, a good cause of action, else it will be bad on demurrer (Security Loan Co. v. Fields, supra; Matthews v. La Prade, 130 Va. —, 107 S. E. 796), and so far as it serves as a writ it must fix a time and place for the defendant to make defense, and otherwise conform to law. It would seem that if all process "from any court" must be returnable within 90 days, that which is to take its place when emanating from a private person should have a similar limitation. We can conceive of no reason applicable to the one which is not equally applicable to the other, and, in the absence of any statute authorizing or compelling a different conclusion, the same limitation should be placed on notices as is placed by the statute on "process from any court." It is true that section 6046 fixes no appearance day for the notice, but the general rule requiring an act to be done in a reasonable time where no time is fixed should be applied to the case. What is a reasonable time is a very indefinite term, varying as to the act to be done and the circumstances of the particular case. Frequently there is no guide to its definition except the judgment of reasonable men, judges, or jurors. Here, however, we have the guidance of a legislative act which has remained unchanged for over 60 years. Acts 1852, p. 76. It is that "process from any court" shall, unless otherwise provided, be returnable within 90 days from its date. If such process is to be so returnable, why should not notices from private persons be subject to the same rule? Can any sound reason be assigned for a difference? In the case in judgment, the plaintiff had not only passed over a term of the court, but had exceeded the limit prescribed by section 6055 by 48 days, or about 7 weeks. If he may exceed it by 7 weeks, why not by 7 months, or 7 years? Where shall the limit be fixed? Unless the limit prescribed by the statute to "process from any court" be adopted, we are hopelessly at sea as to how to measure "reasonable time." What is "reasonable time" for the return of a judicial writ ought also to be "reasonable time" for that which is allowed to take its place. We conclude, therefore, that the trial court should have sustained the motion of the defendant to quash the notice and dismiss the action, and that its failure to do so was error. The objection was not merely formal, but fundamental and substantial. It went to the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine the controversy. Lavell v. McCurdy, supra.

The plaintiff was fully warned of the objection to the sufficiency of the notice. When the case was first called for hearing on March 22, 1920, there was a motion to quash the notice and dismiss the action, which motion the court overruled, and thereafter, on June 22, 1920, the defendant demurred to the notice for misjoinder of causes of action. The demurrer was sustained, with leave to amend, and, instead of commencing a new action, with a notice that was unobjectionable as to the return day, the plaintiff elected to amend the original notice and pursue his remedy by that proceeding, which was accordingly done.

We are of opinion, for the reason we have stated, that the notice as a writ to commence the action was a void process, and consequently that the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court founded thereon are likewise void. An order therefore will be entered in this court, directing the clerk of the circuit court of Bath county to enter on his order book where the said judgment is entered and on the judgment docket where it is docketed that the said judgment has been declared void by this court. An order will also be entered here in favor of the plaintiff in error for its costs incurred in this court and in the circuit court.

Error to Circuit Court, Rockingham County.

Tony Hitt was convicted of violating the state prohibition act; and he brings error. Reversed.

F. C. Stipes, and John Paul, of Harrisonburg, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. The defendant, Tony Hitt, was indicted for violation of the state prohibition act. Laws 1918, c. 388. The indictment was in the general blanket form suggested in section 7 of the act, and charged that Tony Hitt—

"* * * did unlawfully manufacture, sell, offer, keep, store and expose for sale, give away, transport, dispense, solicit, advertise and receive orders for ardent spirits, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Virginia."

The verdict was in the following form:

"We, the jury, find the accused, Tony Hitt, guilty as charged in the indictment, and fix his punishment at a fine of $50 with confinement in jail for one month."

The trial court sentenced the defendant accordingly, and to that sentence this writ of error was awarded.

Briefly stated, the material facts are these: Hitt lived at Elkton, in Rockingham county, about 20 miles from Harrisonburg. One Saturday afternoon he met on the street in Elkton an acquaintance named Pittington, who invited him to go to Harrisonburg that night in an automobile. Hitt had some personal business to attend to in Harrisonburg, and said he would go. It was agreed between them that they should start from Pittington's home after supper. Pursuant to this arrangement, Hitt went to Pittington's house later, where he found Pittington and another acquaintance named Simmons ready to start in the car. On entering the car Hitt noticed a suit case on the floor in front of the rear seat. Pittington and Simmons rode on the front seat and the defendant in the rear. He did not know and did not ask what the suit case contained, had no reason to suppose it contained whisky, and did not know that his companions had any whisky with them. After they had proceeded a short distance outside of the town of Elkton, Simmons, who was driving, stopped the car, and he and Pittington offered Hitt a drink from a bottle which they had on the front seat. He took a drink and returned the bottle to them. Before reaching Harrisonburg he took one other drink from the same bottle. Pittington and Simmons drank a number of times on the way and were intoxicated when they arrived at Harrisonburg. Hitt was not intoxicated, and at no time before their arrival did he know that there was any whisky in the car except that which was contained in the bottle above mentioned. The radiator of the engine was hot when they reached Harrisonburg, and it was decided to take the car to a garage to get some lubricating oil. Pittington left the car, for some reason not satisfactorily explained, and Simmons and Hitt started on to a garage for the oil. As they were going around the courthouse square Simmons drove into another car. A crowd assembled, and Hitt, seeing a policeman approaching and thinking that Simmons would probably be arrested on account of the accident, mingled with the crowd without letting himself be known, and walked off down the street, where he met Pittington and related the occurrence. Pittington expressed concern about the suit case, telling Hitt that it contained whisky, and this was the first time the latter had been apprised of that fact. Simmons was arrested and taken to jail. Pittington was unwilling to claim his suit case, and later in the night hired another car in which he and Hitt returned to Elkton. On the following Monday Pittington came to see Hitt, said that he had been advised to leave, urged Hitt to go with him, and they both left the state and went to Pennsylvania. A few days later Hitt left Pittington and went to the home of his brother in Baltimore, where he learned that warrants had been issued for Simmons, Pittington, and himself. Upon advice received in a letter from his father, Hitt shortly afterwards returned and surrendered to the officers in Rockingham county.

We have omitted some of the details of the evidence, but have considered it all most carefully, and, as we view the case, no responsibility can be placed upon the defendant in so far as the suit case is concerned. He was in bad company, but he cannot be convicted of a crime upon mere suspicion, and, unless we resort to that, we must treat the charge against him as if the bottle of whisky above referred to contained the only ardent spirits in the car.

The question then is whether the defendant could, by reason of his conduct with respect to the bottle, be lawfully convicted of any offense charged in the indictment under which he was tried.

[1] He was not tried for drinking whisky contrary to section 37 of the prohibition act. That charge is not embraced in the indictment. The conviction here complained of could not be sustained by reason of the provisions of that section, and this, we understand, is conceded.

It appears to be also conceded by the Attorney General (though the trial court thought otherwise) that, even if section 40 of the act prohibiting all persons from receiving ardent spirits, except under certain specified circumstances, could be held to apply to the conduct of the defendant in taking two drinks from the bottle, he could not be convicted for that offense under the indictment here. In our opinion the section does not apply; and, further, we agree with the Attorney General in the view that a charge of its violation is not embraced in the so-called blanket indictment.

These conclusions seem clear from the terms of the act, and are sustained by the decision of this court in Lané v. Commonwealth, 122 Va. 916, 95 S. E. 466.

The indictment does, however, charge the defendant with unlawfully transporting ardent spirits, and the real question in this case is whether under the evidence he can be held guilty of that charge.

[2] It is insisted that as to the bottle of whisky Pittington and Simmons themselves were not violating the law, because they had the right to carry as much as a quart for personal use in their baggage, and that a quart of whisky in one's pocket or in his automobile may properly be considered in his baggage within the meaning of the act, even though not inclosed in any other receptacle than the bottle itself. This contention is disposed of adversely to the defendant in the case of Snarr v. Commonwealth, 109 S. E. 590, decided to-day.

[3] It is further contended that the transportation prohibited by section 3 of the act (containing substantially the language of the indictment) is a transportation for sale, and that, since the evidence shows the whisky in the bottle not to have been transported for sale, the indictment must fall. The case of Pine and Scott v. Commonwealth, 121 Va. 812, 848, 93 S. E. 652, is relied upon to support this contention. In that case we held that the words "for sale" qualified the word "keep" as used in section 3, and that the "keeping" there prohibited was a keeping for sale, and, further, that a transportation for sale was likewise prohibited; but we did not there decide that such was the only kind of transportation made unlawful by that section. Furthermore, it will be noted that the act of 1916 (Laws 1916, c. 146), under which the Pine and Scott Case was decided, has since been replaced by the act of 1918, which in prescribing the form of indictment uses the word "transport" in such a way as clearly indicates that it was not intended to be limited to a transportation for sale. As pointed out by Judge Burks in the Pine and Scott Case, supra, the word "transport" did not appear at all in the form of indictment set out in section 7 of the act of 1916. In the corresponding section of the act of 1918, however, this word not only appears in the suggested form of indictment, but is so placed as to clearly negative any intention to limit the offense charged to a transportation for sale, the language being, "did unlawfully * * * keep, store, and expose for sale, give away, transport," etc. Reading section 3 in the light of this change in the original form of the indictment, we have no doubt that the former section prohibits every transportation of ardent spirits, whether for sale or not, subject only to the express exceptions in the prohibition act provided; and we so hold. Furthermore, section 39 clearly prohibited the transportation of the bottle in the way in which it was being carried by Pittington and Simmons, and, if the defendant was a guilty participant in the transaction, the indictment sufficiently charged the offense under the latter section. The provisions of section 7 do not necessarily restrict the form of indictment therein prescribed to use under the specified sections 3, 3a, 4, and 5 of the act, but merely provide that it or any other good form of indictment shall be sufficient for any such violations. There was no demurrer or objection to the indictment. It charged an unlawful transportation, and was sufficient even if the conviction depended solely upon the establishment of a violation of section 39.

[4, 5] It is said that the verdict ought to have been set aside because it was fatally defective in form. The contention here is that, as the indictment charged a number of offenses, it is impossible to say from the verdict for which one the defendant was convicted, and hence he might be subjected to a future prosecution for the very same offense for which the jury found him guilty. This position is not tenable. A general verdict of guilty upon an indictment charging several offenses will protect a defendant from a subsequent prosecution for any thereof. 22 Ency. Pl. & Pr. p. 845.

This brings us to the final question in the case, namely: Was the defendant under the evidence guilty of transporting whisky? There is no room for any claim that he was guilty as a principal in the first degree. In no reasonable or just sense can it be said that within the meaning of the law he became an actor in transporting the whisky bottle or its contents merely by reason of the fact that he momentarily had it in his hands while he was drinking from it.

By the common law with respect to misdemeanors there is no distinction between principals and accessories; all participants being regarded as principals. Min. Syn. Cr. Law, p. 12. Section 3a of the prohibition act provides that on an indictment for the violation of any of its provisions "the jury may find the defendant guilty of an attempt, or of being an accessory, and the punishment shall be the same as if the defendant were solely guilty of such violation."

[8, 7] We have seen that the defendant was not a principal in the first degree because he was not an actor in the transportation. Min. Syn. Cr. Law, p. 11. Neither was he an accessory, because an accessory is one not present at the commission of the offense, but who is in some way concerned therein, either before or after, as contriver, instigator, or adviser, or as a receiver or protector of the perpetrator; and the defendant does not fall within any of these classes. Min. Syn. Cr. Law, p. 12. If guilty at all, he was guilty as a principal in the second degree upon the theory that, being present, he aided and abetted the act. We do not think he can be said to fall within this classification. Nothing that he did before or after the discovery in any way aided or abetted their transportation of the whisky. His conduct in drinking from the bottle may have indicated an approval of what they had done and were continuing to do, but we do not think that it can be fairly said to have constituted him a participant in the transportation either as a principal or an accessory. Such a holding would mean that, whenever one man takes a drink unlawfully which is given to him by another, he almost certainly renders himself liable to prosecution not only for that act, but for the act of the other party in unlawfully carrying whisky with him. The act itself shows that the unlawful transportation of whisky is regarded as a more serious offense and is more severely punished than the unlawful drinking of whisky. We do not think it was the purpose of the act to go as far in the punishment of the offense of unlawful drinking as it would be necessary to go in this case to sustain the conviction.

The trial court, over the objection of the defendant, gave the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that the transportation of even one quart of intoxicating liquor, or less, from Elkton to Harrisonburg, is an unlawful act under the prohibition law, and that, if the defendant accompanied Pittington and Simmons on the trip from Elkton to Harrisonburg, knowing there was liquor in the car, and drank with them from a bottle, then he is guilty under the law, whether he knew the suit case contained liquor or not."

This instruction left the jury no discretion, and was very probably the cause of the verdict. Whether so or not, the instruction was erroneous, and, furthermore, the verdict was without sufficient evidence to support it.

The provisions of the prohibition act, as stated by the learned and upright judge of the trial court in his written opinion, were intended to be drastic, and they must be firmly enforced in order to make the law effective. We feel, however, that an affirmation of the judgment in this case would visit a punishment upon the defendant for one violation of the act upon proof of his guilt of another violation, the latter not being charged, and, furthermore, carrying a lesser penalty than the former.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment complained of will be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded to the circuit court for such further proceedings as the commonwealth may be advised to take therein, not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

KINGMAN MILLS v. FURNER. (No. 4266.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Pleading \S 155—Affidavit failing to identify cause and not stating that amount claimed was on demands in the declaration fatally defective.

An affidavit by plaintiff, pursuant to section 46 of chapter 125 of the Code 1913 (sec. 4800), which fails to identify in any way the cause or action in which it is proposed to be filed, or which in stating the amount he verily believes is due and unpaid from the defendant to him, omits the words "upon the demand or demands stated in the declaration," is fatally defective, and on motion of the defendant should be quashed.

2. Parties \S 69—Declaration describing plaintiff as a branch of a named company not subject to demurrer for failure to identify plaintiff.

A declaration describing the plaintiff as "The Kingman Mills, a branch of the Kansas Flour Mills Company, a body corporate," sufficiently identifies the plaintiff as the Kansas Flour Mills Company, a corporation, the real plaintiff, and a demurrer to the declaration for want of parties or of proper description of plaintiff, is properly overruled.

3. Parties \S 95(5)—Where plaintiff was misdescribed in declaration, it should be permitted to amend.

Such misdescription of plaintiff corporation is not good ground for demurrer, and it should of right be permitted to amend its declaration if desired, pursuant to section 14 of chapter 125 of the Code 1913 (sec. 4768).

Poffenbarger and Lynch, JJ., dissenting in part.

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Action by the Kingman Mills, a branch of the Kansas Flour Mills Company, against Noah C. Furner. Verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and new trial granted.

Harvey F. Smith, of Clarksburg, for plaintiff in error.

Harvey W. Harmer, of Clarksburg, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. This action was by and against the parties as styled in the above caption, and the final judgment of nil capiat complained of, pronounced after verdict for defendant, set aside, and, on motion of plaintiff overruled, for leave to amend its declaration by substituting its correct name, The Kansas Flour Mills Company, a body corporate, trading as The Kingman Mills, in the place of the name in the declaration.

[1] The first point of error urged is that the circuit court, upon defendant's motion, improperly quashed plaintiff's statutory affidavit of the amount which it claimed it was entitled to recover in the action, and permitted defendant to plead to issue without having filed his counter-affidavit, as required by section 46, chapter 125 of the Code (sec. 4800). As this statute is in derogation of the common law and designed to cut off defenses without compliance therewith, it should, according to well recognized rules of construction, be strictly construed, and strict compliance therewith required. The affidavit contains no caption showing the style of the action, nor does it show where the action was pending in which it was intended to be filed. The venue is laid in the "State of Kansas, County of Kingman," and is as follows:

"This day E. F. Erbacher, personally appeared before me, Scott Williamson, a Notary Public in and for said county and state and being by me first duly sworn, deposes and says, that he is the manager of the Kingman Mills, a branch of the Kansas Flour Mills Company, a body corporate; that he is familiar with the facts involved in this case and with the books and accounts of his said company generally; that he is authorized by it to make this affidavit; that there is as he verily believes due and unpaid to his said company, as aforesaid from the defendant, Noah C. Furner, including principal and interest, after deducting all credits, payments and sets-off made by the defendant and to which he is entitled the sum of six hundred eighty six dollars and seventy cents ($686.70) that said sum is due, owing and unpaid.

E. F. Erbacher.

"Taken, subscribed, sworn to and given under my notarial seal this 16th day of August, 1918.

"Scott Williamson, Notary Public."

By said section 46, the plaintiff, to cut off defenses without counter-affidavit, is required to swear that,

"There is, as he verily believes, due and unpaid from the defendant to him upon the demand or demands stated in the declaration, including principal and interest, after deducting all payments, credits and sets-off made by the defendant, and to which he is entitled, a sum certain to be named in the affidavit."

It is apparent that the affidavit is not only wanting in identifying the action in which it was intended to be filed, but that it omits the very important words of the statute, "due and unpaid from the defendant to him (it) upon the demand or demands stated in the declaration." An affidavit which said "there is due him a certain sum" instead of "there is due and unpaid," was held insufficient to call for judgment under the statute, by reason of the omission of the words "and unpaid." Marsteller v. Ward, 52 W. Va. 74, 43 S. E. 178, approved in Hutton v. Holt, 52 W. Va. 672, 44 S. E. 164. The case of Vinson v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 37 W. Va. 598, 16 S. E. 802, holds fatally defective an affidavit which omitted the words "after deducting all payments, credits and sets-off made by the defendant, and to which he is entitled." In Virginia it was held that an affidavit was defective for failing to state the time from which plaintiff demanded interest. Merriman Co. v. Thomas & Co., 103 Va. 24, 48 S. E. 490. Plaintiff's affidavit in this case, we think, was fatally defective, and was properly quashed.

[2] The next ground relied on for reversal is that the court, by its order entered on May 29, 1920, after having overruled it by a previous order, sustained defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's declaration. And a third point, which may be considered with the second, is that after sustaining said demurrer, the court by the same order denied plaintiff the right to amend, already referred to. The second point presents the question whether the suit brought is in the name of any party plaintiff. It is said that "The Kingman Mills, a branch of the Kansas Flour Mills Company" is neither a natural person nor a corporation, capable of suing and being sued. Who is the plaintiff in this case? Is it not plainly the Kansas Flour Mills Company, a body corporate, owner of the Kingman Mills branch of its business? How can there be any doubt or misunderstanding about this? We think the name of plaintiff as pleaded might, without any violence to the rules of practice prescribed by statute and recognized by general law, have been paraphrased so as to more correctly state its name, as for example, "The Kansas Flour Mills Company, a body corporate, The Kingman Mills Branch," or "doing business as the Kingman Mills Branch," or by simply omitting altogether the words, "The Kingman Mills Branch," and specifically averring the fact of plaintiff's ownership of the mills, and that the contract was made in that name and for its use and benefit, followed by proof of the fact. Our opinion is that as stated in the writ and declaration the name pleaded did not in fact or in legal effect constitute a misnomer calling for amendment. In the case of Board of Education of Walton District, Roane County, v. Board of Trustees of Walton Lodge No. 132, I. O. O. F., 78 W. Va. 445, 447, 88 S. E. 1099, the suit was upon a contract signed "Walton Lodge I. O. O. F. 132, By C. D. Moore, Its Agent," whereas the defendant was described in the bill, "Board of Trustees of Walton Lodge No. 132, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, a corporation." It was said that because the two names were not identical, they did not describe the same corporation or entity. In that case Judge Williams says, 78 W. Va. at page 447, 88 S. E. 1100:

"It does not follow that, because the two names are not identical, they do not describe the same corporation, or entity."

And in the same connection it is said:

"The name signed to the contract may not be defendant's strictly correct name; yet, if it contracted in that name, it is bound. A corporation, like a natural person, may contract in different names."

And quoting from cited cases it is further said:

"A contract entered into by a corporation under an assumed name may be enforced by either of the parties, and the identity of the company may be established by the ordinary methods of proof," citing Marmet Co. v. Archibald, 87 W. Va. 778, 17 S. E. 299; Culpepper Agri. & Mfg. Soc. v. Digges, 6 Rand. 165; National Bank v. Distilling Co., 41 W. Va. 530, 23 S. E. 792, 56 Am. St. Rep. 878; Grafton Grocery Co. v. Home Brewing Co., 60 W. Va. 281, 54 S. E. 349; and Varney & Evans v. Lumber & Mfg. Co., 64 W. Va. 417, 63 S. E. 208.

In the principal case it was held that the alleged variance could not be taken advantage of, by demurrer, and that by virtue of section 14 of chapter 125 of the Code (sec. 4768), the error in names could be corrected by mere motion on affidavit stating the correct name.

[3] Assuming in this case that the plaintiff was misnamed in the declaration, was the name correctable on motion? We think it was. We think the case falls clearly within the provisions of said section 14 of chapter 125, Code. In the more recent case of Duty v. O. & O. Ry. Co., 70 W. Va. 14, 78 S. E. 331, we decided that the name of the defendant described in the declaration as a corporation under the laws of a different state than the one described in the declaration, when the right one had been intended and served with process, might be corrected by motion under the statute.

Cases from other jurisdictions where similar statutes were involved are substantially in accord with our decisions. In Bank of Havana v. Magee, 20 N. Y. 355, it was held that the prosecution of a suit by an individual banker in a name importing a corporate character, under which he carried on business, was a merely formal error amendable in the court of original jurisdiction and to be disregarded in the appellate court, and that where the plaintiff miscalls himself by a name which represents no person, natural or artificial, the remedy is by motion and not by demurrer or answer. In Barber v. Smith, 41 Mich. 138, 144-145, 1 N. W. 992, it was decided that this remedy by amendment was properly applied in an attachment suit. In that case the distinction was drawn between a case where the suit is in a partnership name without naming the individuals composing it, as was that case, and cases like Smith v. Canfield, 8 Mich. 493. In the latter case, however, the court withheld its opinion whether the writ was a nullity in a sense excluding all possibility of making anything valid out of it by admissions or amendment. In Morgridge & Merrick v. Stoeffer, 14 N. D. 430, 104 N. W. 1112, where the statute is quite similar to our own, the court decided that a summons which contained only the partnership name, was not a nullity, but might be amended by inserting the name of each partner. A similar holding is found in Kleinert v. Knoop, 147 Mich. 387, 110 N. W. 941, which decided that a petition in the name of Fursternberg Bros. might be amended by setting out the names of the persons composing the firm. In Morrison & Co. v. Tate (Ky.) 1 Metc. 569, the suit was in the name of A. J. Morrison & Co. It did not appear from the petition whether or not the plaintiff was a firm composed of more than one person. If it was, the court said it devolved upon defendant to show it, and that he then could have compelled an amendment. In Loewenberg v. Gilliam, 72 Ark. 314, 79 S. W. 1064, we find a like holding in a suit in partnership name where the names of the individual partners were not set out in the writ or pleadings.

A case or two may be found which may not be in accord with our decisions and those cases cited from other states. For example, we find the case of Proprietors of Mexican Mills v. Yellow Jacket Silver Mining Co., 4 Nev. 40, 97 Am. Dec. 510, where, in construing the statute relating to the amendment of pleadings, the court held it to be inapplicable to cases where no person, natural or artificial, is named as plaintiff. In the case here an artificial person is named as plaintiff, namely, the Kansas Flour Mills Company; and the motion for leave to amend the declaration falls clearly within the meaning and intent of our statute. Of course the party plaintiff or defendant must be capable of suing and being sued. Associations of individuals not incorporated cannot sue or defend in the name of the association. St. Paul Typothetæ v. St. Paul Bookbinders' Union, 94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 725, 3 Ann. Cas. 695; Schuetzen Bund v. Agitations Verein, 44 Mich. 313, 6 N. W. 675, 38 Am. Rep. 270; Simpson & Smith v. International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 83 W. Va. 353, 98 S. E. 580. In the latter case we held, however, that a corporation contracting under an assumed name may be sued by such name and is estopped to deny its existence for the purposes of the litigation, though proof of the incorporation of the individuals so contracting is essential to the maintenance of the suit. A steamboat, hotel, toll-gate or race-horse, though having a name, and to which notes or other obligations may be made, may not sue, but suit thereon may be maintained in the names of the real parties in interest. Steamboat Pembina and owner v. Wilson, 11 Iowa, 479. So in the case at bar, the Kingman Mills, not a corporation, but a branch of the real plaintiff named in the declaration, may not be competent to sue, but its owner is competent to sue; and the Kansas Flour Mills Company, named as the real owner, is a corporate entity and competent to maintain the suit in the name of the non-entity which it owned and controlled, if it elected to do so. The case of Western & Atlantic Railroad Co. v. Dalton Marble Works et al., 122 Ga. 774, 50 S. E. 978, we do not regard as being in conflict with the views herein expressed, for that case holds that though a suit can be maintained only in the name of a natural or artificial person capable of suing, nevertheless it holds that if a corporation suing fails to fully or correctly describe its legal entity, it may amend by setting out in the pleading its correct name, distinguishing that class of cases from others cited and relied on by counsel. The case of Lilly v. Tobbein, 103 Mo. 477, 15 S. W. 618, 23 Am. St. Rep. 387, an action to upset a will, was commenced in the name of an unincorporated church society, and it was decided that members of such church suing in their own behalf as well as in behalf of all the members, might be substituted as plaintiffs by an amended petition.

Upon the authority of the foregoing decisions, and upon our statute properly construed, we think the court erred, not only in sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the declaration, but also in overruling plaintiff's motion to amend according to the fact then appearing by depositions filed in the case, though in our opinion no amendment of the declaration was actually necessary.

The only other error assigned which may be considered is the giving of defendant's instruction number eight. This instruction is no part of the record of the case by any order or bill of exception, and though copied in the brief of defendant's counsel, cannot be considered. The case was finally disposed of by the judgment of nisi capiat on May 29, 1920, before the act of April 15, 1921, Acts 1921, chapter 68, became effective. It can be given no retroactive effect.

Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment, and grant the plaintiff a new trial.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting in part). I am unable to concur in so much of the opinion filed by Judge MILLER as holds that the writ and declaration or either of them is amendable.

The name "Kingman Mills" does not purport signification of either a natural or an artificial person, and the plaintiff has no other name. The appellation is not a defective or erroneous designation of any person. It is a designation of an inanimate thing incapable of suing. The alteration the court allows is a substitution of an artificial person for no person at all.

The annexed descriptive matter, "a branch of the Kansas Flour Mills Company, a body corporate," is only descriptive. It does not purport to give the name of the plaintiff. It merely tells who owns the Kingman Mills, or to whom the Kingman Mills belong, which, of course, amounts to the same thing. It would perform that function just as well, if it were wholly separated from the name, Kingman Mills, and placed in the middle of the declaration or at the end thereof, in different terms. To say the Kansas Flour Mills is named as plaintiff, either accurately or erroneously, is to ignore the terms used and insert new ones. It cannot be interpretation of the language used, for it goes outside of and beyond it.

None of our decisions cited in the opinion are in any sense analogous. They all affirm liberality of construction of the statute authorizing amendments, but, in every one of them, a natural or an artificial person was named as plaintiff. In Board of Education v. Board of Trustees, 78 W. Va. 445, 88 S. E. 1099, both parties were correctly or sufficiently described in the pleadings, and the erroneous designation appeared only in an exhibit. In Duty v. O. & O. Ry. Co., 70 W. Va. 14, 73 S. E. 331, the erroneous designation appeared in only one count of the declaration, and it was clearly a mere misnomer of a person described as a corporation. All of the others cited are equally lacking in analogy. In Bank of Havana v. Magee, 20 N. Y. 355, the decision was based upon a statute, requiring the courts to ignore and disregard every error or defect in pleadings or proceedings, not affecting the substantial rights of the adverse party. We have no such statute. Barber v. Smith, 41 Mich. 138, involved the law of collateral attack, and, moreover, the court held that the plaintiffs were partially described as being natural persons. In Smith v. Canfield, 8 Mich. 493, a writ of replevin issued in the firm name of partners was treated as void and quashed. In Morgridge & Merrick v. Stoeffer, 14 N. D. 430, 104 N. W. 1112, the court held that the use of a firm name was a partial description of natural persons. In Morrison & Co. v. Tate (Ky.) 1 Metc. 569, the court treated "A. J. Morrison & Co." as the name of a natural person, and the appellation did set forth the name of such a person. The phrase "Kingman Mills," used for designation of the plaintiff, is not, in any sense or to any extent, descriptive of the "Kansas Flour Mills Company." The only identical word in both phrases is "Mills" and it does not signify any person of any kind.

I would reverse the judgment and dismiss the action, with a saving clause against prejudice, though I hardly think such a clause is necessary.

LYNCH, J., joins me in this dissent.

FLYNN et al. v. YEAGER et al. (No. 4193.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Fraud \S 50—Not deducible from facts and circumstances consistent with honesty.

Fraud is not deducible from facts and circumstances plainly consistent with honest intentions, either upon a demurrer to a pleading or in a finding upon evidence.

2. Trusts \S 365(2)—Laches held not inapplicable to express trusts.

Laches is not inapplicable to express trusts, but it is not so readily applied to them as it is to contracts not involving any relation of confidence or trust.

3. Trusts \S 176—Trustee does not make unauthorized delegation of authority in employing agent to assist in execution.

In the employment of an agent to assist him in the execution of his trust, a trustee does not make any unauthorized delegation of his authority.

4. Appeal and error \S 1010(1)—Findings as to existence of relationship supported by sufficient evidence will not be disturbed.

The findings of a trial court upon issues as to the existence of the relation of principal and agent between parties, and the capacity in which the alleged agent holds certain real estate conveyed to him and partly paid for by the alleged principal, supported by facts, circumstances, conduct, and correspondence very strongly tending to corroborate the oral evidence in their favor and to overthrow the opposing oral evidence, will not be disturbed by the appellate court.

5. Property \S 9—Agent's payment of part of purchase price is not conclusive of his ownership of land.

Payment by an agent of part of the purchase money of land conveyed to him and claimed by him as his own is not conclusive evidence of his individual ownership thereof, since an agent may expend his own money in the execution of his agency and, in such case, is entitled to be reimbursed therefor in settlement with his principal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Suit by James Flynn, trustee, and others against C. A. Yeager, trustee, and others. From a decree adjudicating plaintiff's right to enforcement of an express trust in real estate and referring the cause to a commissioner for ascertainment of facts essential to final settlement, the defendant C. A. Yeager appeals. Affirmed.

A. P. Edgar, F. R. Hill, and Andrew Price, all of Marlinton, for appellant.

T. N. Read, of Hinton, and L. M. McClintic, of Marlinton, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. On this appeal from a decree adjudicating right in the plaintiffs to enforcement of an express trust in real estate and referring the cause to a commissioner for ascertainment of facts essential to final settlement and determination of the rights of the parties, it is contended that the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained on the ground of its alleged disclosure on its face of fraud on the part of the plaintiffs, laches, and lack of equity, and also that the trial court's finding on the issue of fact, made by the pleadings, is contrary to the weight of the evidence.

[1] No revelation of fraud is found in the allegations of the bill. They show that the plaintiffs employed the defendant Yeager as their agent to procure extensive and valuable tracts of timber and timber rights in Pocahontas county, upon his representation that he was a real estate agent and could procure said properties for them at reasonable prices, and that it was agreed, among other things, that, in every case in which the owners of the lands optioned should refuse or fail to pay him a commission of 5 per cent. on the purchase price, they, the plaintiffs, should pay it. There is no occasion to inquire whether a secret arrangement or connivance between them and Yeager as agent of the vendors of the timber and lands, by which the transactions should be so conducted or manipulated as to make his principals pay the commissions, would preclude the relief sought by the bill, on the ground of fraud.

It suffices to say the bill makes no admission of concealment, secrecy, or obliquity of conduct on the part of the agent, participated in by the plaintiffs. The allegation relied upon as being an admission or making a disclosure of fraudulent purpose respecting the vendors is clearly consistent with openness and frankness on the part of the agent with all parties concerned in every transaction. Not a word in the bill imports an admission or charge that knowledge of the relation between the plaintiffs and Yeager was to be withheld from the vendors. An agent or broker, and especially a mere middleman, may represent both parties to a contract and be compensated by each of them, if both are fully informed as to his attitude and all elements of the transaction, as these parties may have been in all of the instances mentioned or referred to in the bill. Peters v. Riley, 73 W. Va. 785, 81 S. E. 530; Runnion v. Morrison, 71 W. Va. 254, 76 S. E. 457; Cassiday Fork B. & L. Co. v. Terry, 69 W. Va. 572, 73 S. E. 278.

[2] Nor is there any disclosure of facts or circumstances on the face of the bill constituting laches. The properties in question are but 2 of more than 30 tracts with reference to which the parties dealt, and part of the timber on another, and the time intervening between the acquisition of the titles by Yeager and the institution of this suit was less than four years. In that period they transacted a large amount of business, and the lands in question were not fully paid for until a date within two years just preceding the institution of this suit. The plaintiff James Flynn, trustee, paid $100 on it as late as April 4, 1916, and this suit was brought in August, 1917. The bill sets forth correspondence dated in September and December, 1915, containing admissions by Yeager of Flynn's interest in these two tracts of land. Laches runs against an express trust, but the rule does not apply with the same degree of rigidity as in the case of contracts in which there is no relation of trust or confidence. The illustrations of its application in cases of express trusts, found in Roush v. Griffith, 65 W. Va. 752, 65 S. E. 168, make it manifest that the elements essential thereto do not appear here.

In the evidence the argument submitted on the theory of laches has less foundation than in the bill. Flynn testifies that from the beginning of his transactions with Yeager, in 1913, down to June, 1917, there was no repudiation of the alleged trust by Yeager, and the correspondence between them corroborates his testimony. The Spice Run Lumber Company, a corporation, represented by Flynn, as trustee, in his transactions with Yeager and, through him, with others, seems to have become financially embarrassed about the year 1916, and its enterprise was taken over and operated by the Brookville

Title & Trust Company. About the time it took charge of the property, the general manager of the Spice Run Lumber Company, appointed at its instance, approached Yeager for information concerning these two tracts of land, and was told they did not belong to the company. He reported this to Flynn, who says Yeager denied it when he spoke to him about it and promised to make up a statement of the cost of the land and convey it to Flynn or his company. The dates of these alleged conversations are not disclosed; but in April, 1916, Flynn made a payment on the purchase money of these lands, and on June 1, 1917, he requested Yeager in writing to make up a statement of the amount due on the property, and told him the president of the Brookville Title & Trust Company would pay it at once. This demand was repeated by a letter dated July 6, 1917. The fact that Yeager had conveyed one of the tracts to S. A. Sparks by a deed dated February 14, 1914, and recorded April 7, 1914, reserving the timber, has no important bearing upon this inquiry. If Flynn knew it, he did not abandon his claim of right. He probably had no objection to the conveyance of the land, since his real interest centered in the timber, which Yeager still held. As the bill does not seek disturbance of Sparks' title, the element of estoppel is not involved. The delay has not been unreasonable in point of time, no loss of evidence has occurred, and no disturbance is sought of any right acquired by a third party.

[3] The bill does not admit any delegation of discretionary powers by the trustee, if, in the event of his having done so, Yeager could complain of it. He simply employed Yeager as his agent to make contracts or procure offers of sale, subject to approval by his employer.

As the bill alleges an express trust and the relation of principal and agent, making Yeager a trustee as to the tracts of land in their entirety, and not a resulting trust, it was not necessary to disclose the proportion the money paid by the principal bears to the whole amount of purchase money. Shaffer v. Fetty, 30 W. Va. 261, 4 S. E. 278, has no application.

[4, 5] The two tracts of land contained, respectively, 234 acres and 135 acres, and were owned by the heirs of William Dean. Yeager claims to have commenced his negotiations for purchase thereof in 1912, but he had accomplished nothing with reference to them in June, 1913, when he seems to have succeeded in enlisting Flynn's interest in the timber of the section in which they are situated, and he included them in lists of prospective purchases he rendered to Flynn. No money was paid on account of either tract earlier than July, 1913. On September 29, 1913, Flynn gave his check for $900 to J. A. Sydenstricker, cashier of the First National Bank of Marlinton, to pay for four interests in one of the tracts and five in the other, and the money was so applied. A check for $400, drawn September 30, 1913, by Yeager, and payable to him out of Flynn's account, was applied on the Dean land purchase money. Another for $318, drawn by Flynn, trustee, payable to Yeager and dated September 21, 1914, was so applied. One for $100, drawn by Flynn, payable to the cashier and dated April 4, 1916, was applied on a purchase-money note owned by Mrs. Nancy R. Dean. The purchase-money notes were executed by Yeager and the conveyances made to him. Admitting these payments or advancements by Flynn, he claims they were loans made to him with which to make payments on his own purchases. To sustain him in this contention, he produces two witnesses, Geo. M. Sutton and William Bruffey, who say they heard conversations between Flynn and Yeager concerning the purchase of the Dean lands, in which the former encouraged the latter to buy them and told him that, if he should need money for the purpose, he knew where to get it, meaning that he (Flynn) would furnish it. Admitting the possibility of conversations between them heard by Sutton and Bruffey, Flynn denies that they ever heard him agree or offer to advance money for any purchase by Yeager on his own behalf, and says he was unable to furnish more money than was needed for his own purposes. Three of the Deans say they understood from Yeager that he was buying the land for Flynn or the Flynn Lumber Company. John F. Clark, billing clerk for the Spice Run Lumber Company testified that Yeager had told him he was buying the lands for Flynn, or the company, and taking the title in his own name, on account of the number of the interests to be acquired and the probability that he could obtain them at lower prices in that way. The uncontroverted facts and circumstances the trial court may have invoked in the determination of this conflict in the oral evidence against the defendant are amply sufficient. It is improbable that the plaintiffs, in buying up and consolidating numerous tracts of timber and building an expensive railroad for access to it, were willing to finance their agent in the acquisition of a part of the timber for his own account. It is unlikely that they would want to give their agent the benefit of the enterprise. Such undertakings require large amounts of money, and all the circumstances tend to prove the plaintiffs had no more money than they needed. The correspondence and memoranda concerning the Dean lands bear no evidence of a loan transaction. On the contrary, they are perfectly consistent with the theory of the trust relation asserted by the bill. As Yeager was acting for the plaintiffs as their agent, their correspondence ought to be taken, in the absence of anything to the contrary appearing in it, as relating to agency transactions. Nowhere in any of it is there an intimation that the Dean lands were bought in an individual capacity. The only circumstance that could be treated as evidence of it are the taking of the title in the name of the agent and execution of his own notes for purchase money. But these are negated by large payments of the notes by the principal. Yeager made some payments on the land out of his own funds, but not until after he had induced Flynn to buy timber in that section, with intent to extend his railroad to it. He was working for Flynn in June, 1913. He took a conveyance of two interests in the Dean lands from Sutton, July 18, 1913. This was his first purchase. Before and after that date he treated the purchase as having been made on behalf of his principal. For these two interests he seems to have paid about $350, and after that Flynn began paying his notes for other interests. In addition to what he paid Sutton he seems to have paid about $1,100 or $1,200 more. This has not been refunded, but failure to refund it may be attributed to two causes. Yeager never tendered a conveyance nor sought reimbursement as to his outlay. Before all of the purchase money was paid, financial embarrassment overtook the Spice Run Lumber Company and Flynn, by reason of conditions growing out of the war. When this was overcome, Yeager attempted to repudiate his trust. Payments of purchase money by Yeager are not conclusive in his favor. The right of an agent to advance money for his principal in the execution of his agency, and to be reimbursed, is incontrovertible. Ruffner v. Hewitt, 7 W. Va. 535; Mechem, Agency, 1600 et seq.

Having carefully considered the evidence, facts, and circumstances, we are of the opinion that the findings of the trial court as to the relation between the parties and the status of the land and timber in controversy cannot be disturbed and ought not to be; wherefore the decree complained of will be affirmed.

PAULEY v. DECKER. (No. 4335.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence \S 480(3)—In action for breach of covenants of warranty, oral evidence may be heard to locate part of land lost in ejectment action.

In a suit for damages for breach of covenants of warranty of title in a deed, where the breach is alleged to be for a failure of title to a part of the land conveyed, caused by an adverse judgment in an ejectment suit, in which the grantor and covenantor was plaintiff and a third person was defendant, pending at the date of the deed, parol testimony, properly introduced, may be heard to establish and locate the portion of the land so lost.

2. Covenants \S 134—In action for breach of warranty, where vendor lost part of land in ejectment and evidence can be secured to show part lost, it is error to direct verdict for defendant.

In such action where, because of misconception by plaintiff of the evidence offered, it is not clearly shown how much of the land has been so lost to plaintiff, and it is apparent that legal evidence is in existence and readily obtainable whereby it may be fully shown; and there is sufficient legal evidence introduced in the trial to prove that plaintiff has so lost title and possession to some portion of the land, it is error to direct a verdict for defendant.

3. Appeal and error \S 1177(7)—Where evidence showed purchaser entitled to nominal damages for breach of warranty, but not the amount, held that there should be a new trial.

Where, upon such trial, it is clear that plaintiff is entitled to recover nominal damages, and there is competent evidence introduced showing that his damages will amount to more than $100, although the true amount is not sufficiently proved on which to predicate a verdict and judgment, for reasons stated, the appellate court will reverse the judgment for defendant rendered on a directed verdict, and award a new trial.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by C. E. Pauley against A. A. Decker. Directed verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

J. Howard Hundley, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

Maynard F. Stiles, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. In an action of covenant for breach of general warranty in a deed, the circuit court of Kanawha county, at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence and on motion of defendant, A. A. Decker, directed a verdict for defendant, and rendered judgment thereon on March 11, 1921. Plaintiff, C. E. Pauley, now prosecutes this writ of error.

[1] On August 5, 1919, A. A. Decker and wife conveyed to C. E. Pauley, with covenant of general warranty, a certain lot in Miami, Kanawha county, which lot is described in the deed as follows:

"Beginning at an iron pin set in the ground forty (40) feet from the westerly rail of said railway, at a corner of an alley between the lot hereby conveyed and the land of W. R. Blair, two hundred and fifty-seven and one-half (257½) feet northerly from a point on the line dividing lands formerly owned by Thomas Crawford from the lands of H. R. Epperly, forty (40) feet distant from said railroad track; thence N. 78° 15' W. ninety (90) feet along said alley to an iron pin set in the ground; thence S. 8° 38' W. 56 feet to a stake; thence S. 78° 15' E. ninety (90) feet to an iron pin set in the ground forty feet westerly from said railroad rail; thence N. 8° 38' E. fifty-six (56) feet to the place of beginning," etc.

At the time of this conveyance, and for some time previous thereto, a suit in ejectment, brought by A. A. Decker against L. H. Creasey, was pending in the circuit court of Kanawha county. Decker's declaration in this ejectment suit described the property then alleged to be owned by him by the same metes and bounds as were used by Decker in his description of the property in the deed to Pauley on August 5, 1919, detailed above. Creasey disclaimed all of the land described in Decker's declaration except the portion covered by a deed from John D. Kittinger and wife to L. H. Creasey, bearing date "the _____ day of _____ 19____," and entered a plea of not guilty as to that portion. On December 5, 1919, the jury having returned a verdict in favor of defendant Creasey, the court rendered judgment thereon, dismissing Decker's suit and awarding costs to Creasey. Pauley filed his declaration in covenant against Decker at August rules, 1920, and Decker's failure to successfully assert his title to the property in the ejectment suit is the breach relied on. Pauley introduced in evidence Decker's declaration, Creasey's disclaimer, and the final order of the court in the ejectment suit. The judgment in the ejectment suit as set out in the final order introduced in evidence did not show what portion of the Decker lot was held by Creasey and confirmed to him; and questions were propounded to plaintiff and J. D. Kittinger in an attempt to show the exact amount and where located; but upon objections the court struck out the answer of plaintiff in this regard, and sustained an objection to the question asked Kittinger.

Plaintiff testified that he and Decker measured the 56 feet frontage of the lot previous to his purchase from Decker, and that during the measurement he (Pauley) held the end of the line at the pin at the corner of the alley (the beginning corner mentioned in Decker's deed to Pauley), and Decker was at the other end; that the 56 feet called for in his deed extended about 6 feet beyond a fence which had been erected by Creasey, and which ran the full depth of the lot, namely 90 feet; that Decker promised "he would establish the line, guarantee the line to me." B. M. Green, a civil engineer, surveyed the block of lots in which the Creasey and Decker lots were situated on April 28, 1919, and his testimony, together with a map of his survey, was to the effect that, measuring from the Epperly line, "an old established line," the correct line between the Decker lot and the Creasey lot was practically the same as the fence line erected by Creasey, and that the northeast corner of the Decker lot (the beginning corner in Decker's deed to Pauley) would have to be extended between 5 and 6 feet over into the alley to make the 257½ feet northerly from the Epperly line. There was also testimony to show that the distance along the front between the iron pin, mentioned as the beginning point in Decker's deed to Pauley, and the fence erected by Creasey, is 50 feet. Creasey testified that the iron pin described in Decker's deed as marking the southeast corner is 6 feet on the inside of his (Creasey's) lot. Creasey also stated that he moved some posts over to straighten his line after the decision of the court in the ejectment suit, but did not say that he did it in accordance with that judgment, nor did he give any testimony explaining just what was decided as the correct line. Testimony was introduced as to the amount plaintiff had been damaged as a result of the loss of 6 feet of ground; witness Blair stating that he would put it at $500. It was further shown that J. A. Hamilton, who purchased the lot from Pauley as having a frontage of 50 feet, paid $1,600 for the property, $400 less than the price paid by Pauley to Decker. At the conclusion of his evidence plaintiff moved for leave of the court "to amend his declaration by adding thereto a count based on ouster by paramount title without reference to the ejectment suit." The court refused the proposed amendment, but offered to permit the plaintiff to take a nonsuit, which plaintiff declined to do. Thereupon the court upon motion by defendant directed the jury to find a verdict for defendant, and a judgment was rendered on the verdict so directed.

The testimony of plaintiff as to what portion of the Decker lot was held by Creasey and confirmed to him in the ejectment suit was as follows:

"Q. Do you know, or have any knowledge, of a part of this lot that you purchased having been involved in an ejectment suit? A. I heard it talked of. Q. Do you know it now? A. I know it now. Q. Between what parties? A. Between A. A. Decker and L. H. Creasey. Q. Do you know what part, if any, of this lot was involved in that suit? A. I suppose it was the 6 feet, that is what I am short now."

The court properly sustained defendant's objection to the foregoing answer and struck it out. The answer is indefinite, not responsive to the question, and merely states plaintiff's supposition as to what was decided in the ejectment suit. The only question in regard to the ejectment suit propounded to witness Kittinger was the following:

"Do you know anything about this ejectment suit that was brought by Decker against Creasey; what it involved?"

This question is inaptly framed. There had been no evidence to show that Kittinger knew anything about the ejectment suit, and he was therefore not qualified to speak on "what it involved." The objection of defendant to this question was properly sustained by the court. Parol testimony, properly introduced, to locate and establish the portion of land lost in the ejectment suit, would have been admissible.

[2, 3] The action of the court in directing a verdict for defendant and rendering a judgment of nil capiat thereon is the main error relied upon by plaintiff for reversal. Inasmuch as the calls in Decker's declaration in the ejectment suit describing the property then alleged by Decker to belong to him and the calls in the deed from Decker to Pauley are identical, and since in the ejectment suit there was a disclaimer by Creasey of all the property so described in Decker's declaration except that portion covered by a deed from J. D. Kittinger and wife to Creasey, and since in the ejectment suit there was a judgment for Creasey, it is clear that by reason of the judgment in the ejectment suit Pauley lost some portion of the land conveyed to him by Decker. It is true that competent evidence was not adduced to show the exact number of feet of ground lost to Pauley as a result of Decker's failure to successfully assert his title in the ejectment suit for all claimed by him under his deed from D. P. Thomas; but it is shown that he lost some part of it, and for that reason was entitled to at least nominal damages for the breach of the covenant of general warranty. It further appears that Pauley failed to be put in possession of between 5 and 6 feet of the ground conveyed to him by Decker, and the damage for the loss of this amount of ground was shown to be at least $400. Although plaintiff did not produce competent evidence to connect the loss of any exact amount of ground with the judgment in the ejectment suit, it is reasonably certain that such evidence exists. In the case of Indian Refining Co. v. Chilton,

109 S. E. 487, decided at this term, Judge Ritz says:

"Where an erroneous judgment has been entered denying the plaintiff even nominal damages when the evidence clearly warranted the same, this court will not refuse to take jurisdiction of a writ of error to reverse such erroneous judgment where it appears that the plaintiff in all probability is entitled to recover, if at all, more than $100, but, by inadvertence, or by misconceiving the nature of the evidence necessary to establish his rights, failed to properly present the case at the hearing."

Also in Shapiro v. Benenson, 181 App. Div. 19, 167 N. Y. Supp. 1004, it is held:

"Although a case will not be reversed to allow a recovery of nominal damages, where one was entitled to nominal damages and it can be seen that on another trial he may show substantial damages, and it would be an injustice to allow the judgment to stand, he will be given another trial."

In addition see Harman v. Washington Fuel Co., 228 Ill. 298, 81 N. E. 1017.

Here the plaintiff because of a misconception of the force of his evidence or for some other reason did not properly present his case to the jury, therefore he does not prevail in this court so as to entitle him to recover costs.

We reverse the judgment complained of, set aside the verdict of the jury, and remand the cause for a new trial.

Reversed and remanded.

STATE v. UNDERWOOD. (No. 4093.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Weapons — 7—Defendant possessing pistol only to examine at invitation of owner not guilty of carrying a pistol.

Upon the trial on an indictment for carrying a pistol, if it be shown that the defendant had the pistol in his possession only for the purpose of a casual examination, upon the invitation of the owner, who has it at a place at which he has a right to carry it, and without any intention or purpose on the part of the defendant to control the use or possession of such weapon, he should be found not guilty.

2. Criminal law — 338(6)—On trial for carrying pistol, the state should not show that arresting officer had warrants for some of defendant's relatives for other offenses.

Upon the trial on an indictment for carrying a pistol, it is improper to permit the state to prove that, at the time the defendant was arrested upon the charge, the officer who arrested him had warrants for some of his relatives for other offenses.

Error to Circuit Court, Nicholas County.

George Underwood was convicted of carrying a pistol, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Brown, Wolverton & Ayres, of Summersville, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. A. Blessing, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RITZ, P. Plaintiff in error, George Underwood, was indicted, tried, and convicted in the circuit court of Nicholas county for carrying a pistol, and by this writ of error he seeks to reverse the judgment of conviction against him.

The facts proved by the state are that just prior to the time of Underwood's arrest, one of his nephews, a young man by the name of Ward, had been killed, and on the day of the arrest he accompanied the remains of this nephew from a hospital at Richwood where he died to his home at Tioga. It seems that there was some feeling between the relatives of the dead boy and the relatives of the man charged with the killing. An any rate, a deputy sheriff of the county had a peace warrant for the arrest of Underwood. When the train, upon which Underwood was a passenger, arrived at Tioga, he and another nephew got off and accompanied the remains of the dead boy to his home about a mile from the station, and there remained until some time in the afternoon, when they went to the home of Underwood's sister, a Mrs. Ward, the mother of the young man who was accompanying Underwood. While there the sheriff and two of his deputies came for the purpose of placing Underwood and the nephew who had accompanied him to Tioga under arrest upon the peace warrant. The deputy sheriff who was leading the party testifies that he knocked at the door, and receiving no response opened it and walked in; that when he got inside he observed Underwood going into an adjoining room, at the same time pulling his pistol from his hip pocket; that he immediately covered Underwood with his pistol, observing which Underwood dropped his weapon into a flour sack; that he at once went into the room and recovered the pistol from this receptacle, and it was produced upon the trial of the case. Underwood admits that he had the pistol in his possession, and that he dropped it into the flour sack, but he denies that he ever had it in his hip pocket, or even attempted to draw it on the deputy sheriff. His defense is that after he and his nephew came to the house of Mrs. Ward they sat down in the living room with the other members of the family, consisting of Mrs. Ward, her married daughter, and another son, and that while in conversation the Ward boy who had accompanied him, and who had been in the military service of the government in France, remarked that he would show him a real gun; that Ward thereupon got up, unlocked the dresser drawer, and took from it the pistol which Underwood had at the time the officers entered; that the boy handed it to him, and he was simply looking at it at the time of the entrance of the officers, and that he got up and attempted to dispose of it in the adjoining room for the reason that he knew there were suspicions of trouble, and he did not want any one to see any firearms in the possession of any of the family at that time; that he did not at that time even know that the parties who were coming were officers. In this statement he is corroborated by his nephew who claims to have handed him the pistol, and by his niece who was present at the time. His sister, who was also in the room at the time, was not produced as a witness, it being suggested that she was too ill to attend the trial; and another nephew who was present in the room, and who was introduced as a witness, stated that he knew nothing about it, that he was sick in bed, and did not recollect of waking up until the officers came into the room and aroused him. On this state of the evidence the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that if they believed that he received the pistol only for the purpose of incidental examination, without any intent to carry it or retain the possession of it, that he was not guilty under the law, which instruction the court refused to give, and this action of the court is the basis of the principal assignment of error.

The defendant contends that he would not be guilty of an offense under the statute if at the home of another he had in his possession a pistol simply for the purpose of examination, as he contends was the case here, without any intention of carrying it or retaining or having the possession or control of it. While the state contends that his intent is entirely immaterial; that if he had a pistol in his possession, with however innocent an intent, at a place other than his own home, he is guilty of an offense. If the intent in a case like this is not material, and if the mere possession of the weapon under any circumstances is sufficient to establish the offense, then one would be guilty if he carried a pistol or had a pistol upon his person without knowledge that it was there. Certainly no one would contend for a conviction under such circumstances. The act inveighed against by this statute is carrying about the person a dangerous and deadly weapon. The manifest purpose of the act was to prevent the many casualties arising from the promiscuous possession of such weapons, not only those arising from the deliberate use thereof, but from their accidental discharge as well. On this occasion Underwood's nephew Ward was at his own house, and under the law had an undoubted right to have the weapon in his possession. If the jury believed that Underwood simply took this weapon into his possession at Ward's invitation for the purpose of looking at it, it being what his nephew described as a real gun, is he guilty of the offense interdicted by the law?

[1] It seems to us that this statute contemplates some possession of the weapon more or less permanent in its character, and not simply a possession for such a casual purpose as was attempted to be shown here—in other words, a possession of the weapon indicating an intention to control its use for at least a short time. We do not mean that the intention must exist to use it for any unlawful purpose. If the jury come to the conclusion that the party who has the weapon in his possession has it with the intention to control its use for any length of time, no matter what the use may be, then he would be guilty. If, however, his possession of it is under the direction of the owner, at the owner's home, and simply for the purpose of permitting the owner to gratify his pride in the exhibition of a weapon of which he is particularly proud, as is contended by Underwood in this case, there would be no offense under this statute. We have been able to find few adjudicated cases having any direct bearing upon the question involved here. A very similar question did arise in the case of Jackson v. State, 12 Ga. App. 427, 77 S. E. 371, and the court came to the same conclusion in that case that we have reached in this. There is also some discussion of the construction to be placed on such statutes as this in the case of Strickland v. State of Georgia, 137 Ga. 1, 72 S. E. 260, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 115, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 323.

We do not want to be understood as saying that the contention of Underwood in this case is necessarily true. The fact that he carried this weapon into the kitchen and attempted to secrete it in a flour sack, together with the evidence introduced by the state to show the character of his possession, makes it a question to be determined by the jury under proper instructions. The court, however, gave an instruction on motion of the state which in effect excluded from the jury's consideration Underwood's defense, and refused to give to the jury an instruction which required them to pass upon that defense.

[2] The defendant also insists that the trial court erred in the admission of certain evidence over his objection. The sheriff was permitted to testify over the objection of the defendant that on the occasion of Underwood's arrest he had peace warrants for several other Underwoods, relatives of the defendant. This evidence could have no purpose in this case, unless it was to show that Underwood belonged to a family whose disposition was generally bad. This is not the kind of evidence to be introduced upon the trial of such an issue as was presented to the jury here. Whether Underwood's relatives were good or bad people was not material, and the court should not have admitted the evidence.

For the errors pointed out above, we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict of the jury, and remand the case for a new trial.

SHARP et al. v. CAMPBELL. (No. 4288.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Trial court's finding based upon sufficient evidence will not be disturbed.

The finding of a trial court that a sale of personal property, evidenced by a written contract incomplete and uncertain as to time of payment, was absolute and not conditional, and made upon credit, though not upon time, supported by conduct of the parties and other facts and circumstances tending to prove its correctness, cannot be disturbed by the appellate court.

2. Sales §202(1)—Where seller has done all the contract requires, title passes whether payment has been made or not.

If the vendor of personal property has done all that execution of the contract requires him to do, the title passes, whether payment has been made or not, unless the contract provides otherwise in express terms or by necessary implication.

3. Sales §299—Rightful stoppage in transitu does not require buyer to enter into new contract, while wrongful stoppage constitutes breach by seller.

A rightful stoppage of goods in transitu does not work a rescission of the contract of sale, nor require the vendee to enter into any new or different contract, in order to obtain the goods, except in respect of the matter of payment. It merely restores the seller's lien relinquished by the shipment, and, if the vendee promptly tenders payment, the vendor must accept it and deliver the goods, and his refusal to do so renders him liable for a breach of his contract. A wrongful stoppage in transitu amounts to no more than a breach of the contract by the vendor.

4. Sales §299—Stoppage in transitu does not rescind executory contract or relieve seller on buyer's prompt tender of payment.

Nor does the stoppage of a shipment of goods under an executory contract rescind the contract or relieve the vendor, if the vendee promptly tenders payment.

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Action by N. R. Sharp and others against Granville Campbell in the Justice Court, where plaintiffs prevailed, and upon appeal to the circuit court there was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. G. Kump, of Elkins, and Charles O. Scott, of Clarksburg, for plaintiff in error.

William W. Walters, of Clarksburg, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The sole inquiry arising on this writ of error goes to the question whether the trial court, on a submission to it of issues raised between the parties, has made a correct finding or one that cannot be disturbed here, under the rules of procedure; the facts being somewhat dependent upon conflicting oral evidence. No complaint as to anything else is found in the petition or the brief filed for the plaintiff in error.

The action commenced in a justice's court, where the plaintiffs prevailed, and tried again in the circuit court, on an appeal, with a like result, except as to the amount of the judgment, was instituted to recover damages for nondelivery of 100 bushels of potatoes, sold by the defendant to the plaintiffs, at $3.50 per bushel, in Randolph county, and to be shipped to Clarksburg in Harrison county. They were shipped under a bill of lading which does not appear in the record, but it seems to be conceded that they were consigned to the vendees, on the one hand, and, on the other, that the consignees were to pay the freight. The breach of contract, if any, occurred at Clarksburg, after arrival of the shipment. After delivery of the potatoes to the carrier, the vendor undertook to notify the vendees, the Country Produce Company, of the shipment, by telephone, but was unable to locate them. Fearing something wrong, he went to Clarksburg, before it arrived, forbade delivery by the carrier, and, through the agent by whom the purchase had been made, succeeded in finding Sharp, one member of the firm. The firm had no conspicuous place of business in the city. It conducted its business in the basement of Sharp's residence situated in a suburban section. Still uneasy and fearful, in view of these facts, the vendor tried to induce Sharp to pay for the potatoes in advance of their arrival. Sharp offered to pay $100 on them and give his postdated check for the balance. This offer was declined and the parties concluded to await arrival of the shipment. On the day of its arrival, or soon afterward, the vendor again appeared early in the forenoon, and, again through the agent, located Sharp and apprised him of the arrival and insisted upon acceptance of the potatoes and payment. Sharp told him he would be unable to do so before 2 o'clock p. m. or about that time, because he was otherwise engaged. Campbell waited at the courthouse, until a few minutes after 2 o'clock, and, Sharp not having arrived, sold the potatoes to Shingleton Bros., at $4 per bushel, less the freight. If the testimony of Sharp and his brother is true, they were at the railway station before 2 o'clock, with a truck driven by the latter, to take possession of the potatoes, and the former had provided himself with $400 in cash with which to pay for them. Not finding Campbell there, Sharp went to the courthouse, seeking him, and arrived soon after he had left for the station. On his return to the station, he found Campbell there, paying the freight, claiming a breach of the contract by the vendees and ordering delivery of the potatoes to Shingleton Bros. from whom he had had an offer of purchase, before the shipment arrived. Sharp protested against the delivery to Shingleton Bros., and says he produced the money and tendered payment, and the court could have found that the time of the tender, if made as Sharp says it was, without contradiction, was prior to the delivery.

[1] There was a written, but very informal contract between the parties, in pursuance of which the shipment was made. As to time of payment it is silent, unless the incomplete phrase, "which due arrival," at the conclusion of it, can be deemed to have been intended for application to such time. Whether it was or not is a question of fact, the trial court has passed upon. If it found that the sale was made on credit, but not on time, that is, that delivery was to be made in advance of payment, but payment to be made immediately afterward, its finding cannot be disturbed. Likely the bill of lading evidenced shipment to the vendees, for the vendor deemed it necessary to stop the potatoes in transitu. If he had consigned them to himself, to be delivered to the vendees, pursuant to an assignment of the bill of lading, stoppage in transitu would have been unnecessary, for, in that case, delivery could not have been made without his consent. The vendor must have thought he had authorized delivery in advance of payment, else he would not have deemed it necessary to forbid it.

[3] If the contract was one of sale on such credit, as the court could have found it was, and not a conditional sale, what afterwards transpired between the parties did not change it. There was no consideration for any alteration of it, and the seller's exercise of his right of stoppage in transitu, if any, and the court could have found there was no justification for it, because there is no proof of insolvency, did not effect any alteration thereof. It merely restored constructive possession with a lien to secure payment of the purchase money. Gibson v. Carruthers,

8 M. & W. 321, 338; Morris v. Shryock, 50 Miss. 590; Newhall v. Vargas, 13 Me. 93, 29 Am. Dec. 489; Mechem, Sales, sec. 1528. It did not work a rescission of the contract of sale and render it necessary for the vendees to enter into a new one on different terms, in order to obtain the potatoes. Cross v. O'Donnell, 44 N. Y. 661, 4 Am. Rep. 721; Rucker v. Donovan, 18 Kan. 251, 19 Am. Rep. 84; Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 307, 23 Am. Dec. 607; Rogers v. Thomas, 20 Conn. 53; Jordan v. James, 5 Ohio, 88; Mechem, Sales, § 1612. If they came prepared and willing to pay and offering to do so, while the goods were still actually or constructively in the possession of the vendor, he was bound to accept the money and deliver the goods to them, or make himself liable for damages by his refusal to do so, even though he had rightfully stopped the shipment, unless there was unreasonable delay in the offer of payment, and there was none.

[2] It is equally manifest that the court could rightfully have found that the title to the potatoes passed by delivery thereof to the carrier for shipment to the vendees. The vendor says they were to be taken upon the weight as given by him. If that be true, nothing remained to be done by him, in execution of his contract, after he had delivered the goods to the carrier, under a consignment to the vendees. Under such circumstances, the title passes, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary. Acme Food Co. v. Older, 64 W. Va. 255, 268, 61 S. E. 235, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 807; Buskirk v. Peck, 57 W. Va. 360, 50 S. E. 432; Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1, 57 Am. Rep. 633; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. 910.

[4] Even if the sale was executory and conditioned upon payment before delivery, so as to preclude passage of the title, the vendor's power to stop his own goods in transitu did not relieve him from his contract, nor change its terms, unless the vendees were insolvent or refused performance. Pattison v. Culton, 33 Ind. 240; Mechem, Sales, §§ 1614-1617. And the court could have found, upon the evidence, that there was no insolvency, nor any refusal to pay within the time allowed by the terms of the contract. On the first interview between the vendor and one of the vendees, the latter avowed his eagerness and ability to take and pay for the goods, on arrival. After arrival, he came with the money and offered payment on the day of the demand therefor. The vendor's nervousness over the situation imposed no new obligation or duty upon the vendees, nor were they bound to respect his mere convenience. There was no occasion for his great haste, in reselling. He had a standing offer from Shingleton Bros. and could safely have waited until 3 o'clock or even 4 o'clock, and then resold and caught the train by which he desired to go home. Besides, his assembling of witnesses to the time of his leaving the courthouse, the slowness of his allowance of time after 2 o'clock, the haste with which he resold, his refusal to deliver on tender of the money, while the goods were still within his power, and other circumstances strongly tend to prove lack of good faith and an ulterior motive on his part.

Subsequent insolvency of Sharp, one of the vendees, is not shown in the record. We cannot take it from the brief filed, if it is material, and we express no opinion as to whether it is or not.

Perceiving no error in the judgment, we will affirm it.

MALCOLM et al. v. TALLEY. (No. 4313.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence sustained.

Sustained by facts and circumstances making probability of its correctness so strong that the contrary thereof cannot reasonably be supposed, the finding of a trial court upon an issue as to which the oral evidence is in irreconcilable conflict will not be disturbed by the appellate court.

2. Witnesses §159(8)—Grantor is competent to testify to agreement with grantee and her deceased husband, who paid the purchase money.

In a suit against the grantee in a deed for correction of an error therein, the grantor is competent to testify to the agreement with the grantee and her deceased husband, in pursuance of which the deed was made, notwithstanding payment of the purchase money by the husband and his participation in the transaction.

3. Reformation of instruments §25—In suit to reform deed, plaintiff will not be denied relief for merely constructive fraud in stating the quantity.

If, in such suit, it is ascertained and determined that, by mutual mistake in the execution, delivery, and acceptance of such deed, land was included, which the vendors did not intend to sell nor the vendee to buy, relief will not be denied the plaintiffs, because the bill or the evidence discloses an actual or possible liability on the part of the vendors in favor of the vendee, for compensation for injury occasioned by a false representation as to the quantity of the land actually sold and intended to be conveyed, amounting to a merely constructive fraud.

4. Equity §66—In favor of defendant calling for denial of relief to plaintiff upon his failure to accord, it must be embraced in the particular cause of action.

An equity in favor of the defendant, calling for denial of relief to the plaintiff, on his failure to accord it, must be embraced in and a part of the particular cause of action constituting the basis of the relief to which the plaintiff is conditionally entitled, not one arising out of a different or collateral cause of action, even though both causes of action emanated from the same transaction.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Suit by Pearl G. Malcolm and others against Caroline H. Talley, and from the decree therein, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. R. Thompson, of Huntington, for appellant.

W. W. Smith, of Huntington, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. By way of reformation of a deed conveying a city lot, upon the theory of a mutual mistake in the execution thereof, the appellants were required by the decree now under review to reconvey to the grantors a strip of land $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide and 200 feet long, and they complain of it.

The facts as alleged in the bill and found by the court are substantially as follows: For and in consideration of \$7,200 paid in cash, the plaintiffs conveyed to the defendant a city lot on which there was a brick dwelling house, describing it as being lot No. 20 of block No. 14, and the westerly two and one-half feet of lot No. 19 of block No. 14, fronting together $32\frac{1}{2}$ feet on Fifth avenue of the city of Huntington. What the parties had actually agreed upon was a sale and conveyance of the lot in accordance with monuments which made the frontage only 31 feet. The determining monument was the center of a concrete walk between the house sold and another retained by the grantors, to be used by both owners for access to the basements and back yards of their houses. Under the impression that the contractors, in constructing the two houses, had so placed them that a line drawn along the center of the walk would put $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet of lot No. 19 into lot No. 20, the vendors informed the vendee that the ground they were selling would be limited and bounded on the east by a line drawn along the center of the walk, and extended to the avenue, and the alley in the rear, and that, as so sold, the property would include lot No. 20 and $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet of lot No. 19. The deed was executed and delivered in exchange for the purchase money, upon that theory and with that understanding. It was soon discovered, however, that the contractor had not located the buildings as directed, that the line agreed upon would take only 1 foot out of lot No. 19, and that the deed had passed all of the walk between the two houses and carried land right up to the wall of the house on lot No. 19, and under the eaves thereof and portions of the chimneys built partly on the outside of the wall. Refusal on the part of the grantees to reconvey the portion of lot No. 19 not sold nor intended to be conveyed was followed by this suit for reformation of the deed.

There was no actual fraud on the part of the vendors in the transaction, but, on well-settled principles, their false representation, if prejudicial to the vendee, amounted to a fraud in law, for they could not rightfully make it without knowledge as to its correctness, and, having so made it, the vendee is entitled to compensation for the injury occasioned thereby, if it was of such character as entitled her to rely upon it as an inducement to the purchase, and she did so. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438. Hence, it constitutes no obstacle to right in the vendors to have reformation of the deed so as to correct the mistake in it, even though, treated as a false representation as to the area of the land, it may constitute the basis of a cause of action on the part of the vendee.

[1] The evidence is highly conflicting as to whether the center of the walk was agreed upon as the line, but we are of the opinion that neither the vendors nor the vendee could have intended the consequences resulting from the deed as executed and delivered. The vendee, her husband, and her daughter all inspected the property before the contract was made or the deed delivered. It is highly improbable that they thought they were buying the projection and chimneys of the adjoining house and cutting off access to its basement and back yard. Mrs. Malcolm testified that she had taken them to the walk and pointed it out as the limit of their purchase. While they deny this strenuously, they saw the relation and arrangement of the two houses, and it cannot well be supposed or even imagined that they thought, in dealing for one house, they were seriously impairing another, and actually buying part of it.

[2] The evidence of Mrs. Malcolm, upon which this finding is based, is objected to as being testimony to a personal transaction between her and a deceased person, the husband of Mrs. Talley, who took the contract of purchase, paid the purchase money, and caused the deed to be made to his wife, and is now dead. This objection is obviously untenable, because neither of the parties to this controversy claims title under the deceased husband. Mrs. Talley claims under her deed and by purchase from Mrs. Malcolm. The husband's payment of the purchase money was a gift of money to her, which is in no way involved.

[3, 4] Our conclusion as to what was actually sold and intended to be conveyed, and the existence of a mistake in the deed, would affirm the decree, but for the suggestion that reformation cannot be had except upon condition of payment by the plaintiffs of compensation for the foot and a half of ground falsely represented as being included in the land actually sold. That cause of action, if it exists, has not been asserted in this suit by any pleading of any kind. The only issues made by any of the pleadings pertain to the existence of the mistake and mutuality thereof. Some of the evidence adduced goes beyond them, and tends to prove right of compensation in the vendee, but she has not asked it nor sought it in any way. As it and the cause of action set up in the bill grew out of the same transaction, no doubt it could have been set up by way of a demand for cross-relief.

But it is not such an equity as bars relief to the plaintiffs, conditionally, under the well-known maxim invoked, which does not extend to every case in which a defendant may have relief by a cross-bill. Its applicability depends upon the character of the defendant's equity or legal right which must in some form amount to a charge upon, or equity against, the particular demand set up in the bill, or a covenant or condition limiting it. If a mortgagor wants to redeem, or to cancel the mortgage, he must pay the mortgage debt, the right to which is embodied right in the instrument from which he seeks to be relieved. A taxpayer seeking to enjoin a tax, part of which is valid and part invalid, must pay the valid part. A creditor seeking reformation of a deed of trust or mortgage to secure his debt, by inclusion of property inadvertently omitted, must pay back or credit on the debt usurious interest he has received, because the right to such payment or credit is inevitably involved in the ascertainment of the amount of the debt sought to be made a lien on the omitted property by reformation. An owner of land seeking cancellation of a void tax deed must offer to reimburse the purchaser for the purchase money and taxes paid by him, because the statute governing the subject makes such offer a condition of the relief sought. A plaintiff seeking an accounting in equity must allow all mutual credits shown to be due the defendant. In a bill by which the plaintiff seeks an interest in property, the legal title or possession of which is held by the defendant, on the theory of a trust in his favor, he must pay all proper charges against the interest he seeks to obtain. In all of these instances of the application of the maxim, and every other in which it has been properly applied, the defendant's right, whether legal or equitable, is part and parcel of the specific cause of action asserted by the plaintiff or necessarily involved in it. Upon analysis, they are all found to be inseparable or reciprocal rights embodied in the same cause of action, not rights involved in separate or clearly separable causes of action.

Defining this rule, Vice Chancellor Wigram said in Hanson v. Keating, 4 Hare. 1:

"It decides in the abstract that the court giving the plaintiff the relief to which he is entitled will do so only upon the terms of his submitting to give the defendant such corresponding rights (if any) as he also may be entitled to in respect of the subject matter of the suit."

Illustrating it, he observed:

"If, for example, a plaintiff seeks an account against the defendant, the court will require the plaintiff to do equity by submitting himself to account in the same matter in which he asks an account; the reason of which is that the court does not take accounts partially, and perhaps ineffectually, but requires that the whole subject be, once for all, settled between the parties. It is only (I may observe as a general rule) to the one matter which is the subject of a given suit that the rule applies, and not to distinct matters pending between the same parties."

Later in his opinion, he cites Agabeg v. Hartwell and Colvin v. Hartwell, 5 Cl. & Fin. 484 (House of Lords), as holding that relief cannot be denied the plaintiff, because it appears that the defendant is entitled to a set-off which he may recover in another action. This is his clear and concise analysis of that case:

"The Vice Chancellor of England and Lord Brougham, on appeal upon the general ground that he who would have equity must do equity, required the plaintiff in the latter cause to submit to an account of certain moneys he had in his hands, in which the defendants claimed an interest, as the price of a decree for an account against the defendants; there being no necessary connection between the two accounts. This decree, therefore, went to the House of Lords under every circumstance of disadvantage. The House of Lords investigated the case with a view to the question whether the defendants were entitled to have the two accounts blended; and, being of the opinion that the defendants had no such equity, the decree was reversed."

The rule was interpreted in accordance with the view above expressed and here asserted in Gibson v. Goldsmid, 5 De G. M. & G. 757, holding, as stated in the headnotes, that—

"The rule that he who seeks equity must do equity is restricted to an equity in respect of the subject-matter of the suit. Where, therefore, in a deed of dissolution of partnership, one partner assigned certain foreign shares (which were recited to be transferable, as it was believed, by delivery), and covenanted for further assurance, and the other partner covenanted to indemnify the former against certain liabilities, and it afterwards appeared that the shares were not transferable by delivery, but required a formal act to complete the assignment, held, in a specific performance suit instituted by the assignee of the shares, that he was entitled to have the assignment complete, although there might in the meantime have been on his part a failure to perform the covenant of indemnity."

Nothing inconsistent with this interpretation of the rule has been found in any of the hundreds of American decisions involving the principle. The following text from 21 Corpus Juris, p. 174, based upon a great many of them, is well expressed and perfectly harmonizes with it:

"The maxim requires that any person seeking the aid of equity shall have accorded, shall offer to accord, or will be required to accord, the other party all the equitable rights to which the other is entitled in respect to the subject-matter. Relief inconsistent with the equities of the adverse party will be denied, and where the granting of relief raises equitable rights in favor of the defendant, the according of such rights will be imposed as a condition of granting the relief."

Mark the limitation of the reciprocal equities so protected to "the subject-matter." That means the cause of action set up in the bill, not every cause of action arising out of the transaction or circumstances giving birth to it. The protected equities of the defendant must be embodied in that cause of action, or grow out of it, in some form. Merely collateral relationship to it, of another distinct cause of action arising out of the same transaction, does not suffice, as precedents above referred to clearly disclose.

The cause of action set up in the bill in this case is right to reformation of the deed, so as to exclude part of the land conveyed by it, but not sold nor intended to be sold. If the defendant has a cause of action against the plaintiff, it is for compensation for injury by wrongful inducement to pay more money for what she did buy than it was worth, or than she otherwise would have paid. This she could recover in an independent suit, either at law or in equity, the cause of action being one of concurrent jurisdiction. These two causes are in no way dependent upon one another. If the deed had been correctly drawn and the false representation made, the defendant would have the same cause of action she now has, if any. That supposed unliquidated liability in her favor is not a lien on the strip she never bought, and which the decree excludes from the deed. In no sense has she a contractual hold upon it, and, in my opinion, the maxim invoked does not give it. If she had spent money in improving the strip in ignorance of the mistake in the deed and in reliance upon its terms, she might have an equity in the subject-matter of the bill. If this were a suit for the purchase money, the compensation she is entitled to, if any, would be an equity against the demand set up, the subject-matter of the bill, for it would reduce the amount to be recovered. It would be a mutual credit upon the money demand, and so be necessarily included in that particular cause of action.

Under this interpretation of the maxim, which is manifestly correct, the plaintiffs are not required to pay the defendant compensation for the injury occasioned by the false representation, as a condition precedent to right to have correction of the mistake in the deed, even if we could see that they are liable for it. Hence, it is immaterial whether the defendant's supposed right appears on the face of the bill or has been revealed in the evidence. Being an independent cause of action, but related because it grew out of the transaction giving rise to the other, it probably could have been set up in this cause, and, not having been asserted, it may be prosecuted in another action; but it constitutes no ground for withholding the relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled.

The cases illustrating the application of the maxim show that the denial of relief under it is necessary to the protection of the defendant. In all of them, unconditional award of relief to the plaintiff would forever bar right in the defendant to the equity due him. That is not true of separable and distinct causes of action, which may or may not be set up by cross-bill, at the will and pleasure of the defendant. If the principle is not limited to the defendant's equity involved in the plaintiff's cause of action, much confusion and even hardship may result from its application. To broaden the scope of litigation and make one clear case of relief await determination of a lot of collateral controversies, not even raised by any pleadings, would be decidedly inequitable.

Upon these principles and conclusions, the decree complained of will be affirmed.

ABNEY BARNES CO. et al. v. DAVY POCAHONTAS COAL CO. et al. (No. 4205.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Judicial sales §46—Where property was sold, sale reopened, and again sold to same purchaser, defects in first sale not applicable to second.

Where the court decreeing a sale of property by special commissioners, and before the report of the sale by the commissioners is confirmed, upon an upset bid filed opens up the sale and entertains competitive bidding in open court, and finally knocks down the property to the purchaser at the former sale at a greatly advanced price, the prior exceptions filed to the report of the special commissioners for supposed defects in the notice of sale and unsupported charges of efforts on the part of the purchaser and others to stifle bidding, will not be applied to the sale so made by the court and duly confirmed, and to which no exceptions were taken prior to confirmation.

2. Mortgages §529(3)—Proposition by mortgagor to special commissioner at sale not entertained not ground for setting aside sale.

Nor will the proposition of a mortgage debtor, made to such special commissioners during the crying of the sale, to redeem the property by complying with some provisions of the mortgage, not entertained by such special commissioners nor reported by them to the court, be good ground for setting aside a sale made by the court in open court under a decree directing the property to be sold, not only for the benefit of the mortgage creditors, but also for the benefit of other lien creditors who instituted the suit and whose claims and their priorities were thereby decreed, such proposition not having been renewed to the court before confirmation of the sale upon an upset bid filed and entertained by the court.

3. Judicial sales §43—To justify setting aside evidence must be strong and convincing.

To justify the setting aside of a judicial sale, the evidence to support the motion must be strong and convincing, else it should be denied.

4. Judicial sales §31(2)—Sale may be made in open court on upset bid without special commissioner, and objections to former sale by commissioner are unavailing to latter.

The court having jurisdiction may make sale of the property proceeded against by creditors without the intervention of a special commissioner, and upon entertaining an upset bid, may conduct such sale in open court, and when a sale is so made and confirmed, exceptions filed to a prior report of sale by special commissioners, not pertinent to the sale made by the court, need not be considered, and will be unavailing in this court upon appeal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Suit by the Abney Barnes Company and another against the Davy Pocahontas Coal Company and others, and from a decree therein the said coal company appeals. Affirmed.

E. C. Marshall and Litz & Harman, all of Welch, for appellant.

Strother, Sale, Curd & Tucker, of Welch, for appellees.

MILLER, J. On May 12, 1919, the circuit court, by a decree agreed to and signed by the attorneys representing all parties to the cause, after reciting therein that the court had ascertained and decreed all liens and debts on the property of the Davy Pocahontas Coal Company, and disbursed on the prior liens as adjudged and decreed in prior decrees all the available funds in the hands of its special receivers except such as had been received by them since the last preceding term of the court, in accordance with the opinion and mandate of this court on a former appeal, and it still appearing that there were various creditors who had not been paid by the disbursements made, and the court being of opinion that it was proper to do so, did thereby adjudge, order and decree that said special receivers, Jaeger and Atkinson, thereby appointed special commissioners for the purpose, be and they were thereby authorized and directed to sell all of the real estate described in a former decree, and other property of each and every kind, of the said company, except monies, bills and accounts receivable, as a whole, at public auction, in McDowell County, at the court house door, on or before the 2nd day of September, 1919, to the highest bidder upon the following terms: One-third in cash, and the balance in equal payments at six and twelve months after date, evidenced by the notes or bonds of the purchaser payable to said receivers, bearing interest from date, to be secured as directed by the court, with good and approved security. And said decree contained and directed that said special receivers before making said sale should first advertise the same by publishing the time, terms and place of sale in some newspaper published in the town of Welch, McDowell County, and in some daily newspaper published in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, for eight consecutive weeks, once each week in each of said papers, and by posting a copy of said advertisement, for the same period, at the front door of the court house of said county. And said decree also required of said special commissioners that they execute a bond as such in the penalty of $175,000.00. And it was by agreement also adjudged that every other thing that might otherwise be required or necessary to such decree of sale and not therein expressly provided for, was thereby expressly waived and done away with by those consenting to the decree. And said special receivers were thereby also directed to make a report of said sale at the first day of the September term of the court, 1919.

And pursuant to said decree of sale, said special commissioners, having first qualified by giving bond as required, and after advertising the sale as directed, proceeded to and did sell said property upon the terms decreed, on said 2nd day of September, 1919, at which sale they reported to the court on September 9, 1919, that the Marine and Commerce Corporation of America, a corporation of the state of Delaware, being the highest bidder, had become the purchaser for the sum of $400,000.00, upon the terms provided by the decree, the commissioners however reporting, that as the purchaser had shown by affidavits and otherwise that it was the owner of 214 of the 297 six per cent sinking fund gold bonds of the Davy Pocahontas Coal Company, of the face value of $1,000.00 per bond, which entire issue was secured by the deed of trust of said defendant company to the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company of Baltimore, trustee, dated July 1, 1910, and which bonds secured by said deed of trust were the first lien upon the property sold, and since only 83 of said outstanding bonds were not owned by said purchaser, they had required the purchaser to pay them in cash only such proportion of the one-third cash payment provided for in the decree of sale as the amount of the 83 bonds bore to the amount of the entire 297 bonds, namely, $37,333.34, and had permitted the purchaser to deliver to them, on September 3, 1919, in accordance with the memorandum of sale, 96 of said bonds as the balance of the one-third cash payment; that September 6, 1919, said purchaser had paid them $96,000.00 in cash, in place of said 96 bonds, for which they had receipted to it, as a result of which they had received the entire one-third of the total cash selling price for the property; and in further compliance by said purchaser with the terms of the sale, its agent had tendered itself ready and willing to execute for the deferred payments its interest bearing notes or bonds secured as directed, as soon as the court should determine the form of such notes or bonds and security to be executed.

Upon the filing of the report of sale, on September 9, 1919, the defendant Davy Pocahontas Coal Company, by James Thomas, its solicitor, and Henry Rawie, a stockholder, tendered and filed three several exceptions in writing thereto, substantially alike, in substance and effect as follows:

First, that on the day of sale and before the sale was completed, the said company through its said solicitor tendered and offered to pay to said special commissioners a sum of money sufficient to cover and be equal to all arrears of interest upon said bonds with interest upon overdue installments of interest, and that said special commissioners would not and did not receive or accept such tender of payment, and did not restore the said Davy Pocahontas Coal Company and the holders of its bonds to their respective positions in respect to said bonds, in which they stood before default in the payment of said installments of interest, contrary to the provisions of Section 2 of Article 14 of the deed or mortgage, in regard to the redemption of the property from the sale or sales thereof for the purposes of the mortgage, providing that—

"If at any time after the principal of said bonds shall have been so declared to be due and payable, all arrears of interest upon said bonds (with interest upon overdue installments of interest) and all expenses, incurred by the Trustee or holders of said bonds, shall be paid by the Coal Company, or be collected out of the mortgaged premises before any sale thereof, or any part thereof, shall have been made, and then and in every case the Coal Company, the Trustee and the holders of said bonds may, at the demand of the Coal Company, be restored to the respective positions in which they stood before such default occurred, without, however, in any manner or way affecting or prejudicing any right or remedy consequent upon any other default hereunder."

Second, that the said Marine and Commerce Corporation of America and Walter L. Taylor, president and director of said coal company, who had bought and bargained for certain of the securities, open accounts and indebtedness of said coal company, but not, as the exceptors verily believed, bought or secured all of the indebtedness, securities or common stock outstanding against said company, publicly represented themselves before the date set for the public sale of said property, namely, September 2, 1919, as having acquired all but a minute percentage of the stock, bonds, securities, open accounts, judgments and other indebtedness of said company, and further holding out to the public that said property through their efforts would be withdrawn from public sale or auction thereof, under the provisions of said Section 2, Article 14; and the exceptors believed and state the fact to be that such statements, rumors and affirmations nullified the effect of the notice of sale of said property as published by said special commissioners pursuant to said decree, and whereby there was created in the public mind the belief that said property would be withdrawn from sale and would not be sold as advertised, and whereby bidders were prevented and deterred from attending said sale, and competitive bidding therefor was prevented and the property sold to the only bidder, the said Marine and Commerce Corporation of America, for the sum of $400,000.00.

Third, that the entire property of the said Davy Pocahontas Coal Company, as the decree directed, was not included in the advertisement of the public sale thereof, nor the decree therein properly set forth, in that there was included therein only the one-half undivided interest in all that certain real estate which was conveyed to said company by Killey S. French and others, by deed of February 5, 1912, when in fact the said company was the owner in fee of the whole estate in said property; and that the said property was sold for a grossly inadequate price.

[1] We find in the record no substantial bases for either of these three exceptions. As to the first there is not a particle of evidence to show any tender or offer of the Davy Pocahontas Coal Company, or of any one for it, to the said special commissioners on the day of sale, to comply with the provisions of said Section 2 of Article 14 of said mortgage. The exceptors stand wholly on the unsupported statements of their exceptions. Besides, the special commissioners were not authorized to entertain or accept any such offer. No such tender was made to the court prior to the sale, nor afterwards, on the report of the sale, nor before confirmation of the sale, a sale in fact made in open court following said report of sale and an upset bid made after the sale conducted by said special commissioners, at which sale so conducted by the court, the exceptors, if they were acting in good faith, were given the opportunity to make their proposition; but they did nothing of the kind, so far as the record shows, and thereby waived their rights, if any they had, at the time, to comply with the provision of said mortgage.

[2] But at the time of the alleged offer to redeem, the court, at the suit of others than the mortgage creditors, had decreed the property to be sold for their benefit as well as for that of the holders of the bonds secured by the mortgage, and the exceptors had no right to be restored to the possession of the property decreed to be sold as against other lien creditors. To have put itself in position to take advantage of said provision, said company was obliged to satisfy the debts of all subsequent lienors whose rights had been adjudicated by the decrees in the cause. The report of sale by the special commissioners contains no mention of the alleged offer of the exceptors, nor did they at any time prior to said sale propose to the court to redeem the property under the provisions of said Section 2 of Article 14. So that the first exceptions are wholly without merit, or evidence to sustain the fact of such offer, and were properly overruled. To justify the setting aside of a judicial sale, the evidence to support it must be strong and convincing. Here there was in fact no evidence. Connell v. Wilhelm, 36 W. Va. 598, 15 S. E. 245; Moran v. Clark, 30 W. Va. 358, 4 S. E. 303. 8 Am. St. Rep. 66; Tracey v. Shumate, 22 W. Va. 474; Beaty v. Veon, 18 W. Va. 291; Schmertz v. Hammond, 51 W. Va. 408, 41 S. E. 184; Atkinson v. Washington and Jefferson College, 54 W. Va. 32, 46 S. E. 253.

[3] The second exception was also without foundation in fact to support it. It stood upon the unsupported and unverified statement in the exception. Besides, whatever may have been the fact as to the efforts of the purchaser at the sale by the special commissioners to stifle bidding, that sale was not confirmed, but disregarded in the subsequent sale by the judge in open court, on receipt of an upset bid, and the final sale of the property by the court to the same purchaser at an advance of $40,000.00 over its bid at the first sale, or $440,000.00, to which sale no exceptions were filed by any of the parties, and the same was confirmed. That the court had the power and jurisdiction to make sale of the property without intervention of special commissioners, is well settled in this state. Core v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 689, 696; Castleman's Adm'r v. Castleman, 67 W. Va. 407, 412, 413, 68 S. E. 34, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 393; Klapneck & White v. Keltz, 50 W. Va. 331, 334, 335, 40 S. E. 570; Kable v. Mitchell, 9 W. Va. 492; Estill v. McClintic, 11 W. Va. 399.

[4] Nor do we see any merit in the third exception, of default in the advertisement of the one-half interest instead of the whole interest in the land conveyed by Killey S. French and others to the said coal company. As the sale was made in open court of all the land and property of said coal company, and not as advertised, any defect in the advertisement was nugatory and unimportant. Whatever was decreed to be sold, was sold by the court and confirmed, and if any interest was not decreed, it was not sold, and the record discloses no prejudice to debtor or creditors. And as the property was sold by the court, as shown, and brought $40,000.00 over the price at which it was sold by the special commissioners, and there were no exceptions to this sale on any grounds, we need not further consider this point.

For the foregoing reasons we will affirm the decree.

VASEY v. NEW EXPORT COAL CO et al.
(No. 4058.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 15, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Corporations §175—Stockholders whose stock was issued as fully paid and nonassessable, not to be excluded from participating in corporation, or required to pay par value.

Where a corporation issues stock as "fully paid and nonassessable," with the consent and participation of all the stockholders, and there is no charter, statutory or constitutional provision rendering the transaction void, the agreement is valid and binding as against the corporation, and it cannot afterwards repudiate the agreement, and exclude the holders of the stock from participation in the company's affairs, or compel them to pay the difference between the par value of the stock and what has been paid or agreed upon as full payment for it.

2. Corporations §175—Agreement whereby lease is transferred to corporation in return for entire stock given to promoters as "fully paid and nonassessable" held binding on corporation.

Where a corporation is organized by promoters, who desire to take a mining lease on coal properties, but prefer that the lease be executed in the name of the corporation, rather than in their own names, and the corporation, in consideration of the lease, issues to such promoters its entire capital stock as "fully paid and nonassessable," there being at the time no innocent incorporator upon whom the transaction might operate as a fraud, and no charter, statutory, or constitutional provision rendering the transaction void, the agreement is valid and binding upon the corporation, and cannot be questioned by it alone in a suit charging that the stock had not in fact been paid for.

3. Corporations §110—May not cancel stock for holders' failure to pay installment, but must foreclose unless by-laws provide for cancellation.

If a stockholder of a corporation, other than a railroad company, fail to pay any installment due upon his shares of stock, when required to do so by appropriate corporate action, and the company desires to enforce its claim for such unpaid balance by a direct proceeding against the stock itself, instead of against the owner, it cannot summarily cancel such stock, but must follow the foreclosure procedure prescribed by sections 29 and 30, chapter 53, Code (secs. 2862, 2863), unless by a by-law the corporation has provided for the method of cancellation.

4. Parties §71—Secretary-treasurer named as defendant in bill against corporation held not party in his own right.

Though a secretary-treasurer of a corporation be named in a bill as defendant by his official designation, he does not thereby become a defendant in his own right, nor does he by the adoption of the corporation's cross-bill answer to the bill, when neither the bill nor the answers show cause for relief in his favor or pray relief against him in his own right.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Suit by Joe Vasey against the New Export Coal Company and others. Decree in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and decree for defendant New Export Coal Company for $72.22, and costs awarded to plaintiff appellant.

W. J. Donaldson, of Knoxville, Tenn., and W. E. R. Byrne, of Charleston, for appellant. S. B. Avis and A. M. Belcher, both of Charleston, for appellees.

Conley & Johnson, of Charleston, amici curiæ, for Fischer and others.

LYNCH, J. Joe Vasey, plaintiff below, appellant here, complains of a decree canceling a certificate held by him representing 30 shares of the capital stock of the New Export Coal Company, the appellee, and directing that the latter do recover of and from the plaintiff the sum of $272.22, "that being the balance due from him to said defendant company upon a statement of the accounts between him and said company as made by the court and now ascertained." The suit was instituted in November, 1916, its main purpose being enforcement of a lien reserved by a paper writing in the nature of a deed of trust, given by defendant to secure a loan of $2,000 made by plaintiff to it August 23, 1915. The cross-bill answer, filed September, 1917, by way of affirmative relief prayed for a decree requiring plaintiff to pay the balance of the purchase money then due and unpaid for stock of defendant company theretofore issued to him, and for other incidental relief. The supplemental cross-bill answer, filed two years later, after reciting defendant's unsuccessful efforts to obtain payment of such unpaid purchase money, sought a decree compelling plaintiff to surrender for cancellation the certificate representing such stock. From a decree in favor of defendant plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

In 1915 the Perryville Coal & Mining Company owned about 166 acres of coal land in Kanawha county, in process of development, and fully equipped with tracks, chutes, triples, cars, and other appliances necessary to successful mining operations. Desiring to lease, instead of operate, its mines, lands, and equipment, it empowered its attorney, G. A. Bealor, to interest prospective lessees in the property. He brought the matter to the attention of the plaintiff, and succeeded in inducing him, together with Thomas Haggerty, J. L. Williams, and Patrick Gilday, to take a lease of the property and operate it for their common benefit and profit. Instead of taking the lease to themselves directly, plaintiff and his associates, including Bealor, organized the defendant New Export Coal Company, with capital stock of \$30,000, divided into 150 shares of a par value of \$200. The preliminary understanding was that the five shareholders were to share equally in the new enterprise, 30 shares to each, but Bealor, in order to speed its organization, voluntarily offered to give to plaintiff one-half of his stock if he would "push this thing along and get things going." Plaintiff, however, accepted only $7\frac{1}{2}$ shares of the proposed gift, directing that the other $7\frac{1}{2}$ be given to Haggerty. On April 12, 1915, the stock was issued in the following proportions: Vasey, $37\frac{1}{2}$ shares; Haggerty, $37\frac{1}{2}$ shares; Williams, 30 shares; Gilday, 30 shares; Bealor, 15 shares. The certificates expressly provided on their face that they were "fully paid and nonassessable." To the New Export Coal Company, thus organized, as lessee, the Perryville Coal & Mining Company executed a lease dated April 27, 1915, for a term of 20 years with royalty provision of 8 cents for each ton of 2,000 pounds mined and shipped from the premises; the minimum royalty prescribed being \$2,500 per annum.

This lease constituted the sole assets of the defendant corporation. The incorporators paid nothing into its treasury at the time of the organization. The only consideration furnished by them for their stock was the lease from the Perryville Coal & Mining Company to the defendant, which they permitted the former to execute direct to the latter, instead of through themselves as intermediate lessees. Defendant being thus without funds, the incorporators agreed among themselves to provide a small amount of working capital until the company was on an independent operating basis, and decided that $2,500 or $3,000 would be sufficient for the purpose, each to pay in proportion to his stock interest. About the same time, attractive opportunities presented themselves for increasing their coal holdings by the purchase of adjoining tracts. In particular they acquired one tract of 444 acres, and in order to provide funds for the cash payment, plaintiff loaned the company $2,000, August 23, 1915, taking its note secured by a paper writing in the nature of a deed of trust on the land purchased. Similar demands for funds continued, and finally, after plaintiff had advanced between $1,300 and $1,600, in addition to the loan of $2,000, he refused to contribute further, and his associates likewise declined to make further advancements unless he would bear his share of the burden. In order to raise more money, the corporate stock was increased from $30,000 to $50,000, later to $75,000 and $100,000, and sold at par, bringing new stockholders into the company.

As already noted, plaintiff instituted this suit November, 1916, to recover his loan and advancements, which the company resisted on the ground that such sums, with the exception of the loan, were payments on his stock, and alleged that plaintiff still was largely indebted for the \$7,500 worth of stock which had been issued to him. In the meanwhile plaintiff had sold at par $7\frac{1}{2}$ of his $37\frac{1}{2}$ shares, receiving therefor \$1,500. On February 24, 1917, a stockholders' meeting was held in the law offices of Conley & Johnson, in the city of Charleston, for the purpose of revising and recasting the crudely kept minutes of corporate meetings held since its organization, in order to afford proper legal basis for a \$75,000 bond issue, proposed but never consummated. A. M. Belcher, attorney for the company, and also a stockholder, drew up the minutes, which were signed and accepted by all of the stockholders as expressing the correct corporate history of the company since its inception. On August 1, 1917, defendant's check for \$2,500 was given to plaintiff, without designating its application to any particular item of his claim, as he insists, whereupon he applied it to the extinguishment of his unsecured claim, and credited the balance on the \$2,000 loan, but, as defendant contends, with the express understanding that it was to be applied to the \$2,000 loan, with an agreement to refund any amount in excess of the sum needed to satisfy it.

By resolution of November 24, 1917, the company required that all stockholders, who had not paid in full for stock issued to them, must pay the balance due thereon on or before January 1, 1918, and in the event of their failure or refusal to do so, the secretary-treasurer was directed to cancel all such delinquent stock. Copies of this resolution were mailed to all stockholders listed as delinquent, including plaintiff, but none of the original stockholders have paid, all apparently having decided to await the termination of this suit, though all save plaintiff seem disposed to accept defendant's view that their advancements during the early days of the company's history were in reality payments on stock, and that they are yet liable for the amounts still unpaid. In November, 1918, one year after the adoption of the above resolution, a second resolution was adopted, canceling and forfeiting all such unpaid stock and requiring the return of the certificates, but providing for the issuance of new certificates representing the amounts actually paid into the company on the old stock, at the par value of $200 per share. It is of this resolution canceling his certificate for 30 shares, as legally enforced by the decree in this cause, that plaintiff complains.

In support of their respective contentions, plaintiff and defendant assert and rely upon two totally inconsistent theories respecting the issuance of the 150 shares of stock to the five original incorporators. It is the claim of the latter that at the time of the company's organization plaintiff and his associates furnished nothing of value in return for the stock which they received; that the lease which defendant acquired from the Perryville Coal & Mining Company proceeded directly from it as lessor to defendant as lessee, and not through the incorporators as intermediaries; and that it was generally understood and agreed that they were to pay for their stock in cash as the company needed the money. In support of this contention, defendant introduced the receipts given by it to plaintiff and others at the times of their various advancements to the company during the early days of its organization, of which the following is a fair representation:

"January 15, 1916. Received of Joe Vasey five hundred dollars, to apply on stock now held by him in the New Export Coal Co. G. A. Bealor, treasurer."

With regard to such understanding, Bealor testified:

"My understanding at the time was from general conversation which was had with the parties connected with the company 'at that time, that they were to furnish sufficient money in lieu of receiving that stock to put the New Export Coal Company on a paying basis. * * * That it was the understanding and agreement that the money would be paid by these persons to whom the company had issued stock as the company made calls or demands for the money, * * * at least to the extent of putting the corporation on a paying basis, self-supporting; that was my understanding all the way through."

And Haggerty testified:

"There wasn't any arrangement beyond that we were to finance the company as to whatever it would take, whatever the account was; if it was of the value of the stock, we were supposed to put the money into the company."

Further, at a stockholders' or directors' meeting, held November 11, 1915, at which plaintiff was present and participated, the following motion was made and adopted, as found at page 27 of the minute book:

"Mr. Haggerty moved that $50.00 be paid to Joseph Vasey for services as auditor, and that the balance of money due him, upon proper bills being rendered, be placed to his credit on stock now held by him in the New Export Coal Company."

And on May 3, 1915, at the first meeting of the stockholders of the new company, Vasey made this motion:

"That John L. Williams be paid $100.00 per month, for a period of three months, as general manager of said company; one-half of said salary be, with his consent, retained by said company and same be put to his credit as a payment on the deferred payments on stock which he has subscribed for."

On the other hand, plaintiff admits that these cash advancements were voluntarily paid by the original incorporators in order to put the company on a self-sustaining basis, without any written or oral agreement of the company to repay them. But he denies that they were meant or intended as payments on stock, claiming that all such stock was fully paid for by him and his associates in turning over to the company the lease in question. He explains the use of the word "stock," as found in the receipts and minutes referred to, by stating that it had reference merely to their mutual agreement to advance funds to the company in proportion to the shares of stock each held, and did not mean that such payments were on the stock itself, but pro rata to their respective holdings. In support of this contention, he introduces in evidence the original certificate for 37½ shares, which expressly recites that such stock is "fully paid and nonassessable." Furthermore, the corrected minutes prepared at the Conley & Johnson meeting on February 24, 1917, at which all the outstanding stock was represented, disclose two resolutions, which, after setting forth the written proposal of G. A. Bealor, acting for and on behalf of the Perryville Coal & Mining Company, for the royalty stated, upon delivery by the latter of 150 shares of its capital stock of the par value of $200 per share, contain the express finding "that the property and rights offered by said letter to be leased, conveyed and transferred to this company are necessary for the business of this company, and that the same are of the value of $30,000," corresponding to the par value of the shares to be delivered. These resolutions further accept the proposal referred to, and authorize the delivery to Bealor, "or to whomsoever he designates," of 150 shares of stock, "fully paid up and nonassessable." These corrected minutes are signed by all the stockholders of the New Export Coal Company, "who hereby ratify, approve and confirm all that has occurred at the foregoing meeting, the minutes of which we have read."

Defendant, however, insists that the sole purpose of the corrected minutes was to remove legal obstacles to a proposed bond issue of \$75,000, but no one successfully challenges their essential accuracy in stating the facts as understood by the parties, and it is important to note that on March 1, 1917, one month after the meeting referred to, plaintiff's original certificate for $37\frac{1}{2}$ shares was canceled at his request and a new one issued to him for 30 shares, he having sold $7\frac{1}{2}$ shares prior thereto, and the new certificate like the old one, declared on its face that the stock was fully paid and nonassessable.

[1, 2] Plaintiff argues that since the defendant has by proper corporate action authorized the issuance of such stock as nonassessable and fully paid by the lease in question, as disclosed by its minutes and by the certificates as well, the valuation so placed upon it must be deemed conclusive, in the absence of actual fraud in the transaction, and the stock issued therefor not liable for any further call, as provided in section 24, c. 53, Code (sec. 2857), with regard to mining and manufacturing corporations. See, also, Bank v. Belington Coal & Coke Co., 51 W. Va. 60, 41 S. E. 390; Maryland Rail Co. v. Taylor, 231 Fed. 119, 145 C. C. A. 307. Undoubtedly, if plaintiff's theory of the organization of the company is the correct one, then in the absence of actual fraud the valuation placed upon the lease for which the stock was issued is conclusive and now beyond question. He insists that if the original incorporators had taken the lease in their own names and then had assigned it to the company which they had organized, such procedure clearly would have fallen within the scope and meaning of the statute, and that in substance and effect the result is the same where they direct the Perryville Coal & Mining Company to execute the lease to the New Export Coal Company, instead of through them as intermediary lessees. If plaintiff is correct in this view, the company clearly had no right, under the statute, to demand further payments on the stock, and the decree therefore is erroneous in attempting to cancel it for his failure to respond to those demands.

But without deciding that question, even accepting defendant's theory of the organization, can it now be heard to assert that stock, which it has issued as fully paid and nonassessable, was in fact not paid for? We are of opinion that it cannot. Not only do the original and reissued certificates recite that the stock was fully paid and nonassessable, but the corrected minutes prepared at the Conley & Johnson meeting in 1917, after plaintiff had instituted this suit, at which all the stockholders were present, contain similar recitals, both as to the paid-up character of the stock and the value at which the lease was accepted by the company, and the stockholders signed these minutes as stating the facts. Even those of the original incorporators who testify in support of defendant's position state that the advancements were only for one purpose, and that to the extent necessary to put the company on a self-operating basis. There was no fraud upon the company. The same persons who promoted it were also the original incorporators, and hence on both sides of the transaction. There was no innocent incorporator at that time to be hurt, as was the case in Davis v. Las Ovas Co., 227 U. S. 80, 33 Sup. Ct. 197, 57 L. Ed. 426. Rather the facts of this case are more nearly analogous to those of Old Dominion Copper Co. v. Lewisohn, 210 U. S. 206, 28 Sup. Ct. 634, 52 L. Ed. 1025, a case involving secret profits by promoters. As was there said:

"The difficulty that meets the petitioner at the outset is that it has assented to the transaction with the full knowledge of the facts. * * * At the time of the sale to the plaintiff, then, there was no wrong done to any one. Bigelow, Lewisohn, and their syndicate were on both sides of the bargain, and they might issue to themselves as much stock in their corporation as they liked in exchange for their conveyance of their land. * * * If there was a wrong, it was when the innocent public subscribed."

See, also, Hoffman Motor Truck Co. v. Erickson, 124 Minn. 279, 144 N. W. 952; Inland Nursery, etc., Co. v. Rice, 57 Wash. 70, 106 Pac. 499.

But innocent subsequent purchasers of stock are not complaining as parties in this suit. Nor are creditors' rights involved in

it. Only the corporation is complaining. Doubtless, if it could show that stock issued in such a manner was wholly void and illegal, it could maintain this suit alone in its own name. But, even granting for argument's sake that plaintiff cannot invoke the provisions of section 24, c. 53, Code, in sanction of the procedure followed, nothing therein contained declares void stock issued in violation of its terms. At most, it is only an executed ultra vires transaction of which the corporation cannot complain. 5 Fletcher, Cyclopaedia Corporations, § 3580. As said in section 3583 of the same text:

"It is undoubtedly true . . . that where a corporation issues watered stock or fictitiously paid-up stock, with the consent of all the stockholders, and when there is no charter, statutory, or constitutional provision rendering the transaction void, the agreement is valid and binding as against the corporation, and it cannot afterwards repudiate the same and exclude the holders of the stock, or compel them to pay the difference between the par value of the stock and what has been paid or agreed upon as full payment."

See, also, 1 Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 38; 4 Thompson, Corporations (2d Ed.) § 3907; 14 C. J. §§ 610-613. Under these circumstances and for the reasons stated, defendant cannot now question the paid-up character of plaintiff's stock.

[3] Moreover, since the issuance of the stock was at most only ultra vires and not wholly void, the court erred in attempting to cancel it. Even assuming that plaintiff was to pay the full par value of his stock in cash, his failure to do so did not justify the course adopted by defendant and enforced by the court. Sections 29 and 30, chapter 53, Code (secs. 2862, 2863), provide a summary foreclosure proceeding for just such cases, and this should be followed. Procedure by cancellation is authorized by statute only where stock of railroad companies is involved (section 43, c. 54, Code [sec. 2942]), or where a by-law of a corporation provides for such method (sections 31-33, c. 53, Code [secs. 2864-2866]). The defendant has no such by-law.

But plaintiff, having voluntarily made advancements to the company, pursuant to an agreement among the stockholders, cannot now recover such sums. It is admitted that the company made no written or oral promise to reimburse him for such payments, and defendant's check for \$2,500 clearly cannot be applied to such claims, but only toward the liquidation of the \$2,000 note held by plaintiff. But defendant's check overpaid that note to the extent of \$72.22, and the court properly entered a decree in its favor for such amount, but, for reasons already stated or implied, should not have included therein the \$200 difference between the aggregate of the sums advanced by plaintiff and the amount received by him from the sale of $7\frac{1}{2}$ shares of his stock. Our order, therefore, will reverse the decree of the circuit court, enter a decree here for \$72.22 in favor of defendant New Export Coal Company, and award costs to appellant.

[4] Upon the petition of New Export Coal Company, Thomas Haggerty, and T. J. Davis, the cause was opened for reargument, upon the theory Davis was in such position as a party to the suit as entitled him to further consideration of his rights as a purchaser of shares of the capital stock of the corporation, issued by it and purchased by him after the exhaustion of the original shares, distributed by Vasey and others, as described in the former opinion. New Export Coal Company alone answered the bill, and filed a supplemental answer to it. Each answer was in the nature of a cross-bill, and prayed for affirmative relief upon the new matter pleaded therein. Neither Haggerty nor Davis joined in any pleading in the cause, except as herein-after noted. Apart from their appearance as witnesses on behalf of the corporation, they were silent spectators as the cause proceeded through its different stages to maturity for final hearing, from the date the bill was filed, February rules, 1917, until October 28, 1919, when they and other defendants, except the corporation, moved, and the court permitted them, to adopt as their own the cross-bill answers, and other pleadings of the corporation.

The first cross-bill answer of the corporation proceeded upon the theory that Vasey owed it \$7,500, less certain admitted credits that reduced the amount to \$5,915.03, for the $37\frac{1}{2}$ shares of the corporate stock, notwithstanding the provision in the certificate to the contrary. For this balance the answer prayed for a decree against plaintiff, but did not, and indeed could not with propriety, pray for such relief from other holders of the original certificates of stock containing the same provisions, as none of them except Gilday and Haggerty were parties to the suit, and Gilday was a party not in his own right, but in the capacity of an officer of the corporation, its president.

The second, or supplemental cross-bill answer, after the insertion of a part of the resolution, passed by the corporation's board of directors, calling upon the holders of the original stock issue to pay the balance alleged to be due the corporation thereon, and notifying them that in the event of their failure to heed the call, and they did not heed it, the board would, as it afterwards did, declare the certificates canceled and annulled; and the relief prayed for was that such holders of the shares be compelled to surrender the certificates for cancellation, and that Vasey be enjoined from selling any of his shares. Each of these pleadings did, as it appears, also pray for general relief.

The course pursued in the adoption by one defendant of a pleading by another defendant, where both are interested alike in the matters so pleaded, and in the relief predicated upon them, is permissible, and is not questioned.

It is not in the exercise of the right to invoke and appropriate the pleading of a co-defendant that any difficulty presents itself, but rather in the situation of Haggerty and Davis as parties defendant. Although in one respect Haggerty is in condition to ask relief, in that he is a party in his own right, not as an officer of the corporation, yet in another he is not in such a condition. He participated in the wrongful issuance and distribution of the stock, if such acts fall within the meaning of the term "wrongful." Having done so, he cannot be heard to complain. And there is nowhere in the pleading so adopted any allegation of payment by him, or willingness on his part to pay the face value of his shares of stock, or that he intends to pay the amount so represented. The resolution referred to applies to him and other incorporators alike, though seemingly designed to affect but one shareholder.

But what may justly and legally be said of Davis' status as defendant? Is he entitled to the relief prayed in the pleadings, whose allegations and prayers for relief he has invoked also? Is his status as a party defendant such that he can obtain the full measure of relief demanded by New Export Coal Company? As to him and his rights, if any he has, the facts and circumstances of the case being considered, there is not in the pleadings, taken as a whole, any allegation upon which to buttress the relief he asks. His name appears nowhere except in the summons to answer the bill, in the caption and body of the bill, and in its prayer; nowhere else in the entire record, except in the capacity of an officer of the corporation, he being its secretary-treasurer, when this suit was brought, and he may still occupy the same position, so far as the record shows, and finally as a witness on behalf of the corporation, and therein most frequently only by his official designation, secretary-treasurer, without specifically naming him.

The terms used to describe Davis' official relation to the coal company organization are insufficient to justify the application of the rule as to the identification of the person intended to be summoned, or required to answer or respond to the relief sought in the pleading. The purpose of making him a party to the suit, as the bill and its prayer clearly disclose, was that he in his official capacity and Gilday in his official capacity and Haggerty may "be enjoined and restrained from carrying into effect the illegal assessment and illegal order calling in" for cancellation plaintiff's certificate of stock, etc., as directed and required in the resolution of the corporation's board of directors, before referred to. He is in no sense a party, and did not, by the procedure pursued, become a party in his own right. In that respect he stands in the same relative situation as if he were a personal representative, and unless the pleading discloses a purpose, either to enforce against him some personal liability, or prays for relief personal to him, apart from his official relation to the corporation, his rights cannot be considered, except in so far as he is affected officially. 18 Cyc. 980; Thurmond v. Coal Co., 85 W. Va. 501, 506, 102 S. E. 221.

A re-examination of the facts and principles discussed in the first opinion does not warrant its alteration in any respect.

HARROLD v. GOOD ROADS COMMISSION.
(No. 512.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Eminent domain §145(1)—Benefit to land cannot be offset against value of soil taken.

The right to have benefits to the land offset against the damages for the property taken is one which the Legislature can grant or withhold in its discretion, so that an instruction denying the right to such benefits in proceedings under Pub. Loc. Laws 1915, c. 345, § 15, which does not provide for the offset of benefits, was correct.

2. Eminent domain §262(5)—instruction as to reasonable price for soil taken for road held favorable to appellant.

Even though the difference between the value of the land before and after the soil was taken for a road is the proper measure of the value of the soil, where it has no market value, an instruction, withdrawing evidence as to such difference from the jury and permitting an allowance only of the reasonable price, was favorable to the highway commission, and it cannot complain of the error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilkes County; Shaw, Judge.

Proceeding by H. E. Harrold against the Good Roads Commission to recover damages for land and earth taken for roads. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. No error.

This was a proceeding under chapter 345, Public Local Laws of 1915, known as the "Wilkes County Road Law." Section 13 thereof relates to compensation for land taken for rights of way for public roads, and provides that where the land is taken for that purpose if the owner and the road commission cannot agree upon compensation, he may apply to the clerk of the court to appoint a jury of three freeholders to go upon the land and assess the damages, with a right to either party to appeal to the superior court. Section 15 of the act provides that:

"If any owner of land * * * from which stone, gravel, soil, sand, clay, or rock or other material was taken, as aforesaid [for repairing road] shall present an account for the same to the good roads commission or to its superintendent, or other duly authorized employee, it shall be the duty of said commission to pay a just and reasonable price for the same"

—and further provides the right to appeal to the superior court. Verdict and judgment for $50 and appeal by defendant.

F. B. Hendren and Hayes & Jones, all of Wilkesboro, for appellant.

Chas. G. Gilreath, of Wilkesboro, for appellee.

(109 S.E.)

CLARK, C. J. Two actions were brought, one under section 13 and the other under section 15, chapter 345, Public Local Laws 1915, and were consolidated, thus making two causes of action, but as the evidence, the trial, the appeal, and the assignments of error are all under section 15, we need consider only that cause of action.

[1] Section 15 provides as to the measure of compensation for taking the topsoil as follows:

"It shall be the duty of said commission to pay a just and reasonable price for the same."

There is nothing said about either special or any other benefit being considered, and on an examination of the charge, we do not find that the defendant has suffered any damage. The court told the jury:

"In determining what would be a fair and reasonable price for topsoil, you can take into consideration the quantity of land they scraped off in taking the topsoil, how much topsoil was taken off, and in what condition did they leave it—whether anything was growing on the land of any value at the time, and also what effect it had on the land in taking that topsoil off. You can take all this into consideration in enabling you to tell what it was reasonably worth, if there was no market value for it, and there is no evidence of any market value."

The court also charged the jury:

"These witnesses have been permitted to express their opinion about the condition out there and about how much was taken and about what effect it had upon the land that was left and whether it hurt it or improved it. I have also permitted them to express their opinion about the market value of the land before and after, but that is not the test. The test is, What would be the reasonable market value of this topsoil, if it had any, and, if not, what was the reasonable price for it?"

The court also charged the jury as follows:

"In the outset of this case a whole lot of testimony was attempted to be offered whether the building of the road along there improved the plaintiff's property or was any special advantage to the plaintiff's property, but when we got down to the law in the case these things don't have anything to do with your answer to this issue. Whether it decreased or increased the value of the plaintiff's property or was any special benefit, or no special benefit, has nothing to do with it."

In Miller v. Asheville, 112 N. C. 768, 16 S. E. 764, the court said:

"The Legislature in conferring upon the corporation the exercise of the right of eminent domain can, in its discretion, require all the benefits or a specified part of them, or forbid any of them to be assessed as offsets against the damages. This is a matter which rests in its grace, in which neither party has a vested right, and as to which the Legislature can change its mind always before rights are settled and vested by a verdict and judgment."

This case was cited and approved in Phifer v. Commissioners, 157 N. C. 152, 72 S. E. 852. To same purport Railroad v. Platt Land, 133 N. C. 272, 45 S. E. 589.

In Campbell v. Commissioners, 173 N. C. 501, 92 S. E. 323, the court held that—

The Legislature "in conferring the right of condemnation of lands for public use may, in its discretion, and in compensation to the owner, require all the benefits or a specified part of them, or forbid any of them to be assessed as offsets against the damage."

These cases have been cited and approved in Lanier v. Greenville, 174 N. C. 317, 93 S. E. 850; Powell v. Railroad, 178 N. C. 249, 100 S. E. 424; Elks v. Commissioners, 179 N. C. 246, 102 S. E. 414.

All the above authorities are as to whether the condemnor is entitled to have the benefits, or any part of them, accruing to the landowner to be assessed as offsets to the damages which he may sustain, and it is held that this is a matter which rests solely in the legislative discretion. In the statute before us, Public Local Laws 1915, c. 345, § 15, there is no such provision, and the defendant, who is the appellant taking the surface soil under the right of condemnation, has no right to complain of the charge of the court in not allowing benefits, if any, to the owner's land to be assessed, as offsets.

[2] There being no proof of the market "value of this topsoil," if such proof indeed was possible, we think a reasonable construction of the statute and a correct charge would have been that the plaintiff was entitled to recover compensation to be measured by deducting the market value of the spot after the surface soil was taken off and the market value before this was done. If there was error, therefore, it was against the plaintiff, who is not appealing. Presumably, the amount allowed him by the jury was satisfactory. The defendant cannot complain that allowance for offsets by reason of benefits to the land, if any, were not considered, for the statute does not provide for this, and they could not have been allowed without statutory authority. The defendant cannot complain of the charge as given.

No error.

STATE v. OVERCASH et al. (No. 465.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

I. Indictment and Information \S 176—Variance as to time of offense immaterial where time not of essence.

Unless time is of the essence of the offense charged, a variance between the allegation as to time and the proof is immaterial, and the prosecution, unless otherwise required by the court, is not restricted to the time charged, but may offer evidence as to the commission of the offense at any time before indictment and within the period of the statute of limitations.

2. Criminal law \S 772(4)—Question of guilt properly submitted as presented in evidence, though defendant not connected with offense committed on later date charged.

In a prosecution under an indictment charging larceny as of January 29, where there was evidence of two offenses, one on January 15 and the other on the 29th, with the latter of which defendant was not connected, the court, ignoring the date in the bill, properly submitted the question of defendant's guilt as presented in the evidence.

3. Larceny \S 70(1)—No error in court's reference to evidence of conspiracy; "principals."

The court, in a prosecution for larceny only, did not err, when charging the jury, in referring to evidence that the goods were stolen and delivered to and paid for by defendants pursuant to an arrangement in their presence, though such arrangement amounted to a conspiracy to steal; the evidence tending to show that defendants advised and procured the crime charged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cabarens County; Bryson, Judge.

Harvey Overcash and Arch Pethel were convicted of larceny, and they appeal. Affirmed.

From a perusal of the record it appears that at said April term, 1921, a bill of indictment, No. 78, was submitted to the grand jury, charging that the defendants, Harvey Overcash and Arch Pethel, on January 29, 1921, did feloniously steal, take, and carry away 2,000 yards of cloth of the value of $200 of the goods and chattels, etc., of the Locke Cotton Mills, and there was also a count in the bill for feloniously receiving said property knowing the same had been stolen.

At the same April term, 1921, there was a further bill submitted, No. 79, charging that on said 29th of January, 1921, Fred Widenhouse, William Sides, and Walt Sides with force and arms, at or in the county aforesaid, did break into the warehouse of said Locke Cotton Mills with felonious intent, and did there feloniously steal, etc., five bolts of cloth, the property of said company, of the value of $200, and with a count on bill for feloniously receiving the property. In No. 80 at same term a bill was submitted charging in proper terms that on the 15th of January, 1921, William Sides, Dewey Furr, and Roy Hall feloniously did break and enter the warehouse, etc., of the Locke Cotton Mills, and then and there did feloniously steal, etc., cloth of the value of $200, the property of said company, with a count for receiving, etc.

These bills were all considered and found by the grand jury to be true bills, and the three causes by consent were tried together at said term and before the one and the same petit jury, and all of the defendants were convicted of the crime of larceny, except Roy Hall, he being acquitted of the offense. There was judgment on the verdict, and defendants, Overcash and Pethel, excepted and appealed.

H. S. Williams, of Concord, and R. Lee Wright, of Salisbury, for appellants.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. [1] It is objected to the validity of this conviction that under a bill of indictment charging a larceny as of January 29 the judge submitted the question of the guilt of these appellants, and they have been convicted solely for a larceny as of January 15, 1921. So far as the bill of indictment is concerned and as a matter of form, unless time is of the essence of the offense, it is fully established that a variance between the allegation as to time and the proof is not material, and that the prosecution, unless it is otherwise required by order of the court, is not restricted to the time named in the bill, but may offer evidence as to the commission of the offense charged at any time before indictment found and within the period where no statute of limitations operates to protect the accused. State v. Newsom & Brindle, 47 N. C. 173; Clark, Criminal Procedure, 237.

[2] In the present case the evidence offered on the part of the state tended to show that there were two distinct offenses committed, each constituting a larceny of cloth, the property of the Locke Cotton Mills, one on the 15th of January, 1921, and the other on the 29th of January; that defendant Overcash was only connected with that of the 15th, and was not involved in the second offense. The court, therefore, ignoring the date of the charged named in the bill, very properly submitted the question of the guilt of these defendants as it was presented in the evidence, and not otherwise. While there may have been at times some apparent confusion in stating the contention of the opposing parties growing out of the fact chiefly that there were three bills of indictment being tried at the same time, and by one and the same jury, on the issue as to this first bill, No. 78, in which these appellants alone were indicted, the instructions of his honor were both comprehensive and careful, and on perusal of the record we are well assured that the rights of defendant have not been prejudiced in the determination of the issue.

[3] Again it is objected that the court in charging the jury referred to evidence tending to show a conspiracy on the part of appellants with others to commit the offense, and of their being accessories before the fact, when there was no charge against defendants covering these positions, but the bill of indictment contained only a direct charge of larceny, and for which the conviction was had. It has long been held "for settled law" in this state that the distinction between grand and petit larceny has been abolished, and, unless in case of robbery or in connection with some felonious breaking, that "all felonious stealing has been reduced to the grade of petit larceny," and as to this offense our decisions are to the effect that there can be no accessories, but all who "aid, abet, advise or procure the crime are principals." State v. Stroud, 95 N. C. 626; State v. Fox, 94 N. C. 928.

While there is no proof that either of these appellants were physically present at the time the goods were stolen, on the 15th of January or at any other time, there was testimony on the part of the state from Fred Widenhouse, a defendant in bill No. 80, in effect that on said date of January 15 he, with Will Sides, a codefendant, were at the house of Arch Pethel, where Pethel and Overcash were at the time, and it was then and there arranged between them that the witness and Sides would steal the cloth from the Locke Cotton Mills and bring and deliver it to appellants who were to take same and pay for it, and pursuant to this arrangement the witness and Sides, associating the other defendants with them, did steal the cloth in question from the company's warehouse, delivered same to appellants that same night about 9:30 o'clock, and appellants paid them for it, part in money and part in whisky.

The fact that this arrangement spoken of may have amounted to a conspiracy to steal does not render the evidence incompetent on the issue presented, as it clearly tends to show that appellants "advised and procured the crime" and would justify a conviction for the consummated offense.

There is no reversible error, and the judgment on the verdict is affirmed.

No error.

BALLOU v. BOARD OF ROADS COMMISSION OF ASHE COUNTY et al.
(No. 366.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 23, 1921.)

1. Counties \Leftarrow 183(2)—Provision of bonds prohibiting redemption before maturity held unauthorized.

Under Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 467, as amended February 3, 1921, authorizing the issuance of highway bonds and requiring the board of road commissioners, not later than five years after their issuance, to begin, in its discretion, the payment of the bonds or creation of a sinking fund, a provision in the bonds prohibiting their redemption before maturity at the option of the county, or any officer or board, was unauthorized.

2. Counties \Leftarrow 183(2)—Bonds bearing semiannual interest held contrary to statute.

Under Pub. Loc. Laws 1919, c. 467, authorizing an issuance of highway bonds, and providing, in sections 11 and 12, that the interest coupons shall be payable annually and that it shall be the duty of the board of road commissioners to pay the annual coupons at the time and place fixed, provision for semiannual interest is unauthorized.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ashe County; Long, Judge.

Action by R. L. Ballou against the Board of Roads Commission of Ashe county and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Civil action, submitted on an agreed statement of facts, to determine the regularity of certain highway bonds of Ashe county. The following facts, taken from the case agreed, will suffice for our present decision:

"(1) That on November 3, 1921, the defendant board passed a resolution authorizing the issuance of $365,000 highway bonds of Ashe county, under the authority of chapter 467, Public Local Laws 1919, as amended February 3, 1921, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, with fixed serial maturities, providing in said resolution for a sinking fund for the payment of said bonds, and determining that no bonds should be redeemed at the option of the county, or any officer or board thereof, before the date of such serial maturities, respectively, and directing the board's secretary, defendant herein, to advertise said bonds for sale upon sealed bids to be received December 3, 1921; further providing that not only the bonds themselves but the advertisement of sale should specifically recite that said bonds would not be redeemable before said serial maturities.

"(2) That all acts, conditions, and things required by the Constitution and laws of North Carolina in connection with the issuance of said bonds, up to and including the said authorizing resolution and direction to advertise, have happened, exist, and have been performed, except that the plaintiff and defendants are not agreed upon any one of these three questions; the defendants contending that said questions should be answered in the affirmative, and the plaintiff contending that they should be answered in the negative: (a) Whether said bonds will be within the debt limit; (b) whether the county may irrevocably waive any right to redeem the bonds before their fixed maturities; (c) whether the interest payments may be made semiannually."

His honor, being of opinion that all three of these questions should be answered in the affirmative, as contended by the defendants, entered judgment accordingly, and plaintiff appealed.

Parke & Johnston, of West Jefferson, for appellant.

W. R. Bauguess, of Jefferson, for appellees.

STACY, J. We will omit any consideration of the first question, as we understand a negative answer to either the second or third inquiry will render it impracticable for the defendants to proceed further with a sale of the present bonds.

[1] Chapter 467, Public Local Laws 1919, under authority of which the bonds in question are to be issued, contains the following provision with respect to their payment:

"It shall be the duty of said board of road commissioners, * * * not later than five years after the issue of said bonds, to begin, in the discretion of the board of road commissioners, the payment of said bonds or the creation of a sinking fund for the payment of the principal of said bonds at their maturity."

In the case of Com'rs v. Bank, 181 N. C. 347, 107 S. E. 245, speaking of this identical provision, it was said:

"The present board cannot estop the option which, under the statute, they or their successors may exercise."

To hold otherwise would be to allow the board of road commissioners to amend the statute and to issue bonds of a different kind and tenor than those contemplated by the Legislature. The authority to issue the proposed bonds is derived from the statute, and its limitations and conditions are equally as effective and curbing as its enabling provisions are life-giving. Proctor v. Com'rs, 108 S. E. 360, at the present term. Under these decisions, we think the second question must therefore be answered in the negative rather than in the affirmative.

[2] Again, section 11 of the act under consideration provides that the interest coupons attached to said bonds shall be "payable annually"; and, further, in section 12, "it shall be the duty of said board of road commissioners to pay the annual coupons on said bonds at the time and place thereon fixed."

Hence, under the express terms of the statute, we think the bonds should be issued with "annual" rather than "semiannual" interest coupons attached.

From the foregoing, it follows that the second and third questions propounded must be answered in the negative, or in accordance with the plaintiff's contention; and this will be certified to the superior court.

Error.

CLARK, C. J., concurs entirely in all that is said in the opinion of the court, but, to "exclude a conclusion," thinks it proper, as the statute is before us for construction, to call attention to the fact that so much of this statute as authorizes the levy of any tax on the poll for the payment of bonds issued "for the construction and maintenance of roads" is invalid, because in violation of an explicit provision in the state Constitution, which, as adopted in 1868 provides (article 5, § 2):

"The proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor, but in no one year shall more than 25 per cent. thereof be appropriated to the latter purpose."

This provision of the Constitution remains unaltered.

When there has been a levy authorized for general purposes the validity of the poll tax is not necessarily brought in question, because, when collected, presumably the proceeds of the poll tax will be applied to the constitutional purposes to which it is restricted, i. e., "education and the poor." But the act before us is restricted to the specific purpose therein stressed, that the whole of the tax levied is to be applied solely in the construction and maintenance of the roads. So much of the act as levies a poll tax for that purpose is therefore unconstitutional and invalid. This, however, can be struck from the act without impairing the validity of the property tax, as has been held in several cases.

As we now have a declared legislative policy of incurring an indebtedness of $50,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of roads, it is well to note that, however laudable such purpose may be, the Legislature is explicitly forbidden by the Constitution to derive any funds for that purpose from the collection of a poll tax.

There were formerly conflicting decisions, owing to the requirement of an "equation of taxation" between the poll and property tax, whether when the tax exceeded 66⅔ cents on the dollar on the property the poll tax could be collected to an amount in excess of $2, and whether such excess could then be applied to other purposes than "education and the support of the poor." These conflicting decisions have now ceased to have any bearing, because under the Constitution, as now amended, the "equation of taxation" between the poll and property has been stricken out, and the Constitution (article 5, § 1) now reads:

"The General Assembly may levy a capitation tax on every male inhabitant of the state over 21 and under 50 years of age, which said tax shall not exceed $2, and cities and towns may levy a capitation tax which shall not exceed $1. No other capitation tax shall be levied."

Section 2 of that article of the Constitution, which provides that "the proceeds of the state and county capitation tax shall be applied to the purposes of education and the support of the poor," remains unaltered, and there can be no possible misunderstanding of the language of the Constitution which, as above quoted says, "No other capitation tax shall be levied." It is also clear from this language that no capitation tax can be levied upon women, or upon men except from 21 to 50 years of age, and that so much of this, or any, statute as provides for the levy of any capitation tax for the maintenance and construction of roads is invalid, and must be disregarded.

DUFFY v. PHIPPS. (No. 394.)

(182 N. C. 778)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1099(4)—Interpretation of contract on prior appeal law of case on subsequent appeal.

The construction of a contract on a prior appeal is the law of the case on subsequent appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; Finley, Judge.

Action by T. J. Duffy against J. Henry Phipps. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged shortage in acreage in a tract of land bought by plaintiff from the defendant.

The contract of purchase is set out and construed in this same case as reported on the former appeal in 180 N. C. 313, 104 S. E. 655.

Upon trial in the superior court, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the deed from the defendant to the plaintiff made pursuant to the paper writing offered in evidence? Answer: Yes.

"(2) If so, was there a shortage of acreage in the land conveyed by the defendant to the plaintiff, and, if so, how much? Answer: 40 acres and 43/100.

"(3) What amount, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendant? Answer: $4,043.50."

From a judgment on the verdict in favor of plaintiff, the defendant appealed.

Fentress & Jerome, of Greensboro, for appellant.

Justice & Broadhurst, Oliver C. Cox, and Brook, Hines & Smith, all of Greensboro, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. From a perusal of the record, it appears that the cause has been tried in accordance with our former interpretation and construction of the contract of sale entered into between the parties. The case was here before on appeal from a judgment overruling the defendant's demurrer, and we deem it unnecessary to repeat our previous holding, which has now become the law of the case. Public Service Co. v. Power Co., 181 N. C. 356, 107 S. E. 226; Lewis v. Nunn (at the present term) 108 S. E. 442.

After a full investigation of the defendant's exceptions and assignments of error, we have discovered no sufficient reason for disturbing the result.

No error.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF YADKIN COUNTY v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF YADKIN COUNTY. (No. 506.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Jury ⇐ 19(17)—Act making judge's findings as to amount of levy final held not denial of jury.

The provision of C. S. § 5488, governing proceedings by the board of education to compel the board of commissioners to levy a school tax, that the findings of the judge on issues of fact raised by the pleadings are conclusive does not deny the right of trial by jury, contrary to Const. art. 1, § 19, providing that in all controversies at law respecting property the ancient mode of trial by jury is inviolable.

2. Mandamus ⇐ 181(1)—Record held not to show duty to levy additional school tax so as to warrant peremptory writ.

The record in an action in the nature of mandamus by the board of education under C. S. § 5488, to compel the board of commissioners to levy a school tax of 41 cents on the hundred dollars, which does not show that the state board of education had apportioned the state funds to the various counties as required by Public Laws 1921, c. 146, § 2, in case a maximum levy of 30 cents for teachers' salaries fund authorized by section 4 is insufficient to maintain the schools for six months, as required by Const. art. 9, § 3, does not raise the question of the right of the board to have the additional levy made in the event that the authorized levy with the state money will still be insufficient, and does not entitle the granting of the peremptory writ until further findings are made establishing such insufficiency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yadkin County; Lane, Judge.

Action in the nature of a proceeding for mandamus by the Board of Education of Yadkin County against the Board of Commissioners of Yadkin County. From a judgment granting the relief sought, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Civil action in the nature of a proceeding for a writ of mandamus, brought under C. S. § 5488, to compel the defendant board of commissioners to levy a special school tax of 41 cents on the $100 assessed valuation of the taxable properties and polls in Yadkin county for the year 1921; it being alleged that such rate is necessary to make provision for a teachers' salary fund and to maintain a six months' school term in said county, as required by article 9, § 3, of the Constitution.

From a judgment granting the relief sought, to the extent of requiring a tax of 40 cents on the $100 valuation of all taxable property in the county, the defendant appealed.

Williams & Reavis, of Yadkinville, and H. P. Grier, of Statesville, and T. C. Bowie, of Jefferson, for appellant.

Attorney General J. S. Manning and Assistant Attorney General Frank Nash, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] The defendant's first exception is directed to the constitutionality of the statute under which this proceeding is instituted, to wit, C. S. § 5488. The act is assailed upon the ground that, where issues of fact are raised by the pleadings and the findings of the judge are made conclusive, the right of trial by jury is thereby denied. We do not think the statute is repugnant to article 1, § 19, of the Constitution, which provides that—

"In all controversies at law respecting property, the ancient mode of trial by jury is one of the best securities of the rights of the people, and ought to remain sacred and inviolable."

The exact question here presented was before the court in the case of Board of Education v. Board of Commissioners, 174 N. C. 469, 93 S. E. 1001, and the following excerpt from the opinion, delivered in that case by Hoke, J., would seem to be decisive of this exception:

"We are not inadvertent to the position earnestly urged for defendant that the act providing for a determination of the amount required for a four-months [now six months] school by the superior court judge is unconstitutional, in that it attempts to confer legislative powers on the courts, but we do not think the statute is open to such objection. It only empowers the courts to ascertain and determine a disputed fact relevant to a pending issue between the two boards, and thereupon command that the tax be levied accordingly, both the finding of the fact and the judgment thereon being, in our opinion, judicial in their nature. In re Applicants for License, 143 N. C. 1, 6. The tax, however, is authorized, as it should be, by legislative enactment, and is to be levied and collected by the usual and ordinary administrative and executive officers of the county government."

[2] But we do not think the imperative necessity of levying a rate of tax in full compliance with the plaintiff's demand, or that ordered by the judge, is made to appear from the instant record. The defendant has levied a special tax of 30 cents on every $100 valuation of taxable property within the county and a corresponding tax on every taxable poll for the purpose of raising the necessary teachers' salary fund; and it is provided in section 4, c. 146, Public Laws 1921, that no county shall be compelled to levy more than such amount, and when this maximum rate has been levied, and the funds derived therefrom are insufficient for the purpose aforesaid, then "the county shall receive from the state public school fund for teachers' salaries, an apportionment sufficient to bring the school term in every school district to six months." It is further provided in section 2 of said act that the state board of education shall apportion annually to those counties which are unable to provide a six months' school term, after levying the maximum rate specified in section 4, "an amount to supplement the county funds sufficiently to provide a six months' term for every school in the county." The clear intent of the Legislature would seem to be that when the maximum tax rate of thirty cents on every hundred dollars valuation of property, real and personal, and a corresponding tax on every taxable poll has been levied for this special purpose, by the commissioners of the county, and the amount derived therefrom is insufficient to meet the necessary requirements, then the deficiency shall be supplied, if practicable, by the state board of education out of the state public school fund.

It was suggested on the argument, and it is alleged in the complaint, that the equitable apportionment, or ratable part, of this latter fund, which the state board of education would be authorized in allotting to Yadkin county, together with the local property tax of 30 cents and a corresponding tax on the poll, is still insufficient in amount to meet the necessary requirement of article 9, § 3, of the Constitution with respect to a six months' school term. But this question is not before us, as no such finding appears on the record, and we are not disposed to enter upon a discussion of so important a matter until it is presented directly for our consideration.

On the other hand, it appears affirmatively from his honor's findings of fact that the state board of education has refused to make any apportionment from the state public school fund, in order to supplement the county funds sufficiently to provide a six months term for one or more schools in every district in Yadkin county, unless and until the defendant board of commissioners shall levy a tax in accordance with plaintiff's demand. This would seem to be contrary to the statute. At least, we are unable to find authority for the position, there being no valid reason assigned therefor, and it is possible that the state board of education, co-operating with the defendant, may be able to meet the deficiency with moneys out of the public school fund, in which event the present controversy apparently may be adjusted without further litigation.

The method adopted by the state board of education in ascertaining the respective amounts which should be apportioned to the several counties out of the state public school fund, while not before us, is no doubt a fair and legitimate one; but this is a separate and distinct matter from the provisions of the Constitution and the law under which the defendant is asked to proceed. It would seem that Yadkin county should be allowed its equitable part of this state fund, regardless of the amount, when it has met the requirements of the statute. Then should the existing tax levy, together with the allotment from the state fund, prove to be inadequate, the defendant may experience the necessity of determining what further means should be employed to meet the exigencies of the situation. But until this occasion arises, we will not undertake to say what policy should be pursued, in the absence of any legislative declaration.

Upon the record and for the want of any sufficient findings of fact to support it, we must hold that the peremptory mandamus was improvidently granted; and, if the appeal was intended to present the question as to whether the defendant board of commissioners should be required to levy a tax in excess of the maximum rate, fixed by the statute, in the event the constitutional requirement cannot be met in any other way, we must remand the case for additional findings, as the necessity for a ruling on this point is not now apparent.

Reversed and remanded.

ELAM v. SMITHDEAL REALTY & INS. CO.
(No. 364.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Insurance §103—Broker undertaking to procure policy covering designated risk liable for loss from negligent default.

Generally, where an insurance agent or broker undertakes to procure a policy of insurance for another affording protection against a designated risk, he must exercise reasonable care to perform such duty, and, within the amount of the proposed policy, he may be held liable for loss properly attributable to his negligent default.

2. Evidence §424—Prior or contemporaneous parol inducements admissible in action against broker for failure to procure adequate policy.

The rule that an insurance policy expresses the contract between the parties and shuts off prior or contemporaneous parol inducements and assurances in contravention thereof is inapplicable in an action against a broker for negligent failure to procure a policy covering a designated risk.

3. Insurance §103—Broker assuming duty of procuring policy must exercise ordinary care in performance thereof.

While an insurance agent or broker is not obligated to assume the duty of procuring a policy, without consideration for his promise, he must exercise ordinary care in the performance of such duty when assumed; the promise to take the policy being a sufficient consideration.

4. Damages §62(1)—Injured party must exercise reasonable care to minimize loss.

It is incumbent on one injured by a breach of a definite and entire contract or the commission of a tort to exercise reasonable care and business prudence to minimize the loss, and for damages thereafter occurring, incident to his own breach of duty, no recovery should be allowed, they being too remote.

5. Contracts §93(2)—Deeds §69—Person signing or accepting must read instrument.

It is the duty of a person of mature years of sound mind, who can read or write, to read a deed or formal contract which he signs or accepts, and knowledge of the contents will be imputed to him if he negligently fails to do so, providing nothing has been said or done to mislead him or to put a man of reasonable business prudence off his guard.

6. Insurance §103—Evidence in action for broker's failure to procure adequate policy held to require submission of question of contributory negligence.

In an action against an insurance broker for failure to procure a policy insuring plaintiff's automobile against collision, evidence held to require submission of the question whether plaintiff's failure to hold an adequate policy was due to his own negligence in not reading his policy and taking out one sufficient to protect him.

7. Principal and agent §79(3)—For agent's breach of duty, principal may sue for breach of contract or in tort.

For breaches of duty involved in a contract of agency, the principal may ordinarily sue either for breach of contract for faithfulness or in tort for a breach of duty imposed by contract.

8. Principal and agent §79(1)—Principal's contributory negligence will not defeat action for agent's breach of contract but will be considered on issue of damages.

The principal's contributory negligence will defeat an action in tort for his agent's breach of duty, but not an action for breach of contract, though in such action it will be considered on the issue of damages.

9. Insurance §103—Plaintiff, if contributorily negligent, can recover only nominal damages for broker's failure to procure adequate policy.

In an action against an insurance broker for breach of a contract to procure a policy covering a designated risk, if plaintiff's failure to have an adequate policy was due to his own negligent default in not ascertaining the defect and procuring another policy, he can recover nominal damages only.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Webb, Judge.

Action by I. R. Elam against the Smithdeal Realty & Insurance Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This action is to recover damages for failure to procure a policy of insurance protecting plaintiff's automobile in case of collision, etc. At the close of plaintiff's evidence on motion there was judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Parrish & Deal, of Winston-Salem, for appellant.

Holton & Holton, Swink & Hutchins, and O. O. Eard, all of Winston-Salem, for appellee.

HOKE, J. There was evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that on or about March 31, 1919, the plaintiff entered into a contract with defendant company, doing business, among other things, as insurance agents and brokers, to procure a policy of $5,000 on the car of defendant affording protection against damage by fire or collision or other kind of accident; that shortly thereafter the said agent came to plaintiff, who was at the time presently engaged at his business in a tobacco warehouse and told witness he had obtained the policy desired and had left same for plaintiff at the garage with the proprietor, who had put the policy in the latter's safe; plaintiff, with a view of then paying the premium, asked for the amount and was told by the agent, an officer and one of the owners of the defendant company, that plaintiff had 60 days in which to pay the premium, and it appeared that the premium was paid after the accident and after suit was instituted against defendant; that within a week from this time, or near that, plaintiff's car in a collision sustained damages to the amount of $1,000, and on application or preparation through the same agent for adjustment with the insurance company which had issued the policy it was ascertained that the policy did not extend to or cover such damages. There was evidence to the effect further that during the time the policy remained in the safe and before the injury, when plaintiff's car had a near accident, but sustained no pecuniary damage, the agent had assured plaintiff that in any event plaintiff was protected, as the policy he had procured covered risks of that kind, and that on another occasion when the owner of another car was about to procure insurance against accident and collision through defendant, plaintiff being present, the agent, referring to plaintiff, said he had a policy of the kind on the car owned by him, and also that, when plaintiff reported the loss and it was found on examination that the risk was not covered, the same agent, Mr. Smithdeal, expressed his regret, saying:

"Mr. Elam I misrepresented this to you, and I am just as sorry as you are. I thought you were insured."

[1] Upon this statement of the facts chiefly pertinent to the inquiry we are of opinion that the judgment of nonsuit should be set aside, and the cause submitted to the jury. It is very generally held that, where an insurance agent or broker undertakes to procure a policy of insurance for another affording protection against a designated risk, the law imposes upon him the duty in the exercise of reasonable care to perform the duty he has assumed, and within the amount of the proposed policy he may be held liable for the loss properly attributable to his negligent default. Rezac v. Zima et al., 96 Kan. 752, 153 Pac. 500, reported also in Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1035; Thomas v. Funkhouser, 91 Ga. 478, 18 S. E. 312; Backus v. Ames, 79 Minn. 145, 81 N. W. 766; Lindsay v. Pettingrew, 5 S. D. 500, 59 N. W. 726; Criswell v. Riley, 5 Ind. App. 496, 30 N. E. 1101, 32 N. E. 814; Reed Manufacturing Co. v. Wurt, 187 Ill. App. 379; Fellowes v. Gordon, 47 Ky. (8 B. Mon.) 415; Mechem on Agency, § 1258.

[2] In resistance to the application of the principle to the facts of the present record, we are cited to a number of authorities to the effect that a policy of insurance when issued is considered as expressing the contract between the parties and has the effect of shutting off prior or contemporaneous parol inducements and assurances in contravention of the written policy. The position in proper instances is very generally recognized and has been approved in many cases in this jurisdiction. Clements v. Ins. Co., 155 N. C. 61, 62, 70 S. E. 1076; Floars v. Ins. Co., 144 N. C. 232, 56 S. E. 915. But in the instant case the action is not one against the insurance company in which plaintiff is seeking to hold it liable for an obligation not contained in the written policy, but plaintiff sues the agent and broker for negligent failure to perform a duty he had undertaken and assumed as agent by which plaintiff has suffered the loss complained of, and in our opinion the authorities cited are not apposite to the question presented on the record.

[3] It is further insisted for defendant that no cause of action is disclosed, because there is no consideration given for defendant's promise, but the better considered decisions on the subject are to the effect that, while the agent or broker in question was not obligated to assume the duty of procuring the policy, when he did so the law imposed upon him the duty of performance in the exercise of ordinary care, and as a matter of contract it is said in some of the cases on the subject that the trust and confidence imposed on him as agent afforded a sufficient consideration for the undertaking and carrying out the instructions given. Criswell v. Riley, supra. And in Reed v. Wurt, supra, Presiding Justice Baume, delivering the opinion, quotes with approval from 1 Joyce on Insurance, § 687, as follows:

"If a person voluntarily, without consideration, and without expectation of remuneration or reward, agrees to procure an insurance, and actually takes steps in the matter, he is responsible for misfeasance, and if he proceeds to effect a policy, and is so negligent and unskilled that no benefit is derived therefrom, he is liable, although he was not bound to undertake the performance."

[4, 5] And it would seem that the promise to take the policy would suffice as a consideration. Again it is contended that defendant may not be held liable for this loss because of his own negligent default in not ascertaining the contents of the policy and having taken out a policy which would have afforded him the protection he desired. It is an established principle with us subject to some qualifications not pertinent to this inquiry that, in case of breach of contract which is definite and entire or tort committed, it is incumbent upon the injured party to do what reasonable care and business prudence requires to minimize the loss, and for damages thereafter occurring and incident to his own breach of duty no recovery should be allowed, the same being regarded as too remote (Yowmans v. Hendersonville, 175 N. C. 574-579, 96 S. E. 45; Hocutt v. Telegraph Co., 147 N. C. 193, 60 S. E. 980; Bowen v. King, 146 N. C. 385, 59 S. E. 1044; Railroad

v. Hardware Co., 143 N. C. 54, 55 S. E. 422; 8 R. C. L. 442), and it is also held with us, in accord with principles very generally prevailing, that where a person of mature years of sound mind who can read or write signs or accepts a deed or formal contract affecting his pecuniary interest, it is his duty to read it, and knowledge of the contents will be imputed to him in case he has negligently failed to do so. But this is subject to the qualification that nothing has been said or done to mislead him or to put a man of reasonable business prudence off his guard in the matter. Clements v. Ins. Co., 155 N. C. 61, 62, 70 S. E. 1076; Floars v. Ins. Co., 144 N. C. 233, 58 S. E. 915. The latter citing among the authorities Bostwick v. Ins. Co., 116 Wis. 392, 69 N. W. 538, 92 N. W. 246, 67 L. R. A. 705.

[6] In the present case as it now appears there are facts in evidence tending to show that plaintiff had the policy in his possession for some little time before the collision, and from reading it he could have ascertained that it did not afford any protection in case of collision. There are facts further to the effect that the policy was not delivered to him personally, but at a time when he was busily engaged in a tobacco warehouse, and same was left for him with the proprietor of the garage where his car was kept, and that several times while the policy was so placed and before the collision things were said and done by the agent giving assurance that the policy gave the protection contracted for, and on application of the principles stated we are of opinion that the cause should be submitted to the jury on the question whether the failure to hold an adequate policy is due to plaintiff's own negligence in not reading his policy and taking out one sufficient to protect him.

[7, 8] It is ordinarily true that for breaches of duty involved in the contract of agency the principal may sue either for breach of contract for faithfulness or in tort for a breach of duty imposed by the same. 31 Cyc. 1609. Where in a case of this kind the action is for tort, and there is a negligent default on the part of plaintiff contributing to the injury, this would have the effect of defeating the action. But where the action is brought for breach of contract, and that is established, contributory negligence is not allowed to defeat the action in toto, but the negligence of the claimant contributing to the injury is to be properly considered on the issue as to damages. Hale on Damages, p. 68.

[8] In the present case plaintiff has elected to sue for breach of contract of agency causing the damages complained of, and, if this should be established, the cause will be further considered on the question of damages, and, if it is made to appear on the facts as they may be accepted by the jury that the failure to have an adequate policy affording protection is due to plaintiff's own negligent default in not ascertaining the defect in the policy held by him and procuring another, in that event the damages would be nominal.

This will be certified that the judgment of nonsuit be set aside, and the cause tried by the jury on appropriate issues.

CHURCH v. VAUGHN, HEMPHILL & CO.
et al. (No. 511.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Execution \Leftrightarrow 171(1) — Consent judgment held not estoppel to assert lien of judgment not referred to therein.

Where surety on notes to whom makers had executed mortgage to secure him against loss conveyed land to payees by deed which was void, consent judgment in surety's action against payees to set aside conveyance, providing for the sale of the land by commissioner and for payment of proceeds to discharge indebtedness due payees on such notes, did not estop payees from causing execution to issue on judgments representing other indebtedness not referred to in consent judgment, as against purchaser at commissioner's sale under consent judgment who had full notice of lien of other judgments before payment of purchase price to commissioner.

2. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 651 — Consent judgment an estoppel only as to matters litigated.

A consent judgment is an estoppel only as to such matters as are therein litigated or necessarily embraced and determined.

Appeal from Superior Court, Watauga County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by N. M. Church against Vaughn, Hemphill & Co. and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

By consent the judge found the facts. This action is for the permanent restraint of the defendants from the sale of land under execution upon two judgments belonging to them, docketed in the superior court of Watauga, one for $45.30 and interest assigned to them by Hancock Bros. Company and one for $161.15 and interest, assigned to them by Lynchburg Shoe Company. The plaintiff alleges that the defendants are estopped to sell the land in question under said judgments by reason of a sale of the land under a consent judgment and purchase by plaintiff at a commissioner's sale thereunder.

The defendants denied being estopped by said consent judgment, for that said consent judgment did not in any way refer to or embrace the judgments purchased from Hancock Bros. Company or the Lynchburg Shoe Company. The defendants caused execution to issue on their above judgments, and had the land advertised for sale, whereupon the plaintiff instituted this action for a perpetual injunction, claiming that the defendants were estopped by the consent judgment to sell the land under said judgments.

The court held as a matter of law that notice to the purchaser, the plaintiff, before the payment of the purchase money, had no effect, and that the defendants are estopped by reason of the consent judgment to sell the land under the judgments herein; that such sale and deed would be a cloud on the plaintiff's title, and rendered judgment perpetually restraining the defendants from selling under said judgment the land described in said consent judgment. The defendants appealed.

R. N. Hackett and Chas. G. Gilreath, both of Wilkesboro, for appellants.

CLARK, C. J. [1] J. C. Cook and wife, on February 16, 1916, executed to the defendants their two notes, aggregating $1,416.31, on which R. F. Greene was surety, to whom Cook and wife gave a mortgage to secure him against loss. Subsequently said Greene, without having suffered any loss and without foreclosure proceedings, sold the land in question, and executed a deed to these defendants as purchasers. This sale was premature, illegal, and void, and at spring term, 1918, of Watauga a consent judgment was entered of record in an action brought by said Cook against these defendants, wherein said sale by R. F. Greene, mortgagee, was adjudged void and set aside, and, R. F. Greene being made a party, it was decreed that the land should be resold by John H. Bingham, commissioner, who was directed to apply the proceeds of said sale to discharge the indebtedness due on said notes and on payment of purchase money to execute a title in fee to the purchaser. The property after due advertisement was sold by the commissioner on June 3, 1918. The plaintiff, N. M. Church, became the purchaser, and deed was executed to him in fee. Greene had paid the judgments obtained by defendants on the notes to which he was surety, and the resale was to reimburse him.

Before the plaintiff made payment of the purchase money, he was notified by the defendants that they held these two other judgments for $45.30 and $161.15, respectively, which had been docketed January 29, 1916, and which had been assigned duly on the judgment docket to the defendants on June 13, 1917, by the plaintiffs in said judgments.

The question presented, therefore, was whether the consent judgment aforesaid is an estoppel upon the defendants to collect the judgments for an entirely different indebtedness, and which had been assigned to them prior to the foregoing consent judgment. The consent judgment, which is set out in the record, shows that the docketed judgments now sought to be restrained were not considered in or affected by the consent judgment for a resale of the lands theretofore irregularly sold by Greene, whose deed to defendants was set aside as void, to reimburse Greene, who had paid off the defendants' other judgments. The agreement therein that the commissioner should make a conveyance in fee to the purchaser upon payment of the purchase money cannot be reasonably construed as an agreement by the defendants herein to waive the lien of these other judgments taken by other parties for an entirely different consideration, and to which Greene was not a party.

The defendants gave the plaintiff full notice, before he paid over the purchase money, that they held the lien of these judgments on the land, prior in date to and independent of the claim which Greene had asserted by reason of his having paid off the judgments in favor of the defendants on an entirely different indebtedness. It was the plaintiff's misfortune that he ignored this notice, even if it was incumbent on the defendants to go beyond the legal notice given by the docketing of the judgments.

[2] A consent judgment, like all other judgments, is an estoppel only as to such matters as are therein litigated or "necessarily embraced and determined." Tyler v. Capeheart, 125 N. C. 64, 34 S. E. 108, and citations thereto in the Anno. Ed.

There was nothing in the consent judgment which can be taken as an agreement to cancel the lien of these judgments held by the defendants which were not embraced in, nor connected with, nor referred to in, the consent judgment, nor was there any consideration moving thereto.

This matter was before the court in this same case (Church v. Vaughn, Hemphill & Co., 177 N. C. 432, 99 S. E. 199), in which we affirmed the order continuing the restraining order to the hearing. It did not then appear fully as now, that the judgments sought to be restrained were held by the defendants as assignees, and were in no wise connected with or referred to in the consent judgment, nor within its scope.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yancey County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by T. W. Maney against Robert Greenwood and others, trading under the firm name of Greenwood, Burlison & Blackstocks. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

This action was brought to recover the price of timber, bargained and sold to the defendants, at their request, from plaintiff's land, and also damages for the use of certain lands occupied by them as a sawmill yard for sawing and storing timber cut from other lands. Only one issue was submitted to the jury, as follows:

"Are the defendants, or any one, or more, of them, and if so, which ones, indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what amount? Answer: Yes, all three, to the amount of $2,212.78."

Judgment upon the verdict, and defendants appealed.

Charles Hutchins, of Burnsville, and A. Hall Johnston, of Asheville, for appellants. Gardner & Hamrick and Watson, Hudgins, Watson & Fouts, all of Burnsville, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The question in this case turned largely upon whether the defendants were partners in the transaction upon which the plaintiff declares. There was more than ample testimony to show that they were such partners. The defendant Joe M. Burlison signed the contract along with the plaintiff, and agreed to take and pay for the timber or logs which were merchantable, and which would saw out sound lumber. The codefendants, Greenwood and Blackstocks, if they were partners of Burlison, would, of course, be responsible equally with him. The following are some of the facts tending to establish the copartnership between the defendants: The instrument executed by Greenwood and Blackstocks to Burlison some time after the contract was made; the signature of Burlison and Blackstocks to the note; and the statement of Blackstocks that they were partners at the time this contract was made; and the conduct of the partners, especially when plaintiff demanded his money; and, lastly the most significant fact is the admission of the partnership by defendants in paragraph 1 of the answer in this action.

First. There was an abundance of evidence to warrant the jury in finding that Greenwood and Blackstocks were partners with Burlison, and certainly enough to go to the jury, and the jury has so found. Greenwood and Blackstocks did not refuse to pay the plaintiff on the ground that they were not partners with him, but stated that the logs did not come up to the contract, and Blackstocks said that the reason Burlison signed his name to the note was that they were partners "over there" at that time, and this is reinforced by the conveyance from Greenwood and Blackstocks to Burlison and other proof of the partnership, as, for instance, the admission in the answer, as above noted, that the three composed the partnership. There is no substantial merit in this exception.

[2] Second. The court charged the jury that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that he had complied with the terms of the contract in every respect, and there was also evidence by the witness, agreed upon by the plaintiff and defendant to do the measuring of the logs, that he had scaled out all defects and left the logs so that they would saw out sound lumber. Taking the charge of the court all together, it shows that it was absolutely fair to the defendants.

Third. The court stated the contentions of the plaintiff as to the partnership, and also charged the jury that, if plaintiff had shown by the greater weight of the evidence that, though Blackstocks and Greenwood may not have signed the contract, they were really interested with Burlison, as partners, in the logs conveyed by the contract, that they were going to manufacture them together, and thus engage in the joint enterprise, and that Burlison only represented them, then, and in that event, not only would Burlison be responsible to the plaintiff, but the other two defendants would be liable to him for all merchantable logs plaintiff delivered to the defendant's yards, the designated place of delivery, provided plaintiff complied with his contract.

[3] Fourth. Counsel do not state enough of the charge of the court to show just what the judge meant when he said that the defendants had not gone on the stand; and, when the charge is read as to this point, it will be seen that the court was giving the contentions of the defendants, and that it was not necessary for them to go upon the stand, since they contended that the logs were not up to the contract. But if defendants failed to prove material facts which they could have shown by their own testimony, their failure to become witnesses was the subject of fair comment. Goodman v. Sapp, 102 N. C. 477, 9 S. E. 483; State v. Turner, 171 N. C. 303, 88 S. E. 523; 16 Cyc. 1062; Powell v. Strickland, 163 N. C. 393, 79 S. E. 872, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 709.

[4] Fifth. It was not denied that the defendants sawed a portion of the logs into lumber, and, of course, this was an acceptance of a portion of the logs at least, and the court was warranted in so charging to this effect.

[5] Sixth. The court charged the jury that Burlison could not reject all of the logs, but only such part as came up to the contract he would have to take. This was the correct rule of law applicable to the case.

[6] Seventh. There is nothing in the charge to sustain this exception and the same has been fully answered in the remarks above. When all the charge is taken and construed together, as it should be the rule of law was correctly laid down by the court.

Eighth. We can see no error in this exception. The court charged the jury, at all times, that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to satisfy them by the greater weight of the evidence that he had complied with the terms of the contract, which had been offered in evidence, before they could answer the issue in favor of him, and if he failed to satisfy the jury by the greater weight of the evidence, they should answer the issue against the plaintiff.

That part of the charge, as to accepting a part of the timber being equivalent to an acceptance of all, was evidently meant to be confined to the merchantable timber, or such as complied with the description of the contract, and it was not intended to say that an acceptance of the merchantable timber would bind the defendants to take the whole lot, whether of that kind or not. We could not possibly attribute any such meaning to the very learned, and accurate, presiding judge, and, besides, the context discloses the real meaning to be that defendants were bound only to take the timber, which was of the kind they contracted to receive and pay for, and could not reject "any" if some of it was of that description, the word "any" being palpably used for "all," and the jury could not, as intelligent men, have otherwise understood the language of the court, even though the phraseology may not have accorded with the highest and best standard of expression. The charge must be taken and construed as a whole, in the same connected way it was delivered to the jury, and we must not trust to mere conjecture that they may, perhaps, have misunderstood, and thus have been misled, but it should clearly so appear before we can reverse for that reason. It would not be fair to the judge to select only one isolated passage in his instructions, but each clause should be considered in the light of what precedes and follows it, so that we may look at the charge in its entirety. This has always been the rule here and elsewhere, for it is the essence of reason and justice. State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 233; Kornegay v. Railroad, 154 N. C. 389, 70 S. E. 731; In re Hinton's Will, 180 N. C. 206, 213, 104 S. E. 341.

[7] As to the failure of the defendants to take the stand as witnesses in their own behalf, the case of Goodman v. Sapp, 102 N. C. 477, 98 S. E. 483, furnishes a full answer to this objection; but, as this practice does not seem to be well understood, we will refer more particularly to some of the authorities. The power and duty of the court to check counsel when abusing his privilege in commenting on witnesses and their testimony and on the conduct of parties to the action is clearly settled by many decisions. Very soon after the change by statute, allowing parties to actions to testify, it was adjudged that the mere fact that a party, plaintiff or defendant, did not testify in his own behalf, was not the proper subject of comment. In Devries v. Phillips, 63 N. C. 52, the court was asked to charge the jury:

"That, inasmuch as the defendant was a competent witness, the fact that he did not offer himself as a witness in his own behalf authorized the jury to presume the facts against him. His honor declined to give the instruction, but charged the jury that they might consider the circumstance and give to it what weight they might think proper."

In commenting on this ruling, Reade, J., said:

"It is true as a rule of evidence that, where in the investigation of a case facts are proved against a party which it is apparent he might explain, and he withholds the explanation, the facts are to be taken most strongly against him. * * * We conclude that the fact that a party * * * does not offer himself as a witness, standing alone, allows the jury to presume nothing for or against him, and can only be the subject of comment as to its propriety or necessity in any given case, according to the circumstances, as the introduction or nonintroduction of any other witness might be commented on."

In Gragg v. Wagner, 77 N. C. 246, but three persons were present at the bargain and execution of the deed in controversy—the plaintiff, the draftsman, and the defendant. The two former were examined on behalf of the plaintiff. The defendant was not present, but was in the state of Oregon, and it was not alleged that he knew the facts other and different, in connection with the execution of the deed, from those testified to by the witnesses present, and counsel was not permitted to comment upon the fact that he had not offered himself as a witness. The court held that it is the privilege, and not the duty, of a party to an action to offer himself as a witness in his own behalf, and he is not the proper subject for unfriendly criticism because he declines to exercise a privilege conferred upon him for his own benefit merely. The fact is not the subject of comment at all; certainly not, unless under very peculiar circumstances, which must necessarily be passed upon by the judge presiding at the trial as a matter of sound discretion. Only an abuse of that legal discretion is reviewable here. Peebles v. Horton, 64 N. C. 374, State v. Williams, 65 N. C. 505, Jenkins v. Ore Co., 65 N. C. 563, State v. Byran, 89 N. C. 531, State v. Suggs, 89 N. C. 527, Guy v. Manuel, 89 N. C. 83, State v. Rogers, 94 N. C. 860, and Chambers v. Greenwood, 68 N. C. 274, and numerous other authorities, settle the general principle that—

The extent to which counsel may comment upon witnesses and parties "must be left, ordinarily, to the sound discretion of the judge who tries the case, and this court will not review his discretion, unless it is apparent that the impropriety of counsel was gross and calculated to prejudice the jury."

It was said by Reade, J., in Chambers v. Greenwood, supra, that—

"The mere manner of conducting the trial below is, and ought to be, so much within the discretion of the presiding judge, that an alleged irregularity must be palpable, and the consequences important, to induce us to interfere."

And this is held in citing and approving Devries v. Phillips, supra, where it is stated that his introduction or nonintroduction should be the subject of comment only as the introduction or nonintroduction of other witnesses might be. We think this is the necessary result of the change made by the Code, section 1350. It will be noted that there is a difference between Code, § 1350, which relates to civil actions, and section 1353, which relates to criminal actions. In the latter it is expressly declared that a failure of the defendant to testify "shall not create any presumption against him." The reason for the difference readily suggests itself. The doctrine laid down is not in conflict with Wilson v. White, 80 N. C. 280, Greenlee v. Greenlee, 93 N. C. 278, Kerchner v. McRae, 80 N. C. 219, or Blackwell v. McElwee, 96 N. C. 71, 1 S. E. 676, 60 Am. Rep. 404. If the defendant in the present case had had any witness present who was cognizant of, and could have contradicted the damaging facts testified to, and failed to introduce such witness, we think it would have been the subject of proper comment, and the ruling of his honor in this respect does not entitle the defendant to a new trial. See, also, Yarborough v. Hughes, 139 N. C. 199, 51 S. E. 904; Powell v. Strickland, supra, and Stone v. Texas Co., 180 N. C. 564, 105 S. E. 425.

It seems that Goodman v. Sapp, supra, and the later cases approving it, has settled the law in this respect, notwithstanding the varying, and not altogether consistent, expressions used in some of the previous decisions cited above.

We have examined the record with care, and can find no reason to disturb the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the court below. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that the case has been properly, fairly, and correctly tried, and that the jury drew the right conclusion from the evidence.

No error.

ALEXANDER et al. v. LOWRANCE et al.
(No. 508.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Officers \Leftrightarrow 80—Schools and school districts \Leftrightarrow 53(3)—Direct proceeding necessary to attack official acts of de facto officer.

Defendants' admission that plaintiffs are acting as the graded school committee of a town, performing the duties of such committee and conducting the public schools of the town, is fatal to their contention that plaintiffs are not lawfully constituted officers, and so without authority to maintain the action as such; as exercise of official duties by an officer de facto can be impeached only by a proceeding properly instituted for that purpose.

2. Statutes \Leftrightarrow 225—Statutes on the same subject to be construed so as to give effect to all provisions of each.

All statutes relating to the same subject are to be compared and so construed in reference to each other that effect may be given to all the provisions of each, if it can be done by any fair and reasonable construction.

3. Schools and school districts \Leftrightarrow 55—Special act creating school district held to confer on school committee control of funds and property.

Laws 1903, c. 395, constituting the town of Forest City a public school district, held, in view of sections 3, 5, 6, and 9, to confer on the school committee power and authority to take charge of and control the funds, lands, buildings, property, and general interests of the district.

4. Schools and school districts \Leftrightarrow 46—Control of funds of a town district, given to the school committee by special act creating the district, held not divested by later general act.

C. S. §§ 5684-5690 (being Laws 1915, c. 81) relative to bonds for schoolhouses in cities and towns, by section 5684 providing that whenever the board of aldermen or other authority of a town which is in charge of the finances deems it necessary to erect new school buildings it is authorized to issue town bonds therefor, by section 5688 authorizing the board to cause the bonds to be sold, and by section 5690 providing that this article shall apply to towns having powers under special acts as well as those deriving their powers from general law, but that it shall not be deemed to repeal or abridge any powers, rights, or privileges granted by any special acts to any town, but shall be construed to grant additional or co-ordinate powers, held not to deprive the school committee of the school district of the town of Forest City of the exclusive right to control the funds and other property appertaining solely to the graded school district, given by Laws 1903, c. 395, constituting such town a public school district.

5. Mandamus \Leftrightarrow 100—Lies to compel performance of ministerial duty of town treasurer to turn funds over to treasurer of school committee.

Under Laws 1903, c. 395, constituting the town of Forest City a school district, and Laws

1915, c. 81 (C. S. §§ 5684-5690), as to bonds for schoolhouses in towns, when the town treasurer receives the proceeds of such bonds he occupies the position of a passive trustee, holding the money for the benefit of the school committee of the district, with the ministerial duty of immediately transferring the fund to the treasurer of the school committee, so that on his refusal or failure to do so mandamus to compel the transfer will lie.

6. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 883—Where cause was by agreement heard without jury, jurisdiction of trial court cannot be renounced on appeal.

The cause having by agreement been heard without intervention of a jury, jurisdiction of the trial court to so hear it cannot be renounced on appeal, and such renunciation invoked as cause for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rutherford County; Shaw, Judge.

Mandamus by J. F. Alexander and others against L. C. Lowrance and others. Writ granted, and defendants appeal. Affirmed. See, also, 109 S. E. 641.

Peremptory mandamus granted by Shaw, Judge, on September 20, 1921, to compel the defendants to deliver to the treasurer of the graded school committee of Forest City the proceeds of bonds issued to provide a fund for the erection of a school building in the Forest City graded school district.

The defendants admitted that the plaintiffs, Alexander, Reinhardt, Hemphill, Reid, and Biggerstaff, were acting as the graded school committee, performing the duties of such committee, and conducting, the public schools of the town, and that the plaintiff Biggerstaff is the treasurer of the committee. The defendants, however, denied that the plaintiffs were lawfully constituted officers.

By virtue of P. L. 1915, c. 81, now C. S. c. 95, art. 40, the board of aldermen of Forest City ordered an election and submitted to the qualified voters of the town the question of issuing bonds in the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of erecting a building for the city graded school; and, a majority of the qualified voters having voted for the bonds, the board of aldermen caused bonds to be issued and sold, and, after paying commissions and expenses, turned over to the treasurer of the town $45,000 arising from the sale. The plaintiffs made demand upon the defendants for this money, and upon the defendants' refusal to deliver it applied to his honor, Ray, Judge, for an alternative mandamus, and afterward to his honor, Shaw, Judge, for a peremptory mandamus. Judge Shaw rendered judgment granting the peremptory mandamus, and from this judgment the defendants appealed.

Solomon Gallert, of Rutherfordton, for appellants.

R. R. Blanton, of Forest City, and Ryburn & Hoey, of Shelby, for appellees.

ADAMS, J. [1] The defendants admit that the graded school committee are conducting the public schools in Forest City, and are otherwise performing the duties and functions of their office. In view of this admission it is unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of the refinements that characterize the difference between an officer de facto and an officer de jure, because it is familiar learning that the exercise of official duties by an officer de facto can be impeached only by a proceeding properly instituted for that purpose. The admission of the defendants is fatal to their contention that the plaintiffs are not lawfully constituted officers, and for this reason are without authority to maintain their action. Tar River Co. v. Neal, 10 N. C. 520; Burke v. Elliott, 26 N. C. 355, 42 Am. Dec. 142; Com'rs v. McDaniel, 52 N. C. 107; Rogers v. Powell, 174 N. C. 388, 93 S. E. 917.

[2-4] The principal argument of the defendants was addressed to the proposition that the board of aldermen of Forest City have exclusive control of the fund in question, that the plaintiffs have no legal claim upon it, and that the writ of mandamus was improvidently issued. On the other hand, the committee of the graded school contended that their right to the fund is absolute and unassailable. The arguments advanced require an examination of the laws on which the respective parties base their claims.

The defendants rely chiefly upon the act of 1915, which is now chapter 95, article 40, of Consolidated Statutes. Section 5684 is as follows:

"Whenever the board of aldermen or other duly constituted authority of any incorporated town or city in the state, which is in charge of the finances, shall deem it necessary to purchase lands or buildings or to erect additional buildings for school purposes, the said board of aldermen or other authority is authorized and empowered to issue for said purposes, in the name of the town or city, bonds of such amount as the board of aldermen or other authority shall deem necessary, in such denominations and forms as the board of aldermen or other authority may determine."

Section 5688 authorizes the board of aldermen of each city or town, after ascertaining in the manner provided that a majority of the qualified voters favor the issuance of school bonds, to cause the bonds to be prepared and issued for the approved purpose, and to be sold at public or private sale. Section 5690 is in these words:

"This article shall apply to towns or cities which have powers under special acts or charters as well as to those who derive their powers from the general law. This article shall not be deemed or construed to repeal or abridge any powers, rights, or privileges heretofore or hereafter granted by any special acts to any town or city, but shall be construed to grant additional powers where no such powers have been granted, or co-ordinate powers where such powers have already been or shall be granted."

If article 40 shall not be construed to repeal or abridge any powers, rights, or privileges granted by special acts, it becomes material to inquire whether such powers, rights, or privileges have been granted to the plaintiffs.

At the session of 1903 the General Assembly passed an act (Laws 1903, c. 395) to establish a graded school for the town of Forest City. This act (section 1) provides that Forest City shall constitute a public school district; (sections 5, 6) that after the graded school committee shall have determined the amount to be levied, the board of aldermen shall levy an annual tax for the support and maintenance of this school; and that the moneys apportioned to the school district shall be turned over by the treasurer of the county to the treasurer of the school committee for the benefit of the school. Section 3 provides that the school committee shall have exclusive control of the public school interests, funds, and property in the graded school district; and section 9, that the committee shall have the right to control site, lands, buildings, and other property belonging to the trustees of the Forest City Academy or High School, title to which is vested in them and their successors.

It is a fundamental rule of statutory construction that for the purpose of learning and giving effect to the legislative intention, all statutes relating to the same subject are to be compared and so construed in reference to each other that effect maybe given to all the provisions of each, if it can be done by any fair and reasonable construction. 25 R. C. L. p. 1061; State v. Melton, 44 N. C. 49; Cecil v. High Point, 165 N. C. 431, 81 S. E. 616; Morganton Mfg. & Trading Co. v. Andrews, 165 N. C. 285, 81 S. E. 418, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 763. Applying this principle to the act of 1903 and to the act of 1915, we regard it clearly the intention of the General Assembly to confer upon the school committee power and authority to take charge of and control the funds, moneys, lands, buildings, property, and general interests of the graded school district. We are convinced also that the act of 1915 was not intended to deprive the committee of the rights and privileges conferred by the act of 1903. The statutes embraced in article 40, supra, were intended to confer upon the board of aldermen of any incorporated city or town, or other governing body in charge of its finances, power and authority, if not otherwise conferred, by conforming to the procedure therein prescribed, to issue and sell bonds for the purchase of lands or buildings, or for the erection of buildings, for school purposes; and if such authority has been conferred on any other body, to grant to the board of aldermen or other duly constituted authority such co-ordinate powers as may be necessary to effect the contemplated purpose. But evidently these statutes cannot be construed as depriving the school committee of their exclusive right to control the funds and other property appertaining solely to the graded school district.

[5] In the next place, the defendants contend that neither of the acts referred to imposes upon the school committee any specific right or duty, and that they are not entitled to the writ of mandamus. The cases cited by counsel for the defendants sustain the principle that ordinarily the writ will be granted to enforce only a ministerial act or duty which is imposed by law; but we cannot concur with the counsel in his application of the principle. When the bonds were sold and the treasurer of the town received the proceeds, he occupied the position of a passive or simple trustee, who held the money for the benefit of the school committee; for with respect to the fund he had no judicial or discretionary duty to perform. It was incumbent upon him immediately to transfer the fund to the treasurer of the school committee; and upon his refusal or failure to perform a duty which was ministerial, and not judicial or discretionary, the plaintiffs properly applied for, and his honor properly granted, the peremptory writ of mandamus.

[6] It was suggested in the brief of counsel for the defendants that the pleadings raised disputed questions of fact, which should have been submitted to a jury for determination. The pleadings raise, not issues of fact, but questions of fact and of law, which were determinable by the court; but, even if otherwise, the defendants, having agreed that the cause should be heard without the intervention of a jury, cannot now renounce the jurisdiction of his honor and invoke such renunciation as a valid cause for reversing the judgment. Due consideration of the record and of the briefs discloses no error, and accordingly the judgment is affirmed.

ALEXANDER et al. v. LOWRANCE et al.
(No. 509.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

Injunction §—88—Lies to protect from threatened expenditure funds to which plaintiffs are entitled.

Plaintiffs school committee of the school district of the town of Forest City, being entitled to the control of funds from sale of bonds for a schoolhouse, are entitled to protection by injunction against the threatened expenditure thereof by defendants aldermen of the town.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rutherford County; Shaw, Judge.

Action by J. F. Alexander and others against L. C. Lowrance and others for injunction. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 109 S. E. 639.

Appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Shaw, Judge, restraining the defendants from erecting a school building in the town of Forest City. The plaintiffs alleged that the proceeds of the bonds were in the hands of the town treasurer; that the treasurer of the graded school committee was entitled to the fund as the lawful depository; that the defendants had prepared plans and specifications for the erection of the building, and were ready to proceed with its construction; and that the defendants' attempted expenditure of the fund was wrongful and unlawful. The answer of the defendants was practically the same as the answer filed by them, denying the right of the plaintiffs to the mandamus.

Solomon Gallert, of Rutherfordton, for appellants.

R. R. Blanton, of Forest City, and Ryburn & Hoey, of Shelby, for appellees.

ADAMS, J. The disposition of this case is governed by the decision adjudging the plaintiffs entitled to the writ of mandamus. We have held that the plaintiffs are entitled to the proceeds arising from the sale of the bonds, and it follows as a corollary that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the fund protected from expenditure by the defendants. The judgment continuing the restraining order is therefore affirmed.

PERRY v. NORTON et al. (No. 517.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Frauds, statute of §—138(4, 5)—Employé may recover for improvements made and services rendered in reliance on parole promise to convey land.

Where an employé worked under an agreement to pay him a specified amount per month, and in addition deed him the cottage and lot he occupied in lieu of higher wages he could have received in working for others, his employers cannot avoid liability for improvements made by him and for money expended and services rendered by him in reliance on the promise to convey, on the ground that the contract, not being in writing was void under the statute; the employé being entitled thereto, as a matter of equitable relief.

2. Improvements §4(5)—Interest held recoverable in suit for improvements.

Where employers agreed to convey the house and lot occupied by employé when they should sell their plantation, in order to retain employé's services, but on subsequent sale of plantation did not convey such house to the employé, the employé, in action for improvements made upon the land and for money expended and services rendered in reliance upon the promise, was entitled, under C. S. § 2309, to interest on the amount otherwise due him from the time of the sale of the plantation to the time of the trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Henderson County; Adams, Judge.

Action by John Perry, Jr., against Martha A. Norton and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

This action was brought to recover damages for improvements made upon land, which defendants promised by parol to convey, but which they failed to do, and for money expended and services rendered in reliance upon said promise so repudiated.

In the case at bar the plaintiff alleges that he had been in the employ of the defendants since he had been large enough to earn his own living, and, in July, 1913, he was offered very much higher wages than the defendants were paying, and he went to defendants and told them that he wanted to serve notice of his leaving their employ. Defendants were so anxious to keep plaintiff that they made him a proposition that, if he would not leave and go to the better paying job, they would continue to pay him $40 per month, charge no house rent, and when their large plantation was sold, or they dispensed with his services, they would deed him the cottage and lot he was occupying in lieu of the higher wage he would receive at the other place. He took the offer under consideration, and, on the day following, he went to defendants and told them he had decided to accept the same. He thereafter exercised a sole, and even despotic, dominion over the house and lot, as his own, building a fence around it and erecting a barn on it, at his own cost and expense, and continued to serve the defendants at the same wage of $40 per month for four years, three of them years of world war, uncertainty, and unprecedentedly inflated prices for living commodities, and labor wages never before heard of—a period in which skilled workmen such as he (a landscape gardener, plumber, and general utility man) were in great demand, and earning anywhere from $150 to $300 per month the country over. For all this period the defendants got this man's services on the same basis—never any change—allowed him to build the barn, and expend his own money in improving the place, believing it to be his, as soon as the plantation could be sold, and, when his services to defendants were no longer needed, assured for themselves a permanent supply of skilled labor from him through all the chances and vicissitudes of the war, and then, when the plantation is sold, included the lot and house they had contracted to convey to him with the whole estate, and made no other compensation for the sacrifice of his opportunities and the benefits that they had received from his hard toll, freely given and induced by the false promise. The jury returned the following verdict:

"1. Did the defendants contract with the plaintiff to pay him for his services more than $40 a month and for the use of the house and lot, as alleged in the complaint? Ans. Yes.

"2. If so, in what amount are the defendants indebted to the plaintiffs? Ans. $1,700."

Judgment on the verdict, and defendants appealed.

Martin, Rollins & Wright, of Asheville, for appellants.

Ewbank & Whitmire, of Hendersonville, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). First. The defendants' first ground of exception is the court's instruction to the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff to satisfy them by the greater weight of the evidence, that the alleged contract was made, and if, upon consideration of all the evidence, the plaintiff has satisfied them that the defendants made the contract upon which he relies, that is, a contract to convey to him the house and lot, to pay him money, and give him the use and occupation of the house and lot, they will answer the first issue Yes, and, further, that it has long been settled by our court that where the labor or money of a person has been expended in the permanent improvement and enrichment of the property of another by parol contract or agreement, which cannot be enforced because, and only because, it is not in writing, the party repudiating the contract, as he may do, will not be allowed to take and hold the property thus improved and enriched without compensation for the additional value which his improvements have conferred upon the property, and this equity rests upon the broad principle that it is against conscience for one man to be enriched to the injury and cost of another, which was induced by his own acts. Luton v. Badham, 127 N. C. 96, 37 S. E. 143, 53 L. R. A. 337, 80 Am. St. Rep. 783; Ford v. Stroud, 150 N. C. 365, 64 S. E. 1; Ballard v. Boyette, 171 N. C. 26, 86 S. E. 175.

[1] The jury found the facts to be as proven by the plaintiff, and the law has been settled by this court, in a number of well-considered cases, that the defendants cannot take advantage of the plaintiff's labor and services under such an agreement as that set up and proved in this case and defeat his claim for compensation for the same by pleading the statute of frauds. Luton v. Badham and other cases, supra. In Albea v. Griffin, 22 N. C. 9, the bill was for specific performance of the contract. The defendants relied upon the statute of frauds, the contract being in parol, and Judge Gaston said that the court admitted this objection to be well founded, and held as a consequence from it that, the contract being void, not only its specific performance cannot be enforced, but that no action will lie, in law or equity, for damages because of nonperformance. But we are nevertheless of the opinion that plaintiff has an equity which entitles him to relief, and that parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that equity. The plaintiff's labor and money have been expended on improving property which the ancestor of the defendants encouraged him to expect should become his own, and by the act of God or the caprice of the defendants this expectation has been frustrated. The consequence is a loss to him and a gain to them. It is against conscience that they should be enriched, by gains thus acquired, to his injury. Baker v. Carson, 21 N. C. 381. In Dunn v. Moore, 38 N. C. 364, relief was denied because the contract set up in the bill was denied. Nash, J., said that if defendant had admitted the contract, the court would not have permitted him to put plaintiff out "without returning the money he had received and compensating him for his improvements." Of this Connor, J., said in Ford v. Stroud, 150 N. C. at page 365, 64 S. E. 1, that, while in the case at bar the contract is not denied, if it had been, we should not hesitate to follow the decision in Luton v. Badham, supra, in which Mr. Justice Furches reviews this and all of the other cases, and shows conclusively that the right to relief cannot be defeated by a mere denial of the contract. See the very able and, the writer thinks, conclusive opinion of Smith, C. J., in McCracken v. McCracken, 88 N. C. 272. Certainly this cannot be done where the action is for the recovery of the purchase money, as upon an implied assumpsit for money had and received or for money paid for a consideration which has failed.

In Daniel v. Crumpler, 75 N. C. 184, Rodman, J., says that the right to recover the purchase money and compensation for improvements against one who had repudiated his parol contract to convey land "stands on general principles of equity." As said by Judge Furches, in Luton v. Badham, supra, all of the cases are based upon this theory. It is doubtful whether, prior to the abolition of the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, an action could have been maintained at law for compensation for improvements put upon land by the vendee. The court of equity had granted relief by enjoining the eviction of the vendee by the vendor, who had repudiated his contract, until he had made compensation for improvements. Whatever difficulty was encountered because of technical rules of pleading disappear when forms of action are abolished and a plaintiff recovers upon the facts stated in his complaint and proven upon the trial.

[2] Second. As to the defendant's second exception, which is that the court erred in rendering the judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants for the interest on $1,700 from October, 1917, until paid. Under the contract between the parties, plaintiff's right to compensation for the loss of the house and lot accrued when the defendants sold their plantation in October, 1917, and at the same time sold the house and lot that the plaintiff had labored to acquire for four years. The defendants had received the services for which compensation was due, and the plaintiff had, in addition to these services, expended his money in building fences and a barn on the defendants' lot, which they had contracted to convey to him prior to October, 1917, and the jury "ascertained from the terms and relevant evidence" the amount of the plaintiff's claim and, under decisions of this court, the trial judge rendered judgment for interest from the time the plaintiff's right to compensation accrued, to wit, from October, 1917. In this the trial judge simply followed the law as established by the decisions of this court. Chatham v. Realty Co., 174 N. C. 671, 94 S. E. 447. In the case before the court, there has been more than an adequate default on the part of the defendants in withholding the money belonging to the plaintiff for the value of his services—they have tried to defeat his claim altogether for a period of four years, and still, in the prosecution of this appeal, endeavor to prevent him from reaping the reward of his toil. The statute says that all sums of money due by contract of any kind, excepting money due on penal bonds, shall bear interest, etc. Consol. Statutes, § 2309. From this it would seem to follow in this state that whenever a recovery is had for a breach of contract and "the amount is ascertained from the terms of the contract itself or for evidence relevant to the inquiry," that interest should be added. Kester v. Miller, 119 N. C. 475, 26 S. E. 115; Bond v. Cotton Mills, 166 N. C. 20, 31 S. E. 936.

But this question of interest has been settled, by this court at the present term, in Croom v. Lumber Co., 108 S. E. 735, opinion by Justice Adams, where the authorities are collected, which decision also bears somewhat upon the equitable principle we have applied to another branch of this case. It was argued by the defendants that, as the court did not instruct as to giving interest in the verdict, the jury may have done so, and defendants would thereby pay double interest, but we think this cannot be assumed, but that the presumption is the other way, that the jury did not allow interest, nothing having been said by counsel or the court with respect to it. In adding interest, the court was merely complying with the statute and following the precedents in this court.

It will be noted that in this case the defendants got the benefit of both the labor and money of the plaintiff—his labor in the service of the defendants for four years and his money in the improvement of the house and lot that they agreed should be deeded to him, but which they conveyed to another in the wholesale conveyance of their large estate.

The defendants' counsel argued strenuously and at some length that the contract alleged and proved was unreasonable and improbable, when as a matter of fact the contention of the plaintiff is much more reasonable than to suppose that he would stay with the defendants in 1913, after being offered much higher wages, and then continue to stay on during the three years following, when labor of the commonest sort increased very much in value, and yet with all this change in opportunities he remained "on the job" until the end, at the same old pay, unless there was some other compelling motive keeping him there, which was his desire honestly to perform the contract for the breach of which by defendants and as compensation for his services the jury found that he was entitled to $1,700, and for this sum the court gave judgment, with interest from October, 1917.

We are of the opinion that the learned judge, who presided at the trial, was right on both points. The first ground upon which rests the verdict and his judgment has been settled and established for many years without much question, and the second is equally as clear, and, moreover, has for its support the authority of a statute, the construction of which cannot now be questioned.

No error.

(182 N. C. 899)

STATE v. BLACKWELDER. (No. 467.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Homicide ⚡172—Evidence held admissible.

In a prosecution for homicide, defendant having killed deceased when latter was attempting to arrest him, where state's theory of the case was that defendant and another had broken into deceased's garage a few minutes before the attempted arrest, at some distance from the garage, and were guilty of felony, and defendant's theory was that they had not gone to the garage of the deceased, and that deceased had no authority to make the arrest under C. S. §§ 4235, 4543, and that he shot deceased in self-defense, evidence of what occurred at the garage held admissible, though defendant was not identified at the garage.

2. Criminal law ⚡338(2)—"Direct" and "circumstantial evidence" distinguished; circumstantial evidence admissible.

"Direct evidence" is that which is immediately applied to the fact to be proved, while "circumstantial evidence" is that which is indirectly applied by means of circumstances from which the existence of the principal fact may reasonably be deduced or inferred; that is, circumstantial evidence is merely direct evidence indirectly applied, and is competent in the absence of direct evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Circumstantial Evidence; Direct Evidence.]

3. Arrest ⚡64—Private person may arrest without warrant for commission of felony within his "presence."

Where one heard hinge of his garage door creak, and, on going out, found the door open, he was warranted in arresting one in the vicinity for an attempt to steal a car therein, and that without a warrant; the crime being committed in his "presence" within the meaning of C. S. §§ 4235, 4543.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Presence.]

4. Criminal law ⚡761(6)—Instruction not erroneous as assuming that deceased properly attempted to arrest accused.

An instruction in a homicide case, wherein it appeared that accused shot and killed deceased, who attempted to arrest him after some one had broken into his garage, held not subject to the objection that it assumed that deceased was acting in compliance with the law in attempting to arrest accused.

* Appeal from Superior Court, Cabarrus County; Bryson, Judge.

Frank Blackwelder was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. No error.

Criminal action tried before Bryson, Judge, and a jury at the April term, 1921, of Cabarrus county. Frank Blackwelder and Sid McDaniel were indicted for the murder of M. W. Allman, but Blackwelder only was tried. When the case was called for trial, the solicitor announced that he would not request a verdict for murder in the first degree, but only for murder in the second degree, or for manslaughter, as the evidence might warrant. The jury returned a verdict against Blackwelder for murder in the second degree. The judgment of the court was pronounced, and the defendant, having entered exceptions of record, appealed to the Supreme Court.

There was evidence for the state tending to show the facts to be as follows: M. W. Allman resided in Cabarrus county, some distance from Concord, the county seat, and about a quarter of a mile from the cross roads. On the occasion hereinafter referred to, he, his wife, and his son were at his home. Between 1 and 2 o'clock on the morning of January 4, 1921, the defendant arrived at Concord on a train which had come from Charlotte, and at the station met McDaniel and a man named Jones. The defendant, after a conversation with the other two, went to the Hartsell mill, and took a pistol and some cartridges from a traveling bag which he had left at the home of McDaniel's mother. About 2 o'clock these three men left Concord in a Ford car, and went in the direction of the place at which the deceased lived, and about 4 o'clock in the morning a car passed the residence of the deceased, and stopped in front of his garage, which was about 50 yards from the residence; the wife of the deceased about this time heard the door of the car close, and raised the curtain, looked through the window, and saw the car go on down the road. In about three minutes the car returned, and again passed the residence of the deceased, and stopped at a distance of about 40 or 50 yards from the house in the road leading to Concord. The deceased, his son, and his wife had been disturbed by the noise, and the deceased, going out to make an investigation, called out, "What are you doing there?" Just prior to this time, or about this time, the son of the deceased heard the door of the garage open, and, taking the shotgun, went to the piazza and fired the gun twice. The car which had stopped beyond the house thereupon moved on in the direction of Concord, and the deceased and his son a few minutes thereafter took the car of the deceased from the garage and went in pursuit of the other car a distance of about two miles, when, failing to overtake it, they returned in the direction of their home.

When about a mile from home, the deceased and his son met the defendant and McDaniel in the road coming from the direction of their residence, and apparently going toward Concord. Upon their meeting, the deceased had the car stopped, and entered into a conversation with the defendant and McDaniel. The deceased inquired where Blackwelder and McDaniel were going, and they said they were going to Concord. The deceased asked where they were from, and they said from Georgeville. The deceased asked their names, and Blackwelder said his name was Smith. The deceased inquired whether the car had run off and left them, to which Blackwelder answered, "No." The son of the deceased then got out of the car, walked in front of it, and the deceased thereupon told Blackwelder and McDaniel to come in front of the car so that he might see them in the light. They came in front of the car, and Blackwelder inquired whether the deceased knew them. The deceased said he did not, got out of his car, took a position near his son, and said to Blackwelder and McDaniel: "Why do you hold your hand so closely in our pockets? You have a gun, haven't you?" Blackwelder and McDaniel had their hands in their overcoat pockets, and Blackwelder said, "Yes." The deceased took the shotgun which his son had. He had previously asked Blackwelder and McDaniel if they had been in his garage, and each of them said "No." The deceased said: "I have reason to believe you are the two fellows I ran out of my garage a few minutes ago." He asked them to take their hands out of their pockets, and Blackwelder remarked: "There is no use of that." The deceased then said: "If you were not in my garage at the time mentioned, why do you refuse to take your hands out of your pockets?" Blackwelder and McDaniel then began shooting with pistols, and the defendant fell at the first shooting. The shotgun which he held was fired as he fell, and again after he had fallen to the ground. The son was shot in each shoulder. McDaniel shot him and Blackwelder shot the deceased. They fired four or five times before the shotgun was fired. Blackwelder was shot in the hand, and, as he and McDaniel ran away, the son of the deceased fired two shots at them. The shotgun was the only weapon in the possession of the deceased and his son. The deceased was shot on the morning of January 4th, and died at 3 o'clock on the morning of the 7th.

The defendant, Blackwelder, was a mechanic, and worked in one of the mills at Concord, and had mechanic's tools which he kept in his suit case. On the morning following the homicide, defendant's glove and a pair of bolt nippers were found on the ground near the scene of the shooting. The defendant had previously pleaded guilty of carrying a concealed weapon and of larceny in Mecklenburg county, and had been sentenced to the roads for a term of 2 years. He had served about 13 months when he was pardoned. He had been charged with breaking into a store at Mooresville, and had been arrested on another occasion and, it seems, had been released after trial. There was evidence tending to show that the general reputation of the defendant was bad. It had been raining for some time before the shooting took place, and the deceased in his dying declaration said that he noticed when he met Blackwelder and McDaniel that they had very little mud on their shoes, though the road from his house to the scene of the shooting was very muddy.

The state contended that Blackwelder, McDaniel, and Jones had gone in a car from Concord to the residence of the deceased for the purpose of committing larceny of the car which the deceased had locked in his garage; that Jones drove the car and that Blackwelder and McDaniel got out of the car when it stopped in front of the garage, broke the door, and were in the act of taking the car away when they were frightened by the deceased and by the firing of the gun; that the night was dark, and, after their car had left them, they secreted themselves and made their way cautiously in the direction of Concord, traveling as little as possible in the road. The state contended that Blackwelder and McDaniel at the time of the shooting had committed a felony, and that they were affected with notice of the statute which gave the deceased a right to arrest them without warrant.

The defendant contended that he, McDaniel, and Jones had gone from Concord in search of liquor, and that they left their car near the place of the shooting, while Jones went alone for the purpose of getting the liquor, and bringing it to the defendants in the car; that it was their purpose after getting it to return to Concord; that Blackwelder and McDaniel were secreted within a short distance of the road when the two cars referred to passed in the direction of Concord; that neither Blackwelder nor McDaniel knew anything about the other car, had not been in it, had not gone to the residence of the deceased, knew nothing of the attempted larceny of the car owned by the deceased, and that the deceased did not have any reasonable ground for believing that they had broken the garage and attempted to take his car. The defendant further contended that, when the four met in the road, the deceased required Blackwelder and McDaniel to walk in front of the car and to hold up their hands; that the defendant thereupon said, "Please don't shoot me; give me a living chance"; that the deceased immediately thereupon fired his gun, and shot Blackwelder's hand out of his pocket; that Blackwelder then began shooting his pistol with the other hand; that he shot once or twice, started to leave the road, stepped into a ditch, and fell; that the gun was fired directly over him, and as soon as he recovered himself he began shooting again. The defendant contended that he and the deceased were at arms' length; that the deceased had no right to arrest him; and that he shot the deceased, if at all, upon the principle of self-preservation and insisted upon the law of self-defense in his exoneration.

The court admitted evidence tending to show all the occurrences at the residence of the deceased and at the garage, to which the defendants excepted, and the defendant thereafter moved to strike the evidence from the record, and, upon the court's declining the motion, again excepted. The first five exceptions relate to the admission of evidence as to what took place at the residence and at the garage.

The defendant excepted to the court's charge to the jury as set out in the opinion of the court. This is the defendant's sixth exception.

L. T. Hartsell and J. L. Crowell, both of Concord, for appellant.

James M. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ADAMS, J. The state's theory of the case is diametrically opposed to that of the defendant. At the trial the state contended that Blackwelder and McDaniel, in the presence of the deceased, had broken and entered into his garage with intent to steal his car, and were therefore guilty of a felony, for the commission of which the deceased had a legal right to arrest them without a warrant. C. S. §§ 4235, 4543.

The defendant contended that neither he nor McDaniel had gone to the garage of the deceased, and that the deceased, having no authority to make the arrest, fired the first shot, and the defendant acted in self-defense.

The two sections referred to are as follows:

"If any person, with intent to commit a felony or other infamous crime therein, shall break or enter either the dwelling house of another otherwise than by a burglarious breaking; or any storehouse, shop, warehouse, banking house, counting house or other building where any merchandise, chattel, money, valuable security or other personal property shall be; or any uninhabited house, he shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be imprisoned in the state's prison or county jail not less than four months nor more than ten years." C. S. § 4235.

"Every person in whose presence a felony has been committed may arrest the person whom he knows or has reasonable ground to believe to be guilty of such offense, and it shall be the duty of every sheriff, coroner, constable or officer of police, upon information, to assist in such arrest." C. S. § 4543.

[1] When we consider the conflicting theories we cannot escape the conviction that evidence of what occurred at the garage was material, if not absolutely necessary, to a determination of the question whether the defendant had committed a felony under such circumstances as would justify his arrest by the deceased without a warrant. Neither the deceased nor his wife nor his son identified either the defendant or McDaniel at the garage, wherefore, the immediate inquiry is whether the evidence as to what took place there, taken in connection with other evidence, was of such probative force as required its submission to the jury, or whether it was so indefinite and remote as to preclude its consideration.

The defendant's objection to this evidence rests upon the contention that there was not a particle of testimony tending to show that the defendant had gone to the garage, or that he had been seen near the home of the deceased, and that the deceased therefore could not have had any reasonable ground for believing that the defendant had attempted to steal the car.

[2] True, the evidence as to the attempted larceny of the car was circumstantial, but not for that reason incompetent; for, says Starkie, "circumstantial evidence is essential to the well-being at least, if not to the very existence, of civil society." Starkie on Evidence, p. 839. All evidence is direct or indirect. Direct evidence is that which is immediately applied to the fact to be proved, while circumstantial evidence is that which is indirectly applied, by means of circumstances from which the existence of the principal fact may reasonably be deduced or inferred. In other words, as has been said, circumstantial evidence is merely direct evidence indirectly applied.

"In a legal sense, presumptive evidence is not regarded as inferior to direct evidence. The two are parts of one system of means, intended to aid, and not to thwart, each other. Circumstantial evidence is often used as an aid to, and frequently as a test of, direct evidence. It is admissible in both civil and criminal cases in the absence of direct evidence, and is often the only means by which a fact can be proved. This is particularly the case in criminal trials where the act to be proved has been done in secrecy." 1 Jones, Com. on Ev. § 6b(5).

Professor Greenleaf, in drawing the line of distinction between competent and satisfactory evidence, says:

"By competent evidence is meant that which the very nature of the thing to be proved requires, as the fit and appropriate proof in the particular case, such as the production of a writing, where its contents are the subject of inquiry. By satisfactory evidence, which is sometimes called sufficient evidence, is intended that amount of proof which ordinarily satisfies an unprejudiced mind beyond reasonable doubt. The circumstances which will amount to this degree of proof can never be previously defined; the only legal test of which they are susceptible is their sufficiency to satisfy the mind and conscience of a common man, and so to convince him that he would venture to act upon that conviction in matters of the highest concern and importance to his own interest. Questions respecting the competency and admissibility of evidence are entirely distinct from those which respect its sufficiency of effect; the former being exclusively within the province of the court, the latter belonging exclusively to the jury." Greenleaf's Ev. § 2.

In State v. White, 89 N. C. 465, it is said:

"It is well-settled law that the court must decide what is evidence, and whether there is any evidence to be submitted to the jury, pertinent to an issue submitted to them. It is as well settled that, if there is evidence to be submitted, the jury must determine its weight and effect. This, however, does not imply that the court must submit a scintilla—very slight evidence; on the contrary, it must be such as, in the judgment of the court, would reasonably warrant the jury in finding a verdict upon the issue submitted, affirmatively or negatively, accordingly as they might view it in one light or another, and give it more or less weight, or none at all. In a case like the present one, the evidence ought to be such as, if the whole were taken together and substantially as true, the jury might reasonably find the defendant guilty.

"A single isolated fact or circumstance might be no evidence, not even a scintilla; two, three, or more, taken together, might not make evidence in the eye of the law; but a multitude of slight facts and circumstances, taken together as true, might become (make) evidence that would warrant a jury in finding a verdict of guilty in cases of the most serious moment. The court must be the judge as to when such a combination of facts and circumstances reveal the dignity of evidence, and it must judge of the pertinency and relevancy of the facts and circumstances going to make up such evidence. The court cannot, however, decide that they are true or false; this is for the jury; but it must decide that, all together, they make some evidence, to be submitted to the jury; and they must be such, in a case like the present, as would, if the jury believed the same, reasonably warrant them in finding a verdict of guilty. Cobb v. Fogalman, 23 N. C. 440; State v. Vinson, 63 N. C. 335; Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451; State v. Massey, 86 N. C. 658; Imp. Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442; Pleasants v. Fonts, 22 Wall. 120."

There was evidence tending to support each of the theories above referred to. For the prosecution there was evidence tending to show that the defendant left Charlotte and arrived at Concord after 1 o'clock in the morning, and met McDaniel and Jones at the station; that the defendant went to the Hartsell mill, and, after procuring a pistol and cartridges, started about 2 o'clock with McDaniel and Jones in a Ford car toward the residence of the deceased; that about 2 hours later a car passed by the residence and stopped in the road in front of the garage, when the car door was heard to close; that in about three minutes the car returned, passed the house, and stopped 40 or 50 yards beyond; that the garage door was opened, and the deceased, who had gone out to make investigation, called out, "What are you doing there?" and about this time or soon thereafter his son fired a shotgun, which moved the chauffeur to "crank up" and to proceed in the direction of Concord. The evidence tends to show that in a few minutes the deceased and his son took the car from the garage and went in pursuit, but when 2 miles from home desisted, and on their return met the defendant and McDaniel within a mile of the garage; that deceased told the defendant and his companion that he had reason to believe they had broken into the garage; that they claimed to have come from Georgeville, and the defendant gave his name as Smith. There was evidence tending to show that the defendant, who is a mechanic, kept his tools in the house from which he had taken his pistol, and that some time during the next day the defendant's glove and a pair of bolt nippers were found near the scene of the shooting. The defendant admitted that he had previously pleaded guilty of carrying a concealed weapon and of larceny, and, having been sentenced for a term of 2 years, had been pardoned, after serving for a period of 13 months.

Applying to the testimony the law which has been stated, we are of opinion that the evidence relating to the occurrences at the residence and at the garage is not so indefinite or remote as to make it incompetent, and that, the trial judge properly left to the jury the weight of these and other circumstances pertinent to the questions under investigation.

The sixth exception is directed to the following excerpt from the charge of the court:

"The state says and insists that the deceased was acting in compliance with law in attempting or declaring his intention to arrest the defendant and his companion and to take them before the proper officers in the town of Concord or elsewhere where such officers might be found. The state says and insists that you should be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that a felony had been committed; that an attempt had been made to break and enter the garage of the deceased; that not only had the attempt been made, but the breaking had actually been effected and the door opened; and it was the intent of those committing such act to commit the crime of larceny and feloniously take and carry away the car, the property of the deceased; and the state says and insists that this act was committed in the presence of the deceased; that the garage was situated but a short distance from his dwelling; that, hearing the noise, he repaired to the front porch and opened the door, and that there he was enabled to see the bulk of the car, and that the darkness of the night only prevented his distinguishing the forms of those at the door of the garage or retreating therefrom; and the state says that this was in the presence of the deceased, and under such circumstances as the law declares it to be in his presence, and that he was only prevented from actually identifying those at the door and retreating therefrom on account of the darkness of the night; and the court instructs you as a question of law that, if the deceased was only prevented from seeing and distinguishing them and observing their acts by reason of the darkness, if he was in such a place as he could have otherwise seen and distinguished them, and seen their acts, then such acts as were committed in law were committed in the presence of the deceased."

To the foregoing instruction the defendant interposed these objections: (1) The deceased at the time the shooting occurred did not know that a felony had been committed at the garage; (2) if he knew a felony had been committed, he did not know the felony; (3) the felony, if any, was not committed in the presence of the deceased; (4) the court in effect instructed the jury that the deceased was acting in compliance with the law in attempting to arrest the defendant.

[3, 4] As to the first two grounds of exception, the answer is this: The deceased and his son, after the hinge had creaked in turning, went to the garage and found the door open, and afterward met the defendant and McDaniel within a mile of the garage under circumstances found by the jury to be sufficient to create reasonable ground for believing that the defendant and McDaniel had attempted to take the car. The third objection is met by the decision of this court in State v. McAfee, 107 N. C. 812, 12 S. E. 435, 10 L. R. A. 607, in which Justice Avery said:

"We concur with the judge below in the view expressed in his charge, that, if the defendant struck his wife with the stick described by the witness at a point so near to the officer that he could distinctly hear what was said, and the sound made by the blow, it would be considered in law a breach of the peace in his presence, though he could not at the time actually see the former, because it was too dark."

Considering the fourth objection, we cannot concur in the defendant's interpretation of the instruction. A perusal of the charge will show that his honor, in referring to "the defendant and his companion," was stating the contentions of the state, and that in his explanation of the law he applied the word "them" to "those at the door," and not as a necessary legal inference to the defendant and his companion. Finding no error in the record, we hold that all the exceptions must be overruled.

No error.

PEETS v. WRIGHT. (No. 10726.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Oct. 10, 1921.)

1. Wills \S 837—Person succeeding to interest of tenant in common takes interest subject to accounting for rents.

Where tenant in common in possession of property died devising his interest to his wife, she took such interest subject to an accounting due by her deceased husband to the cotenants for rents, taxes, etc., on sale of the premises in partition proceeding.

2. Partition \S 83—Accounting between tenants for rents incident to partition.

Accounting for waste, betterments, and rents among cotenants is an incident to the right of partition.

3. Homestead \S 84 — Partition \S 12(3) — Tenant in common not allowed homestead as against claims of cotenants and their right to partition.

A tenant in common will be allowed his homestead in the common property as against the claims of his creditors, but not as against the claims of his cotenants, so as to defeat their right to partition and an accounting for rents and profits.

4. Limitation of actions \S 53(2)—Statute has no place in accounting between cotenants.

In action between cotenants for an account for rents, the statute of limitations has no place.

Appeal from Common Pleas County Court of Richland County; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Rosina Sterlita Peets by F. J. Chavis, guardian ad litem, against Anna Wright. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Modified and remanded.

The report of the master was as follows:

I, the undersigned master, have to report:

(1) Pursuant to an order of reference heretofore granted by Hon. M. S. Whaley, presiding judge of the county court, dated July 11, 1919, referring the above-entitled cause to J. C. Townsend, master in equity for Richland county, "to take the testimony and report the same with all convenient speed to this court, together with his findings of law and fact thereon, and that he have leave to report any special matter. I held several references herein attended by counsel of record, took the testimony offered which is herewith reported, and therefrom I find and conclude as follows:

(2) I find that Rosina Wright was seized and possessed of certain lots of land described in the complaint, holding the same under deed from Caroline Waters dated February 28, 1887, recorded March 26, 1887, in Deed Book R, at page 202; that some time since and a long time prior to this date said Rosina Wright departed this life intestate, leaving as her only heirs and distributees at law her husband, Sterling Wright, and a daughter by a previous marriage, Julia F. Peets.

(3) That the said Julia F. Peets departed this life on or about July 4, 1909, leaving as her only heirs and distributees at law her husband, A. E. Peets, and one daughter, Rosina Sterlita Peets, the plaintiff herein.

(4) That the said A. E. Peets, husband of Julia F. Peets, departed this life on or about July 5, 1917, leaving as his only heirs at law and distributees his daughter Rosina Sterlita Peets, the plaintiff herein.

(5) That the said Sterling Wright departed this life on or about August 30, 1918, intestate in so far as the testimony shows, leaving as his known heirs at law his wife, Anna Wright, one of the defendants herein.

(6) I find, therefore, that the parties entitled to the distribution of said property as described in the complaint, is the plaintiff, Rosina Sterlita Peets, entitled to two-thirds thereof, and Anna Wright, wife of Sterling Wright, and the other heirs of Sterling Wright, if any, are entitled to the other one-third thereof.

(7) I find that said premises have been in possession of Anna Wright and her predecessors from whom she inherited for and during the term since the death of the said Rosina Wright, to the exclusion of Rosina Sterlita Peets and those from whom she inherited, and that the same is still in the possession of the defendant, Anna Wright.

(8) In this case there was voluminous testimony taken as to an accounting between the parties in interest from the death of Rosina Wright when the property was in the possession of the heirs at law of Rosina Wright, to wit: Sterling Wright and Julia F. Peets, and after the death of Julia F. Peets when the same was in the possession of the said Sterling Wright and Anna Wright and during which time improvements were made on the property by those in possession and for which an accounting should have been had between the administrator, if any, of Julia F. Peets and Sterling Wright, but it appears that none were ever had, and the attempt is now made to set up such an accounting in this action against Anna Wright on behalf and for the interest of Rosina Sterlita Peets, heir at law of Julia Peets, and her father, A. E. Peets. I have therefore eliminated an accounting between these parties in the property from the death of Rosina Wright to the time of the death of Julia Peets, and from whom Rosina Sterlita Peets inherited the same, and from which time only this plaintiff, Rosina Sterlita Peets, has had an interest in said premises and since which time said premises have been occupied, and in the possession of Sterling Wright and his wife, Anna Wright, the defendant herein.

(9) That any and all of such improvements made by Sterling Wright during his occupation and possession of the premises could not now inure to the benefit of Rosina Sterlita Peets, and that an accounting for rents and improvements as between the parties then entitled to the possession of the premises should be deemed and declared to be a balance of accounts.

(10) I herewith submit a statement of the accounts proven between the plaintiff and defendant in this action, to wit, Rosina Sterlita Peets, plaintiff, and Anna Wright, defendant:

(11) I find that the defendant, Anna Wright, is entitled to a credit for the taxes, repairs, and insurance paid on said premises, and that the plaintiff, Rosina Sterlita Peets, is entitled to the repayment of taxes paid by her and for two-thirds of the value of a reasonable rent for said premises from the time of the death of her mother, Julia F. Peets, to wit, July 4, 1909, to the date of this report, to wit, September 10, 1920.

(12) The following is a statement of the account between the parties plaintiff and defendant herein as best same can be determined from the evidence produced: The following is a statement of accounts Anna Wright is entitled to credit:

Taxes, city:	1909	$ 5 10
	1910	6 10
	1911	6 40
	1912	6 40
	1913	6 80
	1914	6 60
	1915	7 20
	1916	8 83
	1918	12 00
		<hr/> $ 65 42
Taxes, county:	1915, February	$ 7 20
	1915, December	7 20
	1917, January	13 88
	1917, December	7 92
	1918, December	7 20
	1919, March	8 24
		<hr/> $ 51 62
Repairs, 1916:	Toilet	$ 9 00
	Wire fence	14 25
	Wire	4 50
	Labor on toilet	9 20
	Labor on wire fence	2 40
		<hr/> $ 39 40
Insurance:	1917, Miller	$ 8 00
	1916, Miller	8 00
	1920, Bollin	12 00
	1918, Bollin	17 60
		<hr/> $ 45 60
		<hr/> $202 05

The following is a statement of accounts to which Rosina Sterlita Peets is entitled to credit:

Taxes, city, 1917	$ 10 30
Rents, July 4, 1909, to September 10, 1920, 134.2 months, at $15 per month, $2,003, two- thirds to Rosina Sterlita Peets	1,335 23
	<hr/> $1,345 63
Less credits Anna Wright	202 05
Balance due plaintiff	<hr/> $1,142 58

(13) Testimony was introduced giving various amounts as to the rental value of the premises from the year 1909 to the present date, ranging from a valuation of twelve ($12.00) dollars per month to twenty-two ($22.00) dollars per month. I have therefore struck an average, and am allowing a rental of $15 a month which I find to be a fair average, taking into consideration that the smaller valuation was made for a longer length of time than the larger valuation as shown by the testimony, and have given credit to Rosina Sterlita Peets for two-thirds of said amount, which I find to be reasonable to be allowed in adjusting the accounts between the parties to this action.

(14) That after giving credit for the amount of expenditures by the defendant, Anna Wright, and allowing credits to Rosina Sterlita Peets, I find that there is a balance due the plaintiff in this action of $1,142.58.

(15) I further find that the plaintiff, Rosina

Sterlita Peets, is entitled to judgment against the defendant, Anna Wright, in the sum of $1,142.58, same being the balance due according to the foregoing statement on account of the tenancy and occupancy by the defendant, Anna Wright, in and to said premises for and during the time covered by the foregoing statement.

(16) The property being impracticable of division in case of settlement, I would recommend that the premises be ordered sold, and the proceeds arising from the sale of said premises, after the payment of the costs and disbursements of this action, be distributed to those thereunto entitled to the interest of the parties as set forth in the foregoing report.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The decree of the trial judge was as follows:

This matter comes before me on exceptions by both parties to the report of J. C. Townsend, master. The facts will be found in said report.

Exception No. 1 of the defendant pertains to what was evidently an oversight on the part of the master as to a finding of fact, which fact can have no particular bearing on the issues.

Exception 3, subdivision (a), (b), and (c) of the defendant, is the only one meriting serious consideration. If rent accrued prior to Sterling Wright's death in 1918, the respective representatives of the several decedents would be liable and not the defendant, Anna Wright. Huff v. Latimer, 33 S. C. 259, 11 S. E. 758.

But the defendant is bound by the order of this court wherein I refused to make the personal representative of Sterling Wright a party, and allowed the defendant to set up a claim for any improvements made by Sterling Wright during his exclusive use of the premises. Under that order, from which there was no appeal, rents and improvements were to be considered by the master during the period of Sterling Wright's exclusive possession, from July 4, 1909, to August 30, 1918. However, as to any rent prior to that under Huff v. Latimer, supra, there could be no accounting; and, even if there were, a balance, as the master found, would have to be struck between the improvements and such rent for that period. The testimony is very vague as to when the house was remodeled, but it was safe to conclude that same was done prior to 1909.

The master's report, considering the uncertainties arising from the testimony, and except for the error of fact noted in exception 1, correctly finds on all of the issues.

Another matter which was heard before me at the same time as the above appeal came up on the petition of the defendant to have a homestead set aside out of the proceeds of the sale before any part of such proceeds are applied to the payment of the rents due by her to the plaintiff.

In their verbal return in open court the plaintiff's attorneys stated that they did not contest this right to homestead, but that such right was prematurely asserted, in that defendant was only entitled to claim a homestead in the amount found to be her distributive share after an accounting. So much is true. Small v. Usher, 77 S. C. 115, 57 S. E. 623. But the court can ascertain whether she is entitled to $1,000 homestead exemption, not in the undivided interest, but in the proceeds of her interest after division, and to the extent of such interest, not over $1,000, allow her to retain so much of the rent money as will offset the value of her one-third interest, which value will be determined at the sale.

It is therefore ordered: First, that the master's report be, and the same is hereby, confirmed; second, that the defendant, Anna Wright, be allowed to retain as homestead out of the rent money due by her to plaintiff so much as her one-third interest may bring at the sale, not exceeding the sum of $1,000.

Plaintiff's exceptions were as follows:

Exception 1: "Because the one-third interest in the premises owned by the heirs of Sterling Wright is chargeable with one-third of the cost of taxes, insurance, and repairs upon the property, and his honor erred in crediting the said interest with the full amount thereof." This proposition is too obvious to admit of argument. We therefore merely invite the court's attention to the master's report (Case, pages 17 and 18, folios 67-71), where it will appear that the full amount paid out for these purposes by Anna Wright or Sterling Wright is $202.05, for which she is given credit, instead of for $134.70, the two-thirds thereof chargeable to the other interest. That this was an oversight on the part of the master may be inferred from the fact that he credited plaintiff with the two-thirds of the rent only to which she is entitled.

Exception 2: "Because his honor erred in holding that the defendants are entitled to receive one-third of the proceeds from the sale of the premises, whereas he should have held that the defendants are entitled to receive only so much of the one-third of the proceeds as remains after adjustment of the equities in accordance with the findings upon the accounting." In the view that we take of this matter, a partition suit is a quasi proceeding in rem, in which the ultimate interest of each of the several parties in the common property is established; the parties being required to account that the court may determine from such accounting, if, and to what extent, the interests of any party or parties is increased by his or their additions to the value of the property, or by payments for the necessary expenses of maintaining it, or diminished by depredations to the property, by failure to share in the common burdens, or by use, or rents or profits received, in excess of his share. This being ascertained, the province of equity is to conform the original interest of the cotenant to the ultimate interest remaining to him as revealed by the accounting.

This view seems in harmony with the decisions of this court in Nance v. Hill, 26 S. C. 227, 1 S. E. 897, as expounded by this court in the recent case of Tedder v. Tedder, 104 S. E. 318, where the court say: "The right of partition, which includes the right to such accounting, is paramount to the occupying cotenant's claim of homestead in the common property, because, as between cotenants, the ultimate interest and right of each in and to the common property depends upon an adjustment of the equities between him and his cotenants." (Italics ours.) It seems also to harmonize with the decisions in Small v. Usher, 77 S. C. 112, 57 S. E. 623, and Vaughan v. Langford, 81 S. C. 282, 62 S. E. 316, 128 Am. St. Rep. 912, 16 Ann. Cas. 91. However, whatever the theory upon which the court has moved in reaching its conclusions, it is manifest, from the decisions of this court, that, when the rights of third parties are not involved, a cotenant ought not to be allowed to have his share of the proceeds of sale, without first accounting for * * * the rents and profits derived by him therefrom." Vaughan v. Langford, 81 S. C. 288, 62 S. E. 318, 128 Am. St. Rep. 912, 16 Ann. Cas. 91. To the same effect is Small v. Usher, where the court say: "The defendant was not entitled to a distributive share until she accounted for that part of the estate which she has converted to her own use." Small v. Usher, 77 S. C. 115, 57 S. E. 625. And to the same effect is Wilson v. Kelly, 16 S. C. 218.

Exception 3: "Because his honor erred in holding that a claim of homestead by a cotenant arrests the court of equity in the adjustment of the equities among the cotenants in the common property and compels it to pay over the proceeds of the legal interest of such cotenant in the property, whereas he should have held that the homestead exemption reaches only such portion as remains to the cotenant after adjustment of the equities." It seems to us from this order that the county judge falls into error in not regarding the accounting as an essential part of the partition suit, which must take place before partition—or, what is the same thing, division of the proceeds—may be made, and that the partition or division must be made in accordance with the findings upon the accounting. The relief sought is not merely a partition of the property, but also payment of what is due.

The master's report found that the plaintiff is entitled to collect $1,142.58 from the other interest and so recommended. (Case, page 19, folios 74-75.) This, then, the county judge, in confirming the master's report, has himself decreed, and the payment of the $1,142.58 is as much a part of the relief granted by the decree as the order of sale. The only difference that I can discover in the question at issue in this case and the case of Edwards v. Edwards, 14 S. C. 18, is that in that case the decree was made by another judge, and in this case that the judge who decreed the relief undertakes to take it away. "An assertion of homestead right on the part of the defendant would tend to defeat in part the relief intended by the decree of Judge Orr, and cannot be allowed." Edwards v. Edwards, 14 S. C. 20. Most certainly the effect would be the same in this case, and should not be allowed.

This court say: "But, as among the parties themselves, the court in decreeing partition has the power, in doing full justice in the premises, to adjust all demands for rent, and require the amount found due to be settled from the share of the proceeds of the sale of the property coming to the cotenant owing the rent. This rule is just and in accord with the principle that, when all the parties and the property are before the court of equity, it will do full justice to all before releasing its hold." Vaughan v. Langford, 81 S. C. 289, 62 S. E. 316, 128 Am. St. Rep. 912, 16 Ann. Cas. 91. The partition suit is not ended by the decree that declares the rights of the several parties but by the carrying into effect of its provisions, and until that is done the entire fund is in the custody of the court and free from all other claims or demands against it. "She could only claim a homestead in the amount found to be her distributive share after the accounting." Small v. Usher, 77 S. C. 115, 57 S. E. 623.

If, however, there could be room for any question of the rule—and this court is of the opinion that there is not—all question is now removed by a decision of the precise point at issue in this case; the court saying: "A tenant in common will be allowed his homestead in the common property as against the claims of his creditors, but not as against the claims of his cotenants, so as to defeat their right to partition, or an accounting for rents and profits received by him." Tedder v. Tedder, 104 S. E. 320. We therefore submit that the decree should be reversed upon each of the grounds hereinabove set forth.

Defendant's exceptions were as follows:

(1) The defendant, Anna Wright, excepting to the order of his honor, the county judge, alleges that he erred in holding and finding as follows: "Exception No. 1 of the defendant pertains to what was evidently an oversight as to a finding of fact, which fact can have no particular bearing on the issues." Whereas he should have held, as pointed out by the defendant's first exception to the master's report, that inasmuch as Sterling Wright left of full force and effect his last will and testament, by which the testator devised his interest in the premises in question to the defendant, Anna Wright, one-third of the premises in question were vested in the defendant, Anna Wright, to the exclusion of other heirs at law of Sterling Wright.

(2) Because his honor erred in holding as follows: "But the defendant is bound by the order of this court wherein I refused to make the personal representative of Sterling Wright a party and allowed the defendant to set up a claim for any improvements made by Sterling Wright during his exclusive use of the premises. Under that order, from which there was no appeal, rents and improvements were to be considered by the master during the period of Sterling Wright's exclusive possession, from July 4, 1909, to August 30, 1918. However, as to any rent prior to that under Huff v. Latimer, supra, there could be no accounting, and even if there were, the balance, as the master found, would have to be struck between the improvements and such rent for that period. The testimony is very vague as to when the house was remodeled, but it was safe to conclude the same was done prior to 1909"—the error in the foregoing extract being in his honor's holding that because the court had, by a previous order, refused to make the personal representative of Sterling Wright a party defendant to the action, and had allowed the defendant to set up a claim for any improvements made by Sterling Wright during his exclusive use of the premises, the defendant was precluded from denying liability for two-thirds of the rental value of the premises since the death of Julia Peets, mother of the plaintiff.

(3) Because his honor erred in construing his order of July 29, 1919, as holding the defendant, Anna Wright, liable for two-thirds of the rental value of the premises in question, and in holding said order as res adjudicata of the question raised by the defendant's third exception to the master's report, when he should have held that the order of July 29, 1919, merely adjudicated that it was not necessary to have Sterling Wright's personal representative made a party to the action, and, in this connection, his honor should have held that the plaintiff's failure to appeal from the said order of July 29, 1919, precluded her from obtaining judgment for said rents and profits against the personal representative of Sterling Wright, and also against the defendant, Anna Wright, individually.

(4) Because his honor erred in overruling the defendant's third exception to the master's report, which was as follows: "(3) Because the master erred in rendering judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,142.58, when said judgment should have been for only $518, on the accounting between the parties, if for anything"—and in sustaining the master's report, when he should have held that the defendant, Anna Wright, was liable only for the rental value of the premises since the death of her husband, Sterling Wright, which took place on the 30th of August, 1918, as shown by the master's report.

T. St. Mark Sasportas, of Charleston, and Butler W. Nance, of Columbia, for plaintiff.
James S. Verner, of Columbia, for defendant.

COTHRAN, J. Action for partition of a lot in the city of Columbia, involving questions of accountability for rents, betterments, taxes, and homestead. The lot belonged to Rosina Wright, who died at an unstated time prior to 1903, intestate. Her heirs at law were a husband, Sterling Wright, and a daughter, Julia Peets. The daughter died in 1909, intestate. Her heirs were her husband, A. E. Peets, and a daughter, the plaintiff, Rosina Peets. A. E. Peets died in 1917, leaving a will naming his daughter, Rosina, his sole devisee.

Upon the death of Rosina Wright, her title descended, one-third to her husband, Sterling Wright, and two-thirds to her daughter, Julia Peets. Upon the death of Julia Peets, her two-thirds interest vested in her husband, A. E. Peets, one-third of said two-thirds, two-ninths, and in her daughter, Rosina Peets, two-thirds of said two-thirds, four-ninths. Upon the death of A. E. Peets, his two-ninths interest vested under his will in his daughter, Rosina Peets, so that she became seized of the original two-thirds interest of her mother, Julia Peets. Sterling Wright, husband of Rosina Wright, who inherited one-third interest in the lot, went into exclusive possession of it in 1903, and married the defendant, Anna Wright. He died in 1918, leaving a will by which he devised his one-third interest to Anna Wright, his second wife. At that time the plaintiff, Rosina Peets, and the defendant, Anna Wright, became tenants in common, owning respectively two-thirds and one-third interests,

The rental value of the premises has been fixed by the master and by the trial judge at $15 per month. The master adopted as the initial date of the accounting July 4, 1909, that being the date of the death of Julia Peets, mother of the plaintiff, deciding that the claim for rent prior to that date against Sterling Wright should be offset against improvements, betterments, and taxes paid out by him. To this action all parties appear to have consented.

The rental value for which Sterling Wright was accountable, from July 4, 1909, to the date of his death, August 30, 1918, is two-thirds of $1,648, $1,098.66; Anna Wright, from August 30, 1918, to September 10, 1920 (date of master's report) two-thirds of $365, $243.34—total, $1,342. (Error of $6.67 in the master's calculation.)

Anna Wright was allowed credit for city taxes, state and county taxes, repairs and insurance paid by both Sterling Wright and herself, between July 4, 1909, and September 10, 1920, amounting to $202.05 and Rosina Peets for $10.30 taxes. In stating the account, the master allowed Anna Wright credit for the whole sum of $205.05, whereas he should have allowed her credit for only two-thirds of that sum, $136.70. A proper statement of the account upon the basis adopted by the master would therefore be:

Rents accountable by—
Sterling Wright	$1,098 66
Anna Wright	243 34
	<hr/> $1,342 00
Less two-thirds of taxes, repairs, etc.	$136 70
Less one-third of taxes paid by Rosina Peets	3 43
	<hr/> $1,208 73

The defendant Anna Wright objects to being held accountable for this item of $1,098.66, for which Sterling Wright was accountable.

[1, 2] If Sterling Wright were alive and a party to this suit, and it appeared that he was personally accountable to his cotenant for $1,098.66, his proportion of the rental value of the premises while he had been in possession, it would unquestionably be held that in the division of the proceeds of sale he must account therefor. As it is, Sterling Wright is dead, and Anna Wright has succeeded to his interest. If the devolution of his interest upon her cannot confer a greater interest than he had, and if his interest would have been subject to this accounting, it is difficult to see why her interest would not be also.

"Accounting for waste, for betterments, and for rents among cotenants is now recognized as an incident to the right of partition, and the universal practice for the court of equity is to adjust all these matters in the suit for partition." Vaughan v. Langford, 81 S. C. 282, 288, 62 S. E. 316, 318 (128 Am. St. Rep. 912, 16 Ann. Cas. 91).

[3] The defendant's claim to a homestead is concluded by the decision of this court in the case of Tedder v. Tedder, 115 S. C. 145, 104 S. E. 318, where it is said:

"A tenant in common will be allowed his homestead in the common property as against the claims of his creditors, but not as against the claims of his cotenants, so as to defeat their right to partition, or an accounting for rents and profits received by him."

[4] Some suggestion is made in the argument of defendant's counsel in reference to the statute of limitations against the accountability for rental value. No such question was raised before either the master or trial judge, and will not be considered here, other than to say that the case of Vaughan v. Langford, 81 S. C. 282, 286, 62 S. E. 316, 128 Am. St. Rep. 912, 16 Ann. Cas. 91, declares that the statute has no place in such an accounting.

Let the report of the master, the decree of the trial judge, and the exceptions be reported.

The case will be remanded to the county court of Richland county, with directions to formulate a decree of partition and sale providing: (1) That from the proceeds of sale there shall be first paid the costs and expenses of this action in the lower court and on the sale; (2) that two-thirds of the remaining net proceeds of sale be paid to the plaintiff or her attorneys; (3) that out of the one-third remaining the plaintiff's costs and disbursements of the Supreme Court be first paid; (4) that from the remainder of said one-third, there shall be paid to the plaintiff or her attorneys the sum of $1,208.73, with interest at 7 per cent. from September 10, 1920, together with $10 per month, two-thirds of the rental value of the premises, from September 10, 1920, to day of sale; (5) that the remainder of said one-third be paid to the defendant or her attorney.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the county court be modified as herein indicated, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further orders as may be necessary to carry into effect the conclusions herein announced.

JETT v. HART. (No. 2449.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence \S 341, 345(1)—Certified copies of tax returns admissible; not inadmissible because certified by tax receiver instead of collector.

Material portions of certified copies of tax returns of the defendant in ejectment, as to the number of acres of land given in by him, and the value thereof for certain years, were allowed in evidence over objection that the copies were certified to by the tax receiver, and not by the tax collector; that the original returns were of file in the office of the collector, and not in the office of the receiver; and that the original returns themselves, and not certified copies of the returns, would be admissible. It was not error, as against these objections, to allow the certified copies of the returns in evidence. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5798, 1194, 4882; Ponder v. Shumans, 80 Ga. 505(2), 5 S. E. 502.

(a) Under Civil Code 1910, §§ 1093, 1094, 1096, 1197, relative to the duties of the receiver of tax returns, the tax receiver of each county is required to receive all returns and make three digests of the tax returns as provided therein; one copy of the digest is to be forwarded to the comptroller general, one filed in the office of the ordinary of the county, and one delivered to the tax collector; but the certified copy offered in evidence in the present case is the copy of the return of the taxpayer, and not a copy of the digest which is required to be filed in the office of the tax collector.

2. Pleading \S 291(4)—Deed admissible without preliminary proof when affidavit of forgery not filed.

Where, on the trial of an ejectment suit, a deed from the defendant to the plaintiff to the land in controversy, duly recorded, was offered in evidence by the plaintiff, and no affidavit of forgery was filed, it was prima facie admissible in evidence, and the burden of disproving the genuineness of the deed rested upon the party against whom the deed was admitted. Civil Code 1910, § 4210; Haithcock v. Sargent, 145 Ga. 84(2), 88 S. E. 550; Powell's Actions for Land, 254, § 205. Consequently, in such circumstances, it was not error for the judge to charge the jury: "The defendant in this case contends that he never made any deed to this land to Dr. Hart. I charge you that a deed has been introduced from the defendant, Titus Jett, to Dr. C. C. Hart, and that the burden rests upon the defendant of proving that he did not execute the deed."

3. Appeal and error \S 1078(6)—Point not argued deemed abandoned.

The third ground of the motion for new trial is not argued, and will be considered as abandoned.

4. Sufficiency of evidence.

The evidence authorized the verdict, including the amount found as mesne profits.

Witnesses \S 11, 24—Nonresident not entitled to fee unless subpoena signed by both clerk and solicitor.

Unless at the time a subpoena for a non-resident witness for the state in a criminal case is issued it is signed both by the clerk of the superior court and the solicitor general of the circuit, it is void; and, though such witness may attend thereon, he is not entitled to compensation under the provisions of section 1143 of the Penal Code of 1910.

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; Malcolm D. Jones, Judge.

Mandamus by J. R. Monroe against A. M. Anderson, Treasurer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant brings cross-bill of exceptions. Affirmed on the main bill, and cross-bill dismissed.

Duncan & Nunn, of Perry, for plaintiff in error.

C. E. Brunson, of Perry, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. This was a petition for mandamus against a county treasurer to compel the latter to pay the witness fees of nonresident witnesses for the state. A mandamus nisi was issued; but upon the hearing the judge refused to make the rule absolute, upon the ground that the subpoenas had not been signed by the solicitor general of the circuit before the issuance of the same.

The ruling stated in the headnote is taken from the decision in the case of Harris v. Early County, 96 Ga. 186, 22 S. E. 704, and controls the case here adversely to the contentions of the plaintiff in error. We have been asked to review and reverse that decision.

but we decline to do so. It seems to have made a proper application of the statute upon which it was based. And, moreover, the decision has been the rule upon questions like that presented here for more than 25 years. The Legislature has power to change the rule, but has permitted it to stand, thereby fixing the policy of the state upon the question here involved.

Judgment affirmed on the main bill of exceptions. Cross-bill dismissed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., absent because of sickness.

AVERA et al. v. CLYATT et al., Com'rs.
(No. 2635.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Injunction \Leftrightarrow 137(1)—Against payment of salary of farm demonstrator properly refused, where county board had not employed and did not intend to employ demonstrator.

Under the pleadings and the evidence the judge did not err in refusing an interlocutory injunction.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Counties \Leftrightarrow 160—Balance of specific fund after payment of all claims becomes general, and may be used to pay any legitimate liability.

While public funds of the county raised by taxation for specific purposes cannot be used for other purposes, when there remains a surplus after all proper demands and indebtedness have been paid or deducted, it becomes a general fund, and may be lawfully applied to any legitimate liability of the county.

3. Counties \Leftrightarrow 192—Act authorizing use of funds for tick eradication not invalid under constitutional prohibition of levy of taxes except for specified purposes, including "necessary sanitation."

Acts 1909, p. 131, as amended by Acts 1918, p. 256, authorizing the use of county funds to aid in the work of eradication of cattle ticks and the suppression of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, does not violate Const. art. 7, § 6, par. 2, prohibiting the levying of taxes by counties except for the purposes therein specified, including "necessary sanitation."

4. Counties \Leftrightarrow 192—Provision of Constitution authorizing tax for purposes of sanitation not eliminated by amendment.

The provision of Const. art. 7, § 6, par. 2, permitting the levying of taxes by counties for "necessary sanitation," was not eliminated by the amendment proposed by Act Aug. 4, 1910 (Laws 1910, p. 45), amending the provision relative to education.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; R. G. Dickerson, Judge.

Suit by B. F. Avera and others against W. H. Clyatt and others, Commissioners. An interlocutory injunction was refused, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Jno. P. & Dewey Knight, of Nashville, for plaintiffs in error.

W. D. Buie, of Nashville, R. A. Denny, Atty. Gen., and Graham Wright, Asst. Atty. Gen., for defendants in error.

GEORGE, J. On March 16, 1921, B. F. Avera and others, citizens and taxpayers of Berrien county, filed a petition in equity against the members of the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of the county of Berrien, alleging that the defendants were proceeding to expend public funds of the county, raised by taxation for the purposes provided by law, in putting into effect in the county of Berrien the law embodied in an act approved August 16, 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 131), known as "An act to protect the live stock of Georgia from all contagious or infectious diseases," and the amendatory act of 1918 (Acts 1918, p. 256), making it mandatory upon the county authorities to institute and carry on cattle dipping in the counties of this state; that the defendants have expended and propose to expend large sums of money in constructing vats, employing inspectors, and in putting into operation other means to carrying into effect the provisions of the acts referred to; that the expenditures contemplated are without authority in law; and that so much of the act of August 16, 1909, as attempts to authorize the application of public funds to the purposes stated is unconstitutional and void, in that it allows the application of public funds raised by taxation to a purpose not within the purview of that portion of the Constitution contained in article 7, § 6, par. 2, of the Constitution, enumerating the purposes for which taxation by a county may be authorized. Incidentally the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had employed a farm demonstrator for Berrien county, and proposed to pay the salary of such demonstrator out of the public funds of the county. The plaintiffs prayed that the defendants be enjoined from applying the public funds of the county to the work of tick eradication in the county, especially funds raised during the previous years for specific county purposes and not used for such purposes; and that the defendants be also enjoined from paying out of the county funds the salary of the farm demonstrator.

In the answer to the petition, filed by the defendants, it was admitted that the commissioners were expending the money of the county in the work of tick eradication; and upon this phase of the case in the pleadings and in the evidence submitted at the interlocutory hearing there is no issue of fact.

It was averred, however, that the work of tick eradication had been begun by the commissioners of roads and revenues in office in the year 1920, and that the defendants were merely carrying on the work begun by their predecessors in office. The employment by the defendants of a farm demonstrator was denied. It was admitted that one month's salary of the farm demonstrator employed by the defendants' predecessors in office had been paid by the defendants after they assumed control of the county's affairs, but that the payment had been made before the filing of the petition. The defendants averred that they did not intend to employ a farm demonstrator for the year 1921. The evidence submitted at the interlocutory hearing disclosed that the defendants had not employed a farm demonstrator for the year 1921, and did not intend to employ such agent. No evidence to the contrary was submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs. Upon the interlocutory hearing the court refused the injunction, and the plaintiffs excepted.

[1] The court found that the defendants had not employed a farm demonstrator for the year 1921, and did not intend to employ such demonstrator. He further found that the defendants had paid one month's salary to the county demonstrator employed by the defendants' predecessors in office for the year 1920, but that this month's salary had been paid before the petition for injunction was filed, as alleged by the defendants. Upon this phase of the case the court denied the injunction, for the specific reasons stated. The judgment refusing the injunction is clearly in accord with the decisions of this court. See Thornton v. Skelton, 149 Ga. 93, 99 S. E. 299.

[2] While it is true that public funds of the county raised by taxation for specific purposes cannot be used for other purposes, in Butts County v. Jackson Banking Co., 136 Ga. 719 (4), 71 S. E. 1065, it was ruled:

"When, out of a fund raised by taxation for a specific purpose, all demands and indebtedness properly chargeable against that particular fund have been paid or deducted, and there remains a surplus from such fund in the hands of the treasurer, the same then becomes a general fund which may be lawfully applied to the payment of balances due on warrants drawn against other specific funds not sufficient for their payment, or to any other legitimate liability against the county"—citing Tate v. City of Elberton, 136 Ga. 301, 71 S. E. 420; Field v. Stroube, 103 Ky. 114, 44 S. W. 363, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1751; 11 Cyc. 510.

[3, 4] In Townsend v. Smith, 144 Ga. 792, 87 S. E. 1039, this court had under consideration the identical constitutional objection raised in the present case. It was there held:

"The provision of the Constitution of Georgia inhibiting the delegation by the Legislature to any county of the right to levy a tax for any purpose except for those specified in article 7, § 6, par. 2, among which purposes is that of providing for sanitation, is not offended by any act authorizing the appropriation of funds for carrying on and aiding in the work of the eradication of cattle ticks and the suppression of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock. The expression 'provide for necessary sanitation' is sufficiently comprehensive to authorize the raising and the expenditure of money for the purposes within the purview of the statute referred to."

Also:

"The words 'to pay the county police, and to provide for necessary sanitation,' were not stricken from article 7, § 6, par. 2, of the Constitution (Civ. Code, § 6562), by the amendment proposed by the act of August 4, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 45). The only change made in this paragraph of the Constitution was the elimination of the words 'in instructing children in the elementary branches of an English education only.'"

It follows therefore that the judge did not err in refusing the injunction.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., absent because of sickness.

McDONALD v. STATE. (No. 2377.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Highways 166—Indictment and Information 108—Statutes 5—Provisions of act passed at extra session relative to motor vehicles held void as not within Governor's proclamation; indictment good, though act on which passed invalid when supported by another statute; statute not repealed by similar unconstitutional provision of later law.

Sections 9 and 15 of the act of 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 107), and certain portions of section 10 of the same act, all copied in the first division of this opinion, are violative of article 5, § 1, par. 13, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that "no law shall be enacted at a called session of the General Assembly except such as shall relate to the object stated in his [the Governor's] proclamation convening them," because the act above referred to was passed at an extraordinary session of the Legislature, and the proclamation issued by the Governor convoking the Legislature into extraordinary session did not comprehend the matter to which the above-mentioned provisions of the act of 1915 related; and consequently the Legislature at such extraordinary session was without authority to pass any law dealing with such matters.

(a) The judge erred in overruling the demurrers to certain counts in the indictment, which were based in part on violation of the above provisions of the act of 1915.

(b) The seventh count was sufficient, notwithstanding unconstitutionality of the act above referred to, because it conformed to the provision of section 9 of the act of 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 90), referring to the same subject-matter, which was not repealed by the unconstitutional provisions of the act of 1915, supra.

2. Criminal law §824(3)—Evidence held to require instruction as to manslaughter in commission of lawful act without due caution.

Applying the evidence to the allegations of other counts in the indictment, it was erroneous for the judge to omit to charge the jury, without request, the law relating to the crime of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Indictment and Information §142—Further proceedings nugatory when demurrers to counts erroneously overruled.

Error in overruling a demurrer to insufficient counts of an indictment rendered all further action by the court under such counts nugatory.

4. Criminal law §304(12)—Judicial notice not taken of municipal ordinances.

The court will not take judicial cognizance of a municipal ordinance.

George, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; John D. Humphries, Judge.

Frank McDonald was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and he brings error. Reversed.

J. O. Ewing, John Y. Smith, and Branch & Howard, all of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

John A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., and E. A. Stephens, both of Atlanta, for the State.

ATKINSON, J. Frank McDonald was charged under seven counts in an indictment for the murder of Mrs. Carabel Smith, by driving an automobile against her, inflicting certain wounds from which she died. A demurrer to counts 3, 5, 6, and 7 having been overruled, the defendant excepted pendente lite. At the trial count 2 was withdrawn, and a verdict was rendered finding "the defendant guilty on counts 1, 3, 4, and 6 of involuntary manslaughter." The defendant made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. The bill of exceptions also assigned error on the exceptions pendente lite.

[1] 1. In each of the counts 3, 5, 6, and 7 it was charged that the crime of murder was committed while the defendant was engaged in an unlawful act. The unlawful act alleged in count 3 was a violation of the first paragraph of section 10 of the act of 1915

(Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, pp. 107, 112), which provides that—

"No person shall operate a motor vehicle or motorcycle upon any public street or highway at a speed greater than is reasonable and safe, not to exceed a speed of 30 miles per hour, having due regard for the width, grade, character, traffic and common use of such street or highway; or so as to endanger life, limb or property in any respect whatever."

The unlawful act alleged in count 5 was a violation of section 9 of the act of 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 111), which provides:

"Every motor vehicle and motorcycle, while in use or operation upon the streets or highways of this state, shall at all times be provided and equipped with efficient and serviceable brakes, and with a signaling device, consisting of a horn, bell, or some other suitable device. It shall likewise be equipped with at least two front lamps, throwing strong, white lights to a reasonable distance in the direction in which such vehicle is proceeding, a rear lamp showing a red light plainly visible in the reverse direction to which said vehicle is proceeding, and such other light so reflected as to clearly reveal the figures on the number plate; provided, that a motorcycle shall be required to be equipped with one front light only. All of such lamps or lights shall at all times be kept burning while such vehicle is in use or operation or standing in a public street or highway during the period from one hour after sunset until one hour before sunrise."

The unlawful act alleged in count 6 was a violation of the last paragraph of section 10 of the act of 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 113), which provides that—

"No person operating a motor vehicle or motorcycle upon a public street or highway in this state shall drive the same past any street car, interurban or other passenger train, in said street or highway, while the same is standing still for the purpose of taking on or letting off passengers to or from such car or train."

The unlawful act alleged in count 7 was a violation of section 15 of the act of 1915 (Acts Ex. Sess. 1915, p. 115), which provides that—

"No person shall operate a motor vehicle or motorcycle upon any public street or highway, whether as owner or operator of such vehicle, if under sixteen years of age, or while under the influence of intoxicating liquors or drugs; and no person shall take, use or operate any motor vehicle or motorcycle upon the public streets and highways, without the permission of the owner thereof."

In the demurrers to the several counts above mentioned, each of the above provisions of the act of 1915 was attacked as violative of article 5, § 1, par. 13, of the Constitution of the state (Civil Code, § 6482), which provides that "no law shall be enacted at a called session of the General Assembly except such as shall relate to the object stated in his [the Governor's] proclamation convening them," on the ground that the act of 1915 was passed at an extraordinary session of the Legislature, and the proclamation issued by the Governor convoking the Legislature into extraordinary session did not comprehend legislation on the subjects to which the above-mentioned provisions of the act relate. After the decision by the trial court overruling the demurrer, this court, in the case of Jones v. State, 151 Ga. 502, 107 S. E. 765, rendered the following decision:

"The accused was indicted for involuntary manslaughter in the killing of a named person without any intention to do so, but in the commission of an unlawful act which, in its consequences, naturally tended to destroy the life of a human being. There were two counts in the indictment. In the first, the unlawful act charged as being committed by the accused when the homicide occurred was the driving of an automobile by him over a public highway at a speed exceeding 30 miles an hour; and, in the second, that he was under the influence of intoxicating liquors while driving the automobile at the time of the homicide. Held:

"1. So much of the act of the General Assembly passed at the called session of 1915 (Laws 1915, Ex. Sess., p. 107) as (in section 10) declares it to be unlawful for any person to operate a motor vehicle upon any public street or highway at a speed exceeding 30 miles per hour, and as (in section 15) declares it to be unlawful for any person to operate a motor vehicle upon any public street or highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquors or drugs, is unconstitutional and void, for the reason that the Constitution (article 5, § 1, par. 13 [Civ. Code 1910, § 6482]), declares that 'no law shall be enacted at a called session of the General Assembly, except such as shall relate to the object stated in his [the Governor's] proclamation convening them,' and such designated portions of the act above referred to do not relate to any object stated in his proclamation calling the special session, the only reference to motor vehicles in the proclamation being as to amending the automobile license tax laws of the state, so as to secure the collection and disposition of the same.

"(a) The approval of the act by the Governor did not make it valid.

"(b) The ruling here made is not in conflict with anything decided in Dorsey v. Wright, 150 Ga. 821, 103 S. E. 591, and Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 69 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 20.

"(c) The first count in the indictment being based solely on that part of section 10 of the act of 1915 held to be void, the demurrer to it should have been sustained.

"2. The second count of the indictment may stand upon section 9 of the act of 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 90), making it a misdemeanor for one to operate an automobile over the public streets or roads while intoxicated, which act was not repealed by the unconstitutional provision of section 15 of the act of 1915. However, as the state introduced no evidence tending to support this count, the court should have granted a new trial as to it, for that reason."

This decision is applicable to the several provisions of the act of 1915 above set forth, upon which counts 3, 5, 6, and 7 were based. Those provisions of the act being unconstitutional, it was erroneous to overrule the demurrer to counts 3, 5, and 6. Count 7 was sufficient under section 9 of the act of 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 90), which provides:

"It shall be unlawful for any person who is intoxicated or under the age of sixteen years at the time, unless such minor shall have previously had twelve months' experience in the operation of automobiles and is accompanied by the owner of the machine at the time, to propel or operate a machine on any of the highways described in this act, of this state. No person shall operate an automobile without the consent and by authority of the owner, and any person so doing shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable therefor" —and was not repealed by the unconstitutional provision in section 15 of the act of 1915, supra.

[3] The error in overruling the demurrer to counts 3, 5, and 6 rendered all further action by the court under those counts nugatory. The jury did not render a verdict against the defendant on count seven; and count two was withdrawn.

[2, 4] 2. The jury convicted the defendant of "involuntary manslaughter" under counts 1, 3, 4, and 6. The ruling in the first division of this opinion disposes of the case on counts 3 and 6. It is necessary to consider the motion for new trial only in so far as it relates to counts 1 and 4. In the amended motion for new trial complaint is made that the judge omitted to charge the jury, without request, the law on the subject of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection (the charge which it was contended should have been given being set forth), on the ground that under the evidence such offense was involved. In dealing with this question both counts may be considered together. It was alleged in count 4 that at the time of the homicide the defendant was driving in violation of an ordinance of the city of Atlanta, but no ordinance was introduced in evidence; and, as the court will not take judicial cognizance of a municipal ordinance (Funk v. Browne & Leacy Co., 145 Ga. 825 [2], 90 S. E. 64; Shurman v. Atlanta, 148 Ga. 1 [3], 95 S. E. 698), the case made under that count does not differ from that made under count 1, which charged the unlawful killing of the deceased by driving an automobile against her.

The testimony introduced by the state tended to show the following case: The homicide occurred late in an afternoon at the intersection of Ivy and Harris streets, in the city of Atlanta. The deceased had just alighted on the east side and from the front end of a north-bound trolley car, which had stopped on approaching the intersection of the streets to let off passengers. Almost instantly the automobile driven by the defendant, going north, passed the trolley car at a rate of speed estimated to be 35 or 40 miles per hour, striking the deceased and dragging her body entirely across Harris street and killing her. The streets were paved, and the driving space between the street car and sidewalk was about 11 feet wide. The automobile bore towards the sidewalk, and, after dropping the body, ran partly on the sidewalk and overturned an ice wagon standing at the edge of the sidewalk near the northeast corner of the streets, and was stopped by jamming a telephone pole at the edge of the sidewalk, about 15 feet north of the wagon. Approaching Harris street from the south, Ivy street contained a long and considerably steep downgrade which the defendant traversed before reaching the scene of this disaster. There were two ladies riding on the front seat of the automobile with him. The driver of a truck going also north along Ivy street had noticed defendant several blocks away, having trouble with his car, and passed him while he was apparently trying to "change his gear." The truck driver did not see him again until his car passed at the alarming speed where the truck driver had stopped at the rear of the street car standing at the intersection of the streets. Defendant's car was equipped with an "emergency brake" manipulated by a hand rod, and with a "service brake" manipulated by pressure of the foot on a pedal inserted through the floor. It was also equipped with an accelerator, manipulated by pressure of the foot on a small pedal inserted through the floor about three inches from the pedal that applied the service brake. The office of the accelerator is to feed gas to the engine, and, secondarily, to produce speed in the car. After the tragedy, the automobile was taken in charge and examined by a mechanic, who testified that the emergency brake was in "fairly good" condition, and that "the service brake, known as the foot brake, wouldn't hold at all; you could push it over flat, and it didn't have any effect on the car at all."

The circumstances above stated are sufficient to authorize a finding that the homicide was not intentional, but that it was committed by the defendant while engaged in the lawful act of operating an automobile but without exercising due care and circumspection, so that it might be kept under his control, and not injure others who should chance to be on the street on which he was driving. The facts bring the case within the principle of Flannigan v. State, 136 Ga. 132, 70 S. E. 1107, in which it was held:

"Where a homicide occurs in the performance or commission of an act not in itself wrongful, and the attendant circumstances, while showing no intention to kill, authorize an inference that the homicide resulted from the negligent doing of an act under circumstances endangering life, the homicide is 'involuntary manslaughter' in the commission of a lawful act without observing necessary discretion and caution."

It was erroneous to omit to charge this principle as applicable under the allegations of the indictment and the evidence submitted by the state.

Judgment reversed.

JOHNSON v. TULLIS. (No. 2430.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Cancellation of Instruments \S 37(8)—Deeds \S 144(2), 153—Petition for cancellation for nonperformance of conditions as to support, etc., held sufficient; conveyance in consideration of services with provision rendering it void for nonperformance is conveyance on condition subsequent; provision in deed that "agreement" should be void for nonperformance by grantee construed.

Where the allegations of an equitable petition brought by the grantor, for the cancellation of a deed which contained a condition subsequent, showed a failure upon the part of the grantee to fulfill the condition, the petition stated a cause of action, and a general demurrer was properly overruled.

(a) A conveyance of property, wherein it is recited that the conveyance is made upon consideration that the grantee shall render certain services and perform certain acts beneficial to the grantor, and which contains the further stipulation that upon failure of the grantee to comply with such condition the deed shall be void, is a conveyance upon a condition subsequent, and the grantor may treat the failure upon the part of the grantee to perform the covenant for service as a forfeiture of the estate conveyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Agreement.]

2. Cancellation of Instruments \S 46—Evidence tending to show breach of condition subsequent properly admitted.

The evidence objected to in the case tending to establish the allegations of the petition showing a breach of the condition subsequent, and the court properly overruled the objection thereto.

3. Cancellation of Instruments ¶51—Charges submitting issue of breach of condition subsequent held proper.

In view of the construction of the deed given above, the court's charges to the jury, submitting to them the issue as to whether or not there had been a breach of the condition, were proper and not open to the objection that the deed showed on its face that it was absolute, and the court was unauthorized to submit the issue as to whether there had been a breach of the condition.

4. Sufficiency of evidence.

There was evidence to support the verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; Andrew J. Cobb, Judge.

Suit by M. S. Tullis against J. E. Johnson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

O. A. Nix, of Lawrenceville, for plaintiff in error.

Kelley & Kelley, of Lawrenceville, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. M. S. Tullis brought an equitable petition seeking a decree for the cancellation of a deed which he had made to the plaintiff in error, to a tract of land and certain personal property. It is alleged in the petition that the consideration of the deed was an agreement upon the part of the defendant, John E. Johnson, "to take charge of your petitioner and his wife whom he was to support, maintain, clothe, and board during their lives, and to treat petitioner and his wife kindly and gently during their lives and see after them in sickness." The failure to perform this agreement upon the part of the defendant, Johnson, is charged; and conduct that was the reverse of that stipulated in the agreement was also alleged. Petitioner prayed that the conveyance be canceled, and for other equitable relief. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition. The demurrer was overruled. He also filed a plea and an answer; and upon the issue thus made the case was tried, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the petition. The deed which the plaintiff sought to have canceled recited that for the consideration stated the property described in the conveyance was conveyed to the grantee. Following the description of the property is the recital in the deed of an agreement or covenant upon the part of the grantee, in the following language:

"The said John E. Johnson does by these presents agree to take charge of the said M.

S. Tullis and his wife and support them and maintain and pay all their doctors' bills, and see after them financially, clothe and board and sleep them; and the said Johnson binds himself, his heirs and assigns, upon the consideration of the above-described property, to support, maintain, board, clothe, and sleep the said M. S. Tullis and his wife for and during their natural lives, * * * and does hereby agree to treat the said Tullis and his wife kindly and gently during their lives and see after them in sickness and treat them likewise. In the event the said Johnson, his heirs and assigns, fail to fill and perform and comply with the above stipulation in the agreement, then this agreement becomes null and void."

This is followed by a warranty clause. The attestation clause is as follows:

"In witness whereof we, the said Tullis and the said John E. Johnson, have hereunto set our hands and seals the day and year above written."

This was signed by the parties and duly attested.

While this instrument, a part of which is quoted above, is in form an agreement between the two parties, it is also a deed of conveyance upon the part of the grantor, Tullis. But it is a conveyance containing a condition subsequent. The recital that if Johnson fails to perform the covenant as to support, etc., "this agreement becomes null and void," introduces a condition subsequent. The deed is inartificially drawn. The word "agreement," as here used, we construe to mean the conveyance as well as the expressed undertaking upon the part of Johnson. And the stipulation that upon the failure of the grantee to comply with the covenant and to perform his undertaking, the deed shall become null and void, created a condition subsequent. In the case of Wilkes v. Groover, 138 Ga. 407, 75 S. E. 353, it was said:

"An owner of land conveyed it by warranty deed to his grandson, upon the expressed consideration of natural love and affection 'and in consideration of support and maintenance of the said [grantor] and his wife.' The deed contained this clause: 'It is further provided herein that should the said [grantee] voluntarily refuse and fail to care for and maintain the said [grantor] and his wife, that that fact will cancel, annul, and void this deed.' Held, that the provision as to avoidance created a condition subsequent."

And in the case of Jones v. Williams, 132 Ga. 782, 64 S. E. 1081, it was said:

"A deed from a grandfather to his granddaughter, which recites that the grantor, 'for and in consideration of work and labor done and to be done, consisting of taking care and caring for the [grantor] for and during his natural life, upon the faithful performance of said duty upon her part this obligation is to be of full force and virtue, otherwise this deed to be and the above and foregoing to be null and void, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, does hereby sell and convey unto the [granddaughter], her heirs and assigns, a certain tract of land in fee simple, conveys an estate in fee on a condition subsequent."

The court held, in the last case referred to, that the language quoted could only mean that the estate was granted on the condition that the grantee was to care for her grandfather during his life, and upon failure to perform this condition the estate was to become forfeited. See Mayor, etc., v. Brennan College, 150 Ga. 156, 103 S. E. 164. Inasmuch as the deed in the instant case was one containing a condition subsequent and this was shown by the petition, the allegations of the failure upon the part of the grantee in the deed to comply with the covenant imposing certain obligations upon him completed the cause of action; and the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer to the petition.

[2-4] 2-4. The rulings made in headnotes, 2, 3, and 4 require no elaboration.

HINSON v. STATE. (No. 2550.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law § 741(5)—Sufficiency of corroboration of confession is question for jury.

A confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction. Pen. Code 1910, § 1031.

(a) The sufficiency of the corroboration is a question for the jury. Coley v. State, 110 Ga. 271, 34 S. E. 845.

(b) The evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the confession of the defendant was corroborated, and was sufficient to prove the corpus delicti.

2. Criminal law § 525—Homicide § 151(2)—Presumption in favor of defendant's sanity; burden on defendant to show insanity rendering confession inadmissible.

Where, on the trial of one charged with murder, a plea of insanity is set up, the presumption is in favor of the sanity of the defendant. Carter v. State, 56 Ga. 463(8); Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614 (4 a), 58 Am. Rep. 480. Confessions freely and voluntarily made are prima facie admissible; and the burden of proof is upon the defendant, pleading insanity, to prove his legal incapacity to commit the crime, and consequently his legal incapacity to confess the crime. This burden was not carried by the defendant.

(a) It appearing that the confession was freely and voluntarily made, it was not error to admit it over the objection that it was not freely and voluntarily made, and that the defendant did not have mental capacity to make the confession.

3. Criminal law § 48, 773(2), 829(6)—Homicide § 179, 294(1)—Ability to distinguish between right and wrong is test of criminal responsibility; witness properly permitted to testify that defendant had sufficient mind to know difference between right and wrong; instruction as to criminal responsibility properly given; charges properly refused when argumentative and covered so far as correct.

The general rule in this state is that, "If a man has reason sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong in relation to a particular act about to be committed, he is criminally responsible." Roberts v. State, 3 Ga. 310 (3); Carr v. State, 96 Ga. 285(2), 22 S. E. 570; Flanagan v. State, 103 Ga. 619, 625, 30 S. E. 550; Taylor v. State, 105 Ga. 746, 775, 31 S. E. 764; Strickland v. State, 137 Ga. 115 (5), 72 S. E. 922; Bowden v. State, 151 Ga. 336 (4), 339, 106 S. E. 575.

(a) Accordingly it was not error for the court to permit the solicitor general to propound to certain witnesses, and receive answers thereto, and allow the jury to consider the question and answers, as follows: "Has the defendant sufficient mind to know the difference between right and wrong? A. He had" as against the objection that the true rule is, "Is the defendant a person of sound and disposing mind and memory; is his memory sufficient to form the intent to commit a crime?"

(b) Nor was it error for the court to charge the jury substantially the rule which was first laid down in the Roberts Case, supra, and which has been followed since; nor was it error to refuse the requests to charge on the law of insanity, the requests being argumentative. In so far as they state sound principles of law, they were covered by the charge as given by the court.

4. Other assignments without merit.

Other assignments of error are without merit.

5. Criminal law § 935(1)—New trial properly denied when evidence sufficient.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Cook County; R. G. Dickerson, Judge.

Milton Hinson, alias Milton Moon, was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Milton Hinson, alias Milton Moon, was indicted for the homicide of his mother; and at the same term of court he filed his plea of not guilty, and also a plea of insanity. On the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder, with a recommendation to life imprisonment, and he was accordingly sentenced by the court. The defendant made a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

JOHNSON v. STATE. (No. 2526.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Constitutional law \S 206(1), 312—Searches and seizures \S 7—Federal constitutional amendment without application in the state courts; exemption from unreasonable searches and seizures not privilege and immunity of United States citizens; not element of due process.

The Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States applies only to proceedings in the courts of the United States; it does not in any manner govern or regulate trials in criminal cases in state courts.

(a) The exemption from unreasonable searches and seizures contained in the Fourth Amendment to the federal Constitution is not one of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States which the Fourteenth Amendment to that Constitution forbids the state to abridge, nor is it an element of due process of law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment against state action.

2. Criminal law \S 395—Evidence taken from defendant's person while under illegal arrest not inadmissible.

On the trial of a criminal case, incriminatory evidence which was taken from the person of the accused by one who had illegally arrested him and who discovered it by search of his person while he was under illegal arrest, if relevant, is not inadmissible as contravening paragraph 16 of section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code of 1910, \S 6372), prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

James Johnson was convicted of carrying concealed weapons, and petition for certiorari was refused by the judge of the superior court, and he brings error. Affirmed.

S. C. Crane, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Roy Dorsey, Sol., and Jno. A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., both of Atlanta, for the State.

GEORGE, J. The facts in this case are brief. James Johnson was tried and convicted in the criminal court of Atlanta for the offense of carrying concealed weapons. Upon the trial a detective of the city of Atlanta testified as follows:

"In the performance of my duty [as city detective] I arrested the defendant * * * in the city of Atlanta, Fulton county, upon suspicion of burglary. I had information that he had a pistol concealed on his person. Upon arresting him I searched his person, and while searching his person a pistol slipped out of his shirt and it was picked up. I had no warrant for his arrest, and this defendant was never prosecuted for any offense except the charge of carrying concealed weapons. * * * The pistol was concealed from view at the time of the search."

Counsel for the defendant moved to exclude the testimony of the witness, because the evidence was obtained by violating the right secured to the defendant by the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and by paragraph 16 of section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code of 1910, \S 6372). The court overruled the objection, and adjudged the defendant guilty, whereupon he presented his petition for certiorari to the judge of the superior court. Sanction of the writ was refused, and the defendant excepted. The single assignment of error here insisted upon is that the court erred in overruling the motion to exclude the evidence of the witness, upon the grounds urged; the contention being that the prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures contained in the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is, by virtue of the provision of the Fourteenth Amendment to that Constitution, one of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States which may not be abridged by the states, and that the right of the citizen to be secure in his person against unreasonable searches and seizures is a right included in the conception of due process of law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

[1] The first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States—including, of course, the Fourth—refer to powers exercised by the government of the United States, and not to those of the individual states. In other words, the Fourth Amendment is not concerned with state action, and deals only with federal action. Almost from the beginning this principle has been consistently recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States. Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Pet. 243, 8 L. Ed. 672, Fox v. Ohio, 5 How. 410, 434, 12 L. Ed. 213, Twitcheil v. Pennsylvania, 7 Wall. 321, 19 L. Ed. 223, Brown v. New Jersey, 175 U. S. 172, 20 Sup. Ct. 77, 44 L. Ed. 119, Twinning v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 93, 29 Sup. Ct. 14, 53 L. Ed. 97, and Minn., etc., R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U. S. 211, 217, 36 Sup. Ct. 595, 60 L. Ed. 981, L. R. A. 1917A, 86, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 505, are among the leading cases in point. See Loeb v. Jennings, 133 Ga. 796, 67 S. E. 101, 18 Ann. Cas. 376.

With respect to the further contentions of plaintiff in error, kindred questions were raised in Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 585, 24 Sup. Ct. 372, 48 L. Ed. 575, and Consolidated Rendering Co. v. Vermont, 207 U. S. 541, 28 Sup. Ct. 178, 52 L. Ed. 327, 12 Ann. Cas. 658; but the questions were left undecided, as those cases were disposed of on other grounds. In the leading case of Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 29 Sup. Ct. 14, 53 L. Ed. 97, it was decided that "the first eight amendments are restrictive only of national action and, while the Fourteenth Amendment restrained and limited state action, it did not take up and protect citizens of the states from action by the states as to all matters enumerated in the first eight amendments," and that exemption from compulsory self-incrimination in the state courts is not secured by the fifth amendment to the federal Constitution, nor is it one of the fundamental rights, immunities, and privileges of citizens of the United States, or an element of due process of law within the meaning of the federal Constitution or the Fourteenth Amendment thereto. This case is in principle controlling. See, also, Minn., etc., R. Co. v. Bombolis, supra. It is insisted, however, that the decision in Twining v. New Jersey, supra, is modified and in effect overruled by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Gould v. U. S., 255 U. S. 298, 41 Sup. Ct. 261, 65 L. Ed. —, and Amos v. U. S., 255 U. S. 313, 41 Sup. Ct. 266, 65 L. Ed. —. In Gould's Case it was ruled:

"The prohibition of Const. Amend. 4, against unreasonable searches and seizures is violated when a representative of any branch or subdivision of the government gains entrance to the home or office of a person suspected of crime by stealth, through social acquaintance, or in the guise of a business call, and subsequently makes a secret search, in the absence of the suspected person, and seizes papers to be used in evidence against him. The admission in evidence against a defendant of a paper secretly seized from his possession by a representative of the United States government, in violation of Const. Amend. 4, is contrary to Const. Amend. 5, providing that no person shall in any criminal case be compelled to be a witness against himself. * * * The use in evidence of papers seized in a search unconstitutional under Const. Amend. 4, is in effect to compel defendant to become a witness against himself contrary to Amendment 5."

It was further decided that the rule of practice (in force in the courts of the United States) that an objection first made at the trial to the introduction in evidence of a paper seized from the defendant is too late to be considered does not apply where the paper was seized from the defendant by stealth and he did not know of its seizure until it was offered in evidence against him; that the rule of practice must not be allowed to prevail over a constitutional right; and that, where a motion by defendant for return of papers as unlawfully seized has been denied before trial, it is the duty of the judge presiding at the trial to re-examine the question on the objection of the defendant to the introduction in evidence of the papers against him. In Amos' case it was held that a motion for the return of property unlawfully seized, made after the jury was sworn, but before any evidence was offered, was not presented too late, and that the motion should have been granted. The rulings in Gould's Case were in answer to questions certified by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. Amos was convicted in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of South Carolina. We are not called upon to decide whether previous rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States are modified, and, if at all, to what extent, by the rulings in the cases last above considered. The principle that the first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States are not concerned with state action and deal only with federal action is not affected. However, the recent cases seem to be consistent with Weeks v. U. S., 232 U. S. 883, 34 Sup. Ct. 341, 58 L. Ed. 652, L. R. A. 1915B, 834, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1177, and Silverstone Lumber Co. v. U. S., 251 U. S. 385, 40 Sup. Ct. 182, 64 L. Ed. 319; at least the principle applied is but a logical extension of the doctrine laid down in these cases.

[2] The almost unvarying rule in state courts is that upon the trial of criminal cases the court, largely to avoid a collateral issue, will receive any competent evidence without inquiring into the means by which it has been procured. In answer to questions certified by the Court of Appeals, the rule was definitely accepted by this court in Calhoun v. State, 144 Ga. 679, 87 S. E. 893. An examination of the cases there reviewed will show that the general rule had been long in force in this state. The decision in Calhoun v. State was by a full bench of six justices. The ruling there made is supported by Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 585, 24 Sup. Ct. 372, 48 L. Ed. 575, and by other cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. Whether the rule tends to reduce the constitutional prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures and compulsory self-incrimination of one accused of crime to mere forms of words it is in fact well established and is binding upon us until reviewed and overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Homicide \S 290—Evidence held to authorize charge as to shooting with shotgun as alleged.

On the trial of a defendant indicted for murder by shooting the victim with "a shotgun," producing wounds which caused the death of the person alleged to have been slain, a witness testified that he was seated on one end of a swing suspended in the front porch of his residence, in the evening after dark, and the person alleged to have been slain (wife of the defendant) came up and took a seat at the other end of the swing. In a few minutes witness saw defendant approaching. After approaching closely from behind the swing, defendant put "the gun about 2½ feet of" deceased and "shot immediately." The shot struck the deceased, who fell on the floor and died without speaking a word. Witness told defendant, "Will, you have killed her," and defendant walked away without saying a word. The witness further testified: "It seemed the kind of a gun he had was a little single-barrel, breechloader shotgun." Held, that the evidence was sufficient to authorize a charge submitting to the jury the question of whether the defendant killed the deceased by shooting her with a shotgun.

2. Criminal law \S 762(3), 789(2)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt held not to express opinion that there was no reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt; definition of "reasonable doubt" held not confusing and misleading.

A charge, "The reasonable doubt which the law recognizes and gives the defendant the benefit of, where it exists, is not a vague, indefinite, or capricious doubt; but it is such a doubt as arises from the evidence or want of evidence, and causes your mind to be halting, hesitating, and unsatisfied, and refusing to reach a conclusion that is satisfactory to you," is not erroneous on the ground that, on account of the use of the words "where it exists," the charge amounted to an expression of opinion by the court that a reasonable doubt did not exist as to the guilt of the accused on trial, or on the ground that the charge was confusing and calculated to mislead the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reasonable Doubt.]

3. Criminal law \S 805(1)—Failure to give some other appropriate instruction not ground of objection to instruction correct in itself.

It is not a good assignment of error on a portion of the judge's charge which states a correct principle of law applicable to the case that some other correct and appropriate instruction was not given. Under application of this principle, the criticism of the charge, made in the third ground of the amended motion for new trial, shows no cause for reversal.

4. Criminal law \S 789(5)—Instruction omitting qualifying word in defining reasonable doubt not error against defendant.

A charge, "If you have resting on your minds, after receiving the law from the court and applying it to the facts and circumstances of the case, a doubt, and this doubt grows out of the case from the want, weakness, insufficiency, or conflict in the testimony of the defendant's statement, and leaves an honest juror's mind unsettled as to what the truth is, the benefit of such a doubt should be given to the defendant and he should be acquitted," was not erroneous, as against the defendant, on the ground that the judge did not use the qualifying word "reasonable," immediately preceding and referring to the word "doubt" as employed in the charge.

5. Criminal law \S 781(2)—Defendant's statement held to warrant instruction as to defendant's admission of killing and contention as to self-defense.

The state introduced evidence to the effect that the defendant killed the deceased by shooting her with a shotgun. The defendant did not introduce any evidence, but made a statement before the jury in which he said: "I want to talk with her and reason with her, and she raised the knife in her hand, and at that time I shot to save myself. I wouldn't have killed her for nothing in the world, but I shot her to save myself. * * * I am sorry I done that, but I had to do it to save myself." Held, that this was sufficient basis for the charge. "He [referring to the defendant upon trial] admits the killing, but contends that the deceased was after him with a knife, and that he shot her to save himself—to save his own life," and the charge was not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned.

6. Criminal law \S 822(4)—Instruction concerning minimum and maximum sentences and paroles held not erroneous when language criticized considered in its context.

In the course of his instructions the judge charged the jury: "If you find the defendant guilty of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, it is your duty to fix the sentence. In fixing this sentence, gentlemen, you must fix a minimum and a maximum sentence; that is, in the event you find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter. This sentence must not be less than the time named by law for the punishment of the crime, nor more than the time named by law. You should, in fixing the sentence, fix somewhere in between one and 20 years, and you should say in your verdict that 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, and fix his sentence' at not less than so much time nor more than so much time, 'at labor in the penitentiary,' specifying in each instance the length of time you so fix, remembering that the short term so fixed by you shall not be less than one, and that the longer term so fixed by you shall not be more than 20 years." Immediately following the above instruction the court charged: "When a convict is sentenced to such minimum and maximum term as I have defined to you, the law makes it the duty of the prison commission to fix rules by which said convict, after serving the minimum sentence, may be allowed to complete the sentence without the confines of the penitentiary, upon complying with said rules." One of the grounds of the motion for new trial assigned error upon the last part of the charge above quoted, upon the ground that it led the jury to look upon the defendant as a convict before he was found guilty. Held that, when the language of the charge excepted to is considered with its context, it is not susceptible of the construction given to it by the plaintiff in error, and furnishes no ground for a reversal.

7. Criminal law §914—Defects in proceedings to revise jury list and disqualification of grand jurors held not open on motion for new trial.

Irregularity in the appointment of a jury commissioner to revise the list of jurors; omission of jury commissioners to take and subscribe the oath as provided in Penal Code 1910, § 815, before entering upon the discharge of their duties as commissioners; failure of the clerk of the superior court to certify the revised lists of jurors, as provided in Penal Code 1910, § 821; exclusion by the jury commissioners of certain classes of persons (such as all persons over 60 years of age, all ministers of the gospel, all practicing physicians, all justices of the peace and notaries public and ex officio justices of the peace and constables, policemen, and other arresting officers) from the jury box; failure of the clerk to take and subscribe the oath as prescribed in Penal Code 1910, § 817; and disqualification of grand jurors to return a bill of indictment, on account of having served as jurors at preceding terms of the city court and the superior court of the county—are matters of objection in their nature proper defectum; and, when relied on as grounds for showing illegality of the grand jury returning an indictment, all such objections should be made by a proper challenge to the array of grand jurors before the indictment is found, where the illegality was known or, if not known by the defendant or his attorney at law before indictment, by plea in abatement to the indictment. Turner v. State, 78 Ga. 174; Folds v. State, 123 Ga. 167, 51 S. E. 305; Tucker v. State, 135 Ga. 79, 68 S. E. 786. Where there is no such challenge or plea in abatement, such questions cannot be raised for the first time after verdict, by motion for a new trial. Jordan v. State, 119 Ga. 443, 46 S. E. 679.

8. Criminal law §923(9)—Objection that jurors had served at preceding terms not ground for new trial when not raised by challenge.

The objection that certain jurors put upon defendant as trial jurors had served at immediately preceding terms of the city court and superior court of the county, being proper defectum, might have been raised by challenge to the juror when put upon the prisoner; but, where no objection was raised, it cannot be made for the first time after verdict by motion for new trial. Brown v. State, 105 Ga. 640 (1), 31 S. E. 557; Jordan v. State, 119 Ga. 443 (6), 46 S. E. 679; Parris v. State, 125 Ga. 777 (1), 54 S. E. 751; Embry v. State, 138 Ga. 464 (1), 78 S. E. 604.

9. Criminal law §914—Failure to challenge array of grand jurors not ground for new trial, though defendant ignorant, in jail, etc.

Where a defendant fails to challenge the array of grand jurors before indictment for any of the several reasons mentioned above, and is subsequently convicted, the verdict finding the defendant guilty will not be set aside on a motion for new trial, on the ground that the conviction was violative of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, or of the Constitution of the United States; and the fact that the defendant may have been ignorant and incarcerated in the jail prior to his indictment, and unable to employ counsel, and that immediately after the return of the indictment he was put on his trial, and the attorney at law then appointed for him by the court did not have any opportunity to make any investigation, would not render his conviction illegal on the account of a disqualification of the grand jurors.

10. Criminal law §945(1)—New trial not granted when new evidence would not likely cause different result.

The alleged newly discovered evidence was not of such materiality as would likely cause a different result on another trial.

11. Criminal law §935(1)—New trial properly denied when evidence sufficient.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

BROWN v. CITY OF ATLANTA. CITY OF ATLANTA v. BROWN. STATE v. SAME. (Nos. 2681, 2682, 2688.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Constitutional law \S 33—Municipal corporations \S 75, 907—Amendment as to incurring of bonded debts by municipalities not self-executing; enabling act held inoperative until ratified by voters of municipality; constitutional amendment authorizing issuance of bonds held cumulative, and not exclusive, method.

The amendment to the Constitution of 1877, proposed by the Legislature in 1918 (Acts 1918, p. 915), and ratified by the people in November of the same year, authorizing any municipal corporation within the state, having a population of 150,000 or more, to incur a bonded debt or debts for the public purposes of such corporation as provided in the amendment, is not self-executing, but by its terms an enabling act must be passed by the Legislature, and such act shall not become operative until it shall have been affirmed at a general election held for the election of a mayor and general council in such municipality falling within the class described in the amendment, by two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof who may vote at the election. While the enabling act has been passed by the Legislature, it has not been affirmed as provided in the constitutional amendment, and therefore is not operative.

(a) The above amendment to the Constitution is not exclusive, but is cumulative of the authority to vote upon and issue bonds as provided in article 7, \S 7, par. 1, of the Constitution.

(b) The city of Atlanta falls within the class designated in the foregoing amendment to the Constitution.

2. Municipal corporations \S 918(1)—Registration of voters preceding bond election held "general registration," and not "special registration" forbidden by Constitution; "general registration" and "special registration" defined; vote sufficient to authorize incurring of debt defined.

Under a proposed amendment to article 7, \S 7, par. 1, of the state Constitution (Acts 1918, p. 99), which proposed amendment was subsequently ratified by the people, all laws, charter provisions, and ordinances theretofore passed or enacted, providing for special registrations of voters in municipal corporations and other political divisions of the state, such special registrations to be used in elections to vote on the issuance of bonds by such municipal corporations, etc., are null and void. And the General Assembly, under such amendment, has no power to pass or enact any law providing for such special registration.

(a) The pleadings and evidence in this case examined: Held, that the registration of voters preceding the bond election of March 8, 1921, in the city of Atlanta, is a general, and not a special, registration of voters.

(b) Under the above amendment, two-thirds of the qualified voters voting at an election to incur a debt by the municipal corporation by the issuance of bonds, as prescribed by law, shall be sufficient for that purpose, provided that two-thirds so voting shall be a majority of the registered voters.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Special Registration.]

3. Constitutional law \S 33—Municipal corporations \S 918(1, 4)—Suffrage amendment is self-executing; burden on one attacking bond election to show irregularities disqualifying voters; disqualification of voters does not avoid election where bonds were authorized without their votes; calling voters' attention to registration oath and signing by them held sufficient administration of oath.

The Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex, is self-executing, and removes the electoral disqualification on account of sex.

(a) Under the general registration of voters, as made by the city of Atlanta, for the purpose of determining whether bonds should be issued or not, at an election held March 8, 1921, the female voters were prima facie qualified to vote, and the burden was on the intervener to show irregularities, if any, disqualifying them. If the female voters were not qualified to vote, it does not appear that their voting would have changed the result of the election; and in such circumstances this furnished no cause for declaring the election void.

(b) Where the attention of the voters was called by the city registrar to the contents of the registration oath prescribed by the City Code, and the voters subscribed their names thereto, this was a substantial compliance with the requirement of the City Code as to administering such oath.

4. Municipal corporations \S 918(5)—Consolidation of returns of election held prima facie correct, and burden on one attacking election.

Where the duly elected managers of a municipal election, held in the city of Atlanta, for the purpose of determining whether or not bonds should be issued for municipal purposes, submitted the consolidated returns to the mayor and general council of such city, "and consolidated and the result declared," showing that the election resulted in favor of bonds, such consolidation was prima facie correct, and the burden would be on the intervener to show that the result was inaccurate and different from that submitted by the mayor and general council of the city; and the intervener failed to carry that burden.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Municipal corporations \S 918(1)—Bond issue election need not be held at general election.

Under Const. art. 7, \S 7, par. 1, a municipal election on the question of issuing bonds was not invalid because not held at a general election for the election of mayor and general council of the city if all other legal requirements, under Civ. Code 1910, \S 440, were complied with.

6. Municipal corporations \Leftrightarrow 918(1)—General registration list must be used at bond elections.

Const. art. 7, § 7, par. 1, as amended in 1918, prohibiting special registration of voters for municipal bond elections, requires the use of the general registration list in all such elections.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Suit by the State against the City of Atlanta for the validation of municipal bonds, in which W. R. Brown intervened. Order validating the bonds, and the intervenor brings error, and the State and City bring separate cross-bills of exception. Affirmed on the main bill, and cross-bills dismissed.

An election was held in the city of Atlanta on March 8, 1921, for a proposed issue of bonds for municipal purposes, amounting to $8,850,000. The result of the election was declared to be in favor of the issuance of the bonds; notice was served upon the solicitor general of the Atlanta circuit, and suit was filed by him in behalf of the state for the validation of the bonds. A time was set for a hearing, advertisement was made, and the city of Atlanta appeared at such time and made answer, admitting generally the facts alleged by the solicitor general. No objection to the validation of the bonds having been filed, the court passed an order validating them. Subsequently, and on the same day, Walter R. Brown moved to set aside the order of validation, and to be allowed to intervene. The court set aside the order validating the bonds, and permitted the intervention to be filed. To this order both the city of Atlanta and the state of Georgia excepted, and these exceptions are the subject-matter of the cross-bills of exception filed by the city of Atlanta and the state of Georgia respectively. On the hearing the presiding judge made an order validating all of the bonds.

The case, as made by the solicitor general, for the validation of the bonds was in substance the following:

The petition recited service of notice by the city of Atlanta that the election on the question as to whether the bonds should be issued or not had been held, and that the election resulted in favor of the issuance of the bonds, the amount to be issued, the purposes for which the bonds were to be issued, the rate of interest to be paid, and how paid, and prayed an order requiring the city of Atlanta to show cause why the bonds should not be validated. The city of Atlanta appeared and filed an answer to the petition, admitting that proper notice was served on the solicitor general of the Atlanta circuit, and setting out in detail the various issues of the bonds. The answer also recited the fact that an election was held for the purpose above stated, on March 8, 1921, and also the description in the notice of the various issues of bonds, the amount and purpose of each issue, and the denomination of each, the rate of interest and the time of payment of principal and interest; and also admitted that the provisions for a tax levy and sinking fund were true. It was further alleged that the total number of qualified voters who were entitled to vote in this election was 27,070; that the election resulted in favor of the issuance of the bonds voted for, by a requisite two-thirds vote of those voting in the election of March 8, 1921; and that such two-thirds vote was a majority of the total vote registered. It was also admitted by the city that the resolution was adopted by the mayor and general council, directing the service of the notice upon the solicitor general of the Atlanta circuit, and that the copy of the advertisement inserted in the notice was correct, and that it was published 30 days before the election in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements for the county in which Atlanta is located were published.

It was further answered by the city that it had proceeded, with reference to the advertisement, and the holding of the election, and declaring the result thereof, in accordance with the law. It was further answered that under article 7, § 7, pars. 1 and 2, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, the requirements of that provision of the Constitution with reference to holding the election were set out and that the city had complied therewith. Copies of the ordinances passed by the mayor and general council of Atlanta, calling for the election, were attached to the petition. It was further averred that under article 2, § 4, of the Constitution of Georgia, the General Assembly was authorized to provide for the registration of voters, and that, under an act of the General Assembly of 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 174), the charter of the city of Atlanta was amended, and under such amendment the mayor and general council had authority to provide for the registration of voters prior to any municipal election, and no person, under such amendment, would be permitted to vote unless registered. The tax collector of Fulton county was appointed the official registrar. It was averred that, under the above-recited act, the city of Atlanta had passed an ordinance under which a system of general registration was provided, whereby a person who paid his taxes and made oath to that effect was registered by the county tax collector for the city. It was further averred that the registrar made up a list of the voters from all who had registered prior to any bond or municipal election; that after the passage of the above act the city had no special registration system, and the county tax collector, as registrar for the city, put every one who had registered prior to any municipal election on the registration list; that prior to this act the city had by ordinance a system of special registration, and under this ordinance a time for beginning and ending of the registration was provided prior to any election.

It was averred that, when the bond election of March 8, 1921, was held, all persons who had registered with the county tax collector, acting as city registrar, were registered and permitted to vote. A registration list of the voters was thus made out, and, when any one registered after the list was made out, a supplemental list, or certificate, was given if desired, and those holding such certificates were permitted to vote. There was no ordinance of the city providing for special registration in this bond election, and there was no special registration therefor. The registrar registered those who made the required affidavit, and the names were put upon the registration list and supplemental list, and were permitted to vote if they so desired. The ordinance providing for this system of general registration was set out. The county tax collector, as city registrar, made two reports to the mayor and general council, which were accepted by the city and placed upon the minutes. It was averred that the consolidated returns of the managers of the bond election was made to the mayor and general council on March 21, 1921, and were consolidated and the result declared. The notice given to the public of the proposed validation was set out, and it was affirmed that all the facts set out in the resolution, notice, and ordinances concerning the proposed issue of bonds were true.

It was averred that the voters participating in the last general election held in the city of Atlanta on the first Wednesday in December, 1920, as shown by the tally sheets of that election, amounted to 2,360; and this was referred to as an additional reason why the election held was valid, because more than two-thirds of the above number participated in and voted for the bonds in the election of March 8, 1921. It was averred that the total number of voters registered and qualified to participate in the last general election on the first Wednesday in December, 1920, amounted to 18,587, and that more than two-thirds of the voters so registered voted in the bond election of March 8, 1921, and that two-thirds so voting was a majority of the total number of voters so registered. It was also averred that two-thirds of those voting at the bond election constituted a majority of the total registered voters of the city of Atlanta, qualified to vote in said election, and that the city had complied in all respects with the law governing bond issues. The petition prayed the judgment of the court validating the issue of bonds, which was set out in detail, etc.

The city introduced certified copies of the resolutions and ordinances referred to in its answer; also the notice served on the solicitor general, together with his acknowledgment thereof; also certified copies of the various ordinances of the mayor and general council, which were referred to in the answer. The tax collector of the county, who, it was alleged, was the registrar for the municipality, testified orally to the number of votes registered, and that he registered all those who applied for registration, including females, giving the approximate number of each class in accordance with the facts set out above. On the date set for the hearing, March 28, 1921, an order was made validating the bonds, and exception was taken by the intervener to this order. Further facts will sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Case No. 2688:

Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein and R. B. Blackburn, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. On August 19, 1918, the Legislature passed an act (Acts 1918, p. 915) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the State of Georgia, as follows:

"Reserving to the municipal corporations the benefit of all provisions of the Constitution of force in this state, the General Assembly is hereby empowered to authorize any municipal corporation within this state having a population on one hundred and fifty thousand or more, according to the census of the United States government taken next preceding the approval of any act passed in pursuance hereof, to incur a bonded debt or debts for the public purposes of such municipality, the said debt or debts so to be incurred to be for such sums and to be secured after such manner, and to be paid, principal and interest at such times and such places and by such means and upon such terms as the General Assembly may prescribe.

"Provided, however, that no act conferring the powers aforesaid or any of them, shall become operative until the same shall have been affirmed at a general election held for the election of a mayor and general council in such municipality by two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof who may vote at said election. Such two-thirds to constitute at least a majority of the qualified voters of said municipality."

This proposed amendment to the Constitution of the state was subsequently ratified by the people at a general election held in November thereafter, and is known as the Atkinson amendment, so called because it was introduced and pressed to passage by the late lamented Judge Spencer R. Atkinson, a former member of this court. The bond election held on March 8, 1921, as set out in the foregoing statement of facts, was evidently held with reference to the time of its holding under the constitutional provision as it existed prior to the amendment above set out. This provision is as follows:

"The debt hereafter incurred by any county, municipal corporation, or political division of this state, except as in this Constitution provided for, shall not exceed seven per centum of the assessed value of all the taxable property therein, and no such county, municipality, or division shall incur any new debt, except for a temporary loan or loans to supply casual deficiencies of revenue, not to exceed one-fifth of one per centum of the assessed value of taxable property therein, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof at an election for that purpose, to be held as may be prescribed by law; but any city, the debt of which does not exceed seven per centum of the assessed value of the taxable property at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, may be authorized by law to increase, at any time, the amount of said debt, three per centum upon such assessed valuation," etc.

The intervener in the present case contends that the constitutional amendment referred to above is exclusive so far as the city of Atlanta is concerned, inasmuch as the city of Atlanta has a population of 150,000 and more, and therefore that it falls within the class to which the amendment exclusively applies; and that the city of Atlanta, after the adoption of the Atkinson Amendment to the Constitution, must vote bonds, if at all, as provided in the constitutional amendment, and that it could not vote for bonds under any other provision of the Constitution. With reference to this phase of the case, therefore, the question is whether the constitutional amendment of 1918, known as the Atkinson Amendment, is exclusive, or whether it is merely cumulative of the power to issue bonds under that provision of the Constitution last above quoted. We are of the opinion that the amendment is not exclusive, but is merely cumulative. It will be observed that the first sentence of the amendment begins with:

"Reserving to municipal corporations the benefit of all provisions of the Constitution in force in this state, the General Assembly is hereby empowered," etc.

This language is broad enough to cover all the municipal corporations of the state, including Atlanta, with her population of more than 150,000. This amendment was evidently passed and adopted with the view to authorizing cities of the class indicated to incur a bonded debt or debts for the public purposes of such municipality, without reference to the amount of such bonded indebtedness, etc., because the amendment provides that the debts so to be incurred may be "for such sums and to be secured after such manner, and to be paid principal and interest at such times and places and by such means and upon such terms as the General Assembly may prescribe." It will be seen, therefore, that there is no limit as to the amount of the debt to be incurred or the time when such principal and interest may become due under the amendment to the Constitution. But, in order to safeguard the taxpayers of the municipality against an unreasonable and unlimited amount of bonds being issued, no doubt, it is provided that no act conferring the powers above mentioned shall become operative until the same shall have been affirmed at a general election held for the election of a mayor and general council in such municipality by two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof who may vote at such election, etc. The amendment is not, therefore, self-executing. It requires an enabling act to carry it into effect; and while such enabling act was passed (Acts 1919, p. 260), it has never been ratified or adopted by the city of Atlanta as required by the amendment to the Constitution, so far as the record discloses, and it is inoperative until it has been so ratified. Therefore the city of Atlanta, while coming within the class designated in the Atkinson Amendment, still has the power and authority to issue municipal bonds under article 7, § 7, par. 1, of the Constitution of the State of Georgia (Civil Code of 1910, § 6563), as quoted above; and this election was evidently held under this provision of the Constitution. We are of the opinion that neither the Legislature nor the people meant by the Atkinson Amendment to take away from municipalities of the class designated in that amendment the right to issue bonds; and if the Atkinson Amendment is held to be exclusive, it would have that effect, inasmuch as the enabling act has never been, and may never be, ratified or affirmed. The enabling act of 1919, supra, passed in pursuance of the constitutional amendment, provides that municipal corporations of this state having a population of 150,000 or more are empowered and authorized to incur a bonded debt or debts for the public purposes of such municipality, provided that the issuance of such bonds "is voted affirmatively at a general election held at the same time that the election of the mayor and general council of such municipalities is held, by two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof who may vote at said election, said two-thirds to constitute at least a majority of the qualified voters of such municipality."

[5] It is contended by the intervener that the present bond election is invalid, because it was not held at a general election held at the same time that the election of mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta was held. As said above, the Atkinson Amendment not being exclusive nor self-executing, but only cumulative, "an election for that purpose, to be held as may be prescribed by laws," and in conformity with article 7, § 7, par. 1, of the Constitution of the state (Civil Code, § 6563), would be valid, though not held at a general election, provided, of course, all other legal requirements were complied with. Civil Code, § 440.

[2] 2. Another objection offered by the intervener against the validation of the bonds voted at the election of March 8, 1921, is that it contravenes what is known as the Brown Amendment to the Constitution (Laws 1918, p. 99). That amendment was proposed by the Legislature at the same session which proposed the Atkinson Amendment, supra, viz. in August, 1918, and was subsequently ratified by the people at the general election held in November, 1918. The Brown Amendment provides:

"That paragraph 1, section 7, article 7, of the Constitution of this state be * * * amended by inserting between the word 'thereof' and the word 'at,' as they occur in the tenth line of said paragraph, the following, 'voting, provided said two-thirds so voting shall be a majority of the registered voters; and provided further that all laws, charter provisions and ordinances heretofore passed or enacted providing special registration of the voters of counties, municipal corporations, and other political divisions of this state, to pass upon the issuance of bonds by such counties, municipal corporations and other political divisions are hereby declared to be null and void, and the General Assembly shall hereafter have no power to pass or enact any law providing for such special registration, but the validity of any and all bond issues by such counties, municipal corporations, or other political divisions made prior to January 1, 1918, shall not be affected hereby.'"

It will be seen that the Brown Amendment provides that all laws, charter provisions and ordinances heretofore passed or enacted, providing special registration of the voters of municipal corporations, to pass upon the issuance of bonds, are declared to be null and void. The question raised, therefore, is whether the registration preceding the bond election of March 8, 1921, is a special registration, or whether it is a general registration. It must be conceded that, if it is a special registration, the Brown Amendment being self-executing and not requiring an enabling act to carry it into effect, as is the case in the Atkinson Amendment, the registration would, by the terms of the amendment, be null and void, and consequently an election held under it would likewise be invalid. But we do not think that the registration of the voters for the bond election in the instant case is a special registration, but on the contrary that it is a general registration, as we shall endeavor to show.

[6] The Brown Amendment changed the provision of the Constitution as to the method of ascertaining the registered vote, and as to the method of registration. It prohibits special registrations, and requires that, in all elections on the question of the issuance of bonds, the political subdivisions of the state, including municipalities, should use the general registration list. The evidence in the record shows that the registrar, who was the tax collector of the county of Fulton, of which Atlanta is the county site, was created the registrar, not only for the state and county, but also for the city of Atlanta. He testified:

"All persons were registered who made oath that they had paid all taxes except those for the current year, and answered the questions which qualified them to vote. I put those on the registration list. * * * Every one that came around there to register, that was qualified, was registered. I had no complaint from any person that they were qualified to register and had not been allowed to register; and if there had been trouble on this line, they would naturally have come to me as registrar. * * * We used certificates as a supplemental list. Books of registration were open at the city hall and at the tax collector's office. There were two windows; one for white and one for colored. * * * People whom I registered were not registered separately for the state and county. There was only one registration as to those voters, both city and county at the same time. * * * I have only one list of registration—city, state, and county; and the list I made up for the city in the election was from that list, and those people took the oath that they had paid all taxes. If another election was called this year, say in December or October, I will use the same registration list as was made up for the city election, plus any additions that might come in between now and then. A party is not required to register but one time, and I would add to it any party who registered for another election, city, state, and county. They do not register any more."

It appears also that females, as well as males, who qualified were permitted to register and vote. It appears that any person who registered between January 1 and March 8, 1921, and others who had previously been registered prior thereto, and who made the oath that they had paid the taxes required of them the year previous to registration, were put on the list and permitted to vote, and any person so registering was put upon the permanent registration list. The charter of the city of Atlanta was amended in 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 172), so that section 154 of the charter as amended reads as follows:

"That the mayor and general council of said city shall have full power and authority to provide for the registration of voters prior to any municipal election in said city; to make all needful rules and regulations for the same, and require that no person be permitted to vote unless registered as aforesaid; to constitute and appoint the tax collector of Fulton county to the office of registrar of said city; to fix his compensation as such registrar, and when so appointed to require him to perform the duties of said office."

Section 2 of the act provided:

"That the registration intended under this act shall take effect at such time as the said mayor and general council shall fix by ordinance, and until then the present mode of registration for said city shall exist."

In pursuance of this amendment to the city charter, ordinances were adopted by the city carrying this legislation into effect. These ordinances were attached to and made a part of the answer of the city in this case, and they designated the tax collector of Fulton county or his assistants as authorized to register qualified voters of the city as they paid their taxes annually. Section 2131 of the City Code of Atlanta provides:

"It shall be the duty of the tax collector of Fulton county or his assistants to register the qualified voters of said city as they pay their taxes annually. For this purpose he shall have prepared printed blanks, containing the oath required of the voters proposing to register, in the form prescribed in this ordinance, and it shall be his duty to administer to such taxpayer wishing to register the required oath; and the voter shall subscribe to said oath in the presence of such collector or his assistants, who shall preserve all of said affidavits, and from them shall compile a book for each ward showing the names and residences of the qualified voters for each ward, giving streets and numbers, or, if no number, then giving the street each side or nearest to the numbers on street in front."

Section 2133:

"The collector, or his assistant, shall also register qualified voters taking the prescribed oath, even if they do not pay or offer to pay the taxes for the current year, and place their names on the books of their respective wards, as provided in the preceding sections," etc.

And then follows the oath to be required of all voters registering their names. It seems, therefore, that the charter amendment of the city of Atlanta and the ordinances passed in pursuance thereof provided for a general, and not for a special, registration. A special registration, as distinguished from a general registration, is one designed for a particular election, and which becomes functio officio when the election under which it was held has been had; that is to say, when the registration cannot be used for any other purpose. A general registration is one made up under general rules. In view of the foregoing and the evidence adduced on the trial, we hold that the registration for the election held on March 8, 1921, was a general, and not a special, registration. See Pol. Code 1910, §§ 41, 43, 46. And in so far as the two foregoing exceptions to the judgment of validation are concerned, the bonds which were validated by the trial judge were authorized by the election as provided in article 7, § 7, par. 1, of the Constitution, as amended by the Brown Amendment. Under the Brown Amendment to the Constitution two-thirds of the qualified voters voting at an election to incur a debt by the municipal corporation by the issuance of bonds, as prescribed by law, shall be sufficient for that purpose, provided, that two-thirds of the voters so voting shall be a majority of the registered voters, etc.

[3] 3. Exception is also taken to the judgment validating the bonds; and it is insisted that the same was void, because it did not affirmatively appear that the persons who voted in favor of the bonds constituted a majority of the registered voters of the city. It is insisted that article 2, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution (Civil Code [1910], § 6395), provides one of the qualifications of voters in this state. This constitutional provision is as follows:

"After the year 1908, elections by the people shall be by ballot, and only those persons shall be allowed to vote who have been first registered in accordance with the requirements of law."

Intervener insists, under this constitutional requirement, that the registrar did not require voters to comply with this provision as to registration, in that a large number of voters, including 10,000 women, had not qualified as registered voters of this state under the Constitution and statutes passed in pursuance thereof, and that this so invalidated the list that was made up that it is impossible for the court to determine from the evidence what was the number of registered voters legally voting; and the plaintiff in error contends that the burden of furnishing the proof by which the court could ascertain the number of legally registered voters in the city of Atlanta on the date of the election, in order to determine whether the bonds in question have been authorized by a majority of the legally registered voters of the city, was upon the plaintiff, and that this burden was not carried. It appears from the record that the oath to be required of all voters registering their names shall be in the following form:

"Georgia, Fulton County. I do swear, or affirm, that I am a citizen of the United States; that I am twenty-one years of age, or will be on the _____ day of _____ of this calendar year; that I have resided in this state for one year, and in this county for six months, immediately preceding the date of this oath, or will have so resided on the _____ day of this calendar year; that I have paid all the taxes which, since the adoption of the Constitution of 1877, have been required of me, except taxes for this year; that I possess the qualifications of an elector required by the constitutional amendment adopted in 1908; and that I am not disfranchised from voting by reason of any offense committed against the laws of the state. I further swear, or affirm, that I am a citizen of Atlanta, and reside in the _____ ward of the city of Atlanta, at No. _____ on _____ street, or in the _____ district G. M. My age is _____, my occupation is _____. (Sign here.)

"Sworn to and subscribed before me, this _____, 1921 _____, Registrar."

The city registrar testified that all those whose names were placed upon the general registration list for the city subscribed the oath. As to the registration of women voters, the plaintiff in error contends that—

"If enabling legislation be necessary to carry the last amendment of the federal Constitution into effect, that legislation has not been enacted."

The Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that the right of suffrage shall not be denied on account of sex. The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of operation in this state. Civil Code 1910, § 1. The Nineteenth Amendment became automatically operative on August 26, 1920. Graves v. Eubank, 205 Ala. 174, 87 South. 587. We are of the opinion that that amendment is self-executing, and that under it females are not now disqualified on account of their sex to register and to vote, but on the contrary they are qualified. Graves v. Eubank, supra. In Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 26 L. Ed. 567, the question was what effect the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States had upon the laws of Delaware, which were to the effect that all jurors should be "white male electors." It was held that the Fifteenth Amendment had the effect, ex proprio vigore, of striking from the laws of Delaware the word "white," and left the remainder of the law intact. So we think in the present case, where the Nineteenth Amendment strikes the word "male," as used in defining who may become qualified voters. The evidence in the case discloses that all of the females who registered swore that they had paid all taxes due by them, etc. And when they subscribed to the oath prescribed by the city, they were entitled to be registered and to vote in the municipal election. Civil Code 1910, § 41 et seq. We are also of the opinion that, where the attention of the voters was called to the contents of the oath by the city registrar, and they subscribed their names thereto, as testified by the city registrar, although they were not formally sworn, this was a substantial compliance with the requirement of the provision of the City Code as to administering the oath to such person qualifying for registration. Civil Code 1910, §§ 41-46, as to this being sufficient. And see Brumby v. Marietta, 132 Ga. 408 (2), 64 S. E. 321. See Civil Code 1910, §§ 42, 43. And when the plaintiff has thus made a prima facie case as to who constitute legal voters in said election, and that is denied by the intervener, the burden of proof is shifted from the plaintiff to the intervener to overcome the evidence offered by the plaintiff. The intervener offered no evidence. In the case of Harrell v. Whigham, 141 Ga. 322, 325, 80 S. E. 1010, 1012, it was said:

"If the petition of the solicitor general has alleged the facts required by the statute, and citizens are made parties for the purpose of contesting the validation of the bonds, necessarily they stand as quasi defendants. When they deny the substantial allegations of the petition of the solicitor general, this places upon him the burden of proving such allegations. In certain cases, where citizens who have become parties raise objections which do not appear in the pleadings between the solicitor general and the municipality, but which depend for their support upon aliunde evidence, the burden of sustaining such allegation is upon the citizens alleging them. Spencer v. City of Clarksville, 129 Ga. 627, 59 S. E. 274. This may be analogized to the affirmative pleading of a defendant in an ordinary action at law. In ordinary lawsuits, an allegation by the plaintiff and a denial by the defendant puts the burden upon the plaintiff. If the defendant sets up an additional affirmative plea as to it the burden is upon him."

As said above, we think the plaintiff made out a prima facie case. In the Spencer Case, 129 Ga. 627, 59 S. E. 274, the third headnote is as follows:

"When an intervener in a proceeding for the validation of bonds interposes objections based upon facts which do not appear in the pleadings of the parties, but which depend for the proof of their existence upon aliunde evidence, the burden is upon him to prove the alleged facts thus set up."

The intervener offered no evidence at all. He does not show by evidence, or otherwise, how many, if any, of the females who were registered and voted did so illegally. But, assuming that all of the 10,000 registered females who voted as shown by the record were registered and voted illegally, still, if all of these were deducted from the total number of registered voters, as shown by the record, viz. 27,070, this would leave 17,070 male registered voters. It appears from the record that the highest number of votes cast in favor of any issue of bonds was for public schools, viz. 21,633, and the smallest number cast for any issue of bonds was 1,034, and that the smallest vote cast against any issue was 513. So the vote cast for each of the issues of bonds was above 21,000 votes. Assuming, therefore, that all of the 10,000 females were disqualified, and that all voted for the bonds, deducting this number from the 21,000 votes cast for the various issues of bonds, this would leave 11,000 as voting for bonds out of the 17,070 registered male voters. Adding to the highest number of votes cast against any issue of bonds, viz. 1,034, to the number of votes for that issue, we have a total of 12,034 votes cast. The number of affirmative votes is therefore obviously more than two-thirds of the qualified voters who voted at said election, as well as a majority of the qualified voters of such municipality. Therefore, even if the 10,000 female registered voters should be excluded, the result of the election is the same, the bonds having received the requisite constitutional majority. See, in this connection, Civil Code 1910, § 126; Epping v. Columbus, 117 Ga. 263 (16), 43 S. E. 803; Brumby v. Marietta, 132 Ga. 408 (2), 64 S. E. 321.

[4] 4. It is insisted that a reversal of the judgment of the court below validating the bonds should be had, because the plaintiff did not carry the burden of proof in making out the case for validation. It is argued that the only proof as to the vote on the bonds was the introduction of the copy from the minutes of the city council, certified by the clerk, purporting to show a consolidation of the vote by the council, not jointly with the managers of the election, as required by the statute, but upon the returns previously made to them by the managers. We have already referred to the question of the burden of proof in such cases, in a preceding division of this opinion; and, with reference to the argument just referred to, it appears from the resolution consolidating the returns that "the consolidated returns of the duly elected election commissioners or managers, as made to the mayor and general council of this city, on this date, and consolidated and the result declared, shows that" the results were "In favor of each issue submitted to the voters in said election, and that the bonds were carried by the required number of votes; and the result is hereby accordingly declared and ordered spread upon the minutes." This consolidation was prima facie correct, and the burden would then be on the intervener to show that the result of the election was inaccurate and different from that submitted by the mayor and general council. Sewell v. Tallapoosa, 145 Ga. 19 (2), 88 S. E. 577. The intervener failed to carry this burden. Properly construed, we think the resolution means that the consolidated returns were made by the managers of the election and the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta.

JOHNSON v. STATE. (No. 2471.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Intoxicating liquors — 219—Accusation for allowing distilling apparatus on premises not demurrable.

An accusation in a city court charging a named person with the offense of a misdemeanor, "for that the defendant did [on a given date] * * * allow some person whose identity is unknown * * * to have and possess and locate on defendant's premises, in an outhouse within the curtilage of defendant's residence, a complete distilling apparatus for the distilling of intoxicating liquors," is not demurrable on the ground that the same is "insufficient because of its failure to designate 'what is meant by some person'"; nor is it demurrable on the ground that the name of the person allowed to possess and locate the distilling apparatus on the defendant's premises is not given.

2. Intoxicating liquors — 207—Accusation held to sufficiently describe premises on which defendant permitted distilling apparatus.

The premises upon which it is charged that the distilling apparatus was located are sufficiently described.

3. Intoxicating liquors — 209—Accusation held to sufficiently describe apparatus which defendant permitted on his premises.

Another ground of the demurrer challenges the accusation upon the ground that the expression "a complete distilling apparatus," the location of which is charged in the accusation, is insufficient because it does not disclose what is contemplated by the terms used. This ground is without merit, the accusation alleging that the complete distilling apparatus was for the distilling of intoxicating liquors, "consisting of a lard can, a galvanized pipe, coil, * * * there being a hole in the top of the can wherein the coil was inserted." This description was sufficient.

4. Intoxicating liquors — 143½, New, vol. 2A Key-No. Series—Permitting distilling apparatus on premises constitutes offense.

The demurrer on the ground that the accusation under consideration charges no offense under the law is without merit, when the provision of section 22 is read in connection with other sections of the act providing penalties for the violation of any of the provisions of the act,

5. Statutes §114(7)—Provision relative to permitting on premises distilling apparatus held within title of act to amend and supplement prohibition laws.

Section 22 of the act of the General Assembly of Georgia, entitled "An act to amend and supplement the prohibition laws of this state," approved March 28, 1917 (Georgia Laws Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 1), which makes it unlawful for any corporation, firm, or individual to knowingly permit or allow any one to have or possess or locate on his premises any apparatus for the distilling or manufacturing of the liquors specified in the act, is not unconstitutional on the ground that it contains matter different from what is expressed in the title of the act. One of the purposes for which the law was enacted, as expressed in the title, is to make it unlawful to distill or manufacture any intoxicating liquors in the state; and the provision of section 22 falls within the general scope and purpose of the act as indicated in the part of the caption recited, and makes the scheme of prohibition, so far as it relates to the manufacture of alcoholic liquors, more complete.

6. Criminal law §13—Statute against permitting distilling apparatus not too vague and uncertain for enforcement.

The section of the act upon which this accusation is based is not void upon the ground that it is too vague and uncertain for enforcement under the penal laws.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Nov. 29, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Sales §92—Agreement for rescission of contract for sale of mule not without consideration.

In January, 1919, defendants bought from plaintiff a mule, paying a part of the purchase price and giving a retention of title note for the remainder. Some weeks later one of the vendees, according to his evidence, complained to the vendor of the animal's inability to do farm work, and a new contract was orally made, by which the vendee was to keep the mule until fall and then return the animal to the vendor, whereupon the vendor would relieve him of further obligation. When reminded by the vendee of such alleged agreement, the vendor denied the same, and refused to take the animal back and cancel the debt, but filed an attachment for the purchase money, under which the mule was sold. On the trial of the issues raised by the declaration in attachment and the defendants' plea setting up the alleged rescission, the evidence was in conflict as to the alleged agreement of rescission. The jury found for the vendor the amount of proceeds realized from the sale of the mule, but for the vendee under his plea as to the balance claimed on the note. The plaintiff excepted to the refusal to grant a new trial. Held:

The alleged novation or contract of rescission, although executory, was not void as a nudum pactum, since it was supported not only by the vendee's promise to restore to the vendor the property in part paid for, but also to care for the animal until the following fall.

2. Appeal and error §173(6)—Statute of frauds not available when not raised below.

Even if the alleged contract of rescission or novation could be taken as such an agreement as is required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, and, if so, even if it was not taken out of such provisions by the equivalent of performance on the part of the vendee, since the record fails to disclose that such point was made in the court below, it cannot be raised in this court in the brief of counsel.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

BROYLES, C. J., and BLOODWORTH, J., concur.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the judgment of affirmance in this case. The defendant was accused and convicted of having operated an automobile over the highways of Tift county without having placed on the rear of the automobile a tag number plate. The evidence, both for the state and the defendant, was uncontradicted, and was in substance as follows: The defendant had paid the license tax, as required by law, to operate the automobile over the highways of the state. He had been furnished with two tags, one a small disk and the other a large tag to be displayed on the rear of his car, each of the tags carrying his license number and indicating his payment of the license tax. On the night before his arrest the tag displayed on the rear of his car was lost. He lived in the country, and he drove his car from his home in the country to the city of Tifton, and went at once to the sheriff and told him that he had lost the tag from his automobile, and inquired how he could procure a duplicate. The sheriff gave him instructions about how to get the duplicate tag for his car. The defendant inquired of the sheriff if it was all right to operate the car until the duplicate tag could be sent to him from the Secretary of State's office. The sheriff told him that it would be all right. He met a county policeman and stated to him the situation, and stated what he was doing and what the sheriff had advised him to do. The county policeman asked him if he had driven the truck from his farm to town on that morning without the tag being displayed on the rear of the truck. He stated to the policeman that he had. The policeman then stated to him that he would have to swear out a warrant for him and have him tried for violating the automobile law. He was arrested, and upon this evidence was convicted.

I do not concur in the judgment of affirmance, for the reason that there was no criminal intention upon the part of this defendant to violate a public law. He had paid his tax and by accident had lost the number off the rear of the car, and was doing everything in his power and moving immediately to procure the duplicate for which the law provides in the event of the loss of the original.

RASKIN v. MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF SAVANNAH. (No. 12264.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Answer of Supreme Court to certified question.

In answer to a question certified by this court in this case, the Supreme Court held: "An ordinance of the city of Savannah providing that 'any person who shall, in the night or day, disturb the peace and quiet of the city in any manner whatsoever, or shall be guilty of any riotous, disorderly, or improper conduct, or keep a disorderly house within the limits of the city of Savannah, * * * shall, on conviction before the police court, be fined * * * or imprisoned' (as therein provided), does not authorize the recorder of the city of Savannah to try and punish for acts committed beyond the corporate limits of the city, but within three miles thereof. This is true notwithstanding the provision of the act of the General Assembly approved August 11, 1906 (Ga. L. 1906, p. 1033), extending the jurisdiction of the police court of the city of Savannah 'to try all offenses against the laws and ordinances of the municipal government of the city of Savannah committed within the corporate limits of said city and within three miles thereof, and extending into the county of Chatham.' Under proper construction of the ordinance only acts committed within the corporate limits of the city of Savannah are declared to be unlawful." Raskin v. Mayor, etc., of Savannah, 108 S. E. 778, decided October 14, 1921.

2. Municipal corporations \S 642(1)—When ordinance did not apply to acts outside corporate limits, refusal to sanction certiorari held error.

Upon the trial of the case in the recorder's court of the city of Savannah, the evidence failed to show that the alleged offenses were committed within the limits of the city, and this point was specifically raised in the petition for certiorari. The judge of the superior court refused to sanction the petition, holding that as the act of the General Assembly of Georgia, approved August 11, 1906 (Ga. L. 1906, p. 1033), had extended the jurisdiction of the recorder's court of the city of Savannah to within three miles of the corporate limits of the city, and, as the petition for certiorari, in raising the question that the venue of the offenses charged had not been shown, alleged merely that it had not been proved that the offenses were committed within the limits of the city, the failure to prove the venue was not sufficiently averred in the petition. Under the ruling in the preceding paragraph, the refusal to sanction the petition was error.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Abe Raskin was convicted of violating an ordinance of the city of Savannah, and his petition for certiorari was denied by the judge of the superior court, and he brings

AMERICAN LAUNDRY CO. v. HALL
(No. 12125.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Nov. 29, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bailment §14(1) — Delivery of memorandum of articles received with notice of limitation of liability does not create contract limiting liability.

Where a bailee, such as a laundry company, in accepting articles of wearing apparel from a customer, leaves with the customer a paper containing a memorandum of the articles bailed, with a printed notice thereon to the effect that in the event of loss or damage to the articles the bailee's liability therefor shall not exceed a certain sum to be determined by its proportion to the amount charged for the laundering of the articles, the mere receipt by the customer of the memorandum containing such printed notice does not amount to an agreement and assent to the terms of the notice, and therefore there arises no special contract whereby the customer consents to any limitation of liability of the bailee on account of the latter's negligence.

2. Certiorari §68—Certiorari properly denied when evidence sufficient.

The evidence authorized the verdict rendered for the bailor against the bailee for an amount in excess of the limitation stated in the notice for the negligent loss and damage to the articles bailed. The judge of the superior court therefore did not err in overruling the petition for certiorari.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Accord and satisfaction §2(2), 5, 11(1), 20, 23, 27—Principal and agent §78(1)—Claim may be disputed or undisputed if agreement supported by consideration; defeats recovery when proved; adjustment of unliquidated claim is sufficient consideration; agent may set off claims against principal; dispute as to counterclaim renders claim a disputed one; acceptance of amount offered in full satisfaction of disputed claim is accord and satisfaction; no accord and satisfaction from the acceptance of offer as full satisfaction when claim not in bona fide dispute; when claim disputed, payment made and accepted as discharge is binding, though not more than was admitted to be due; bona fides and not merits of contention is controlling; bona fides generally question for jury; good faith of debtor in claiming set-off held for jury.

This was a suit for $1,000 alleged to be a balance due on account of insurance premiums collected by the defendants as general agents of the plaintiff. The defendants denied indebtedness, and set up as their primary defense a plea of accord and satisfaction. As a secondary defense they set up by way of recoupment a counterclaim in the amount sued for. The plea alleges that for several years the defendants had been the general agents of the plaintiff in their insurance business, under a contract providing for the termination of such agency after 90 days' written notice; that the plaintiff, through its special representative, had contracted to pay them $1,000, in consideration of the cancellation of their agency contract, without the giving of the stipulated previous notice so that new agents could be immediately substituted, and for the further consideration that the defendants should turn over their business, including new business, to the substituted agents, and in lieu of the full previous commissions thereon should accept a brokerage commission; that the defendants performed their part of this agreement; and that, after deducting the $1,000 credit thus due, they settled in full for all premiums collected by them. The sole dispute under both pleas relates to the credit claimed of $1,000. While the evidence as to the making of such an alleged contract by the special agent of the company, as well as his authority so to act, was in sharp conflict, the defendants offered testimony which might be taken to support this portion of their plea, together with evidence tending to show the plaintiff's ratification of the alleged agreement by the acceptance of benefits thereunder. By the plea of accord and satisfaction it is alleged, and it is undisputed under the evidence: That at the time the defendants made their last payment to the plaintiff, they had collected as premiums, and then held, the amount of $1,139.67. That on June 1, 1916, they made a remittance to the plaintiff of $139.67 by check, on the back of which and just above the place of indorsement was written the following: "Endorsement of this check is acknowledgment of payment in full of the following: If incorrect return to J. L. Riley & Co., Atlanta, Ga. Collections for February, March, April & May, 1916." That accompanying this check was a letter stating, by detailed items the balances due the company for collections of premiums during the four months stated on the check, and giving the total as $1,139.67, below which was written the following: "Less amount agreed upon by your Mr. S. B. Wright, Jr., Special Agent, for surrender of agency, $1,000.00—Check herewith, $139.67;" that the letter and the check were received by the plaintiff on June 5, 1916, and the check indorsed and cashed, and that in about two weeks thereafter the plaintiff made protest as to the allowance of the $1,000 credit. It is clear from the letters in evidence that the claim for this amount had been made and disputed long prior to the mailing of the check. Held:

1. All claims, whether disputed or undisputed, may furnish the subject-matter of an agreement in accord and satisfaction, provided such agreement, like all other contracts, is supported by a consideration. When such a valid plea is proved as laid, the rights of the creditor are controlled thereby.

(a) Where the amount of the claim is unliquidated, the mere adjustment of such a bona fide dispute by the express terms of a new agreement will of itself afford a valid consideration, sufficient to render the new agreement binding, and this would be true whether the new agreement had been actually performed or not. Sections 4326, 4328, Civil Code 1910.

(b) "As a general rule, when a principal sues his agent for an accounting or to recover money which has come into his hands by virtue of the agency, the agent has the right of set-off or counterclaim in order to enforce demands which he has against the principal." Clark & Skyles, Agency, § 427, p. 963. Such a bona fide dispute as to the right of the agent to a counterclaim which he would thus have a right to set-off against such an otherwise undisputed demand renders the claim, when taken as a whole, a disputed one. 1 R. C. L. 198, § 33; Tanner v. Merrill, 108 Mich. 58, 65 N. W. 664, 31 L. R. A. 171, 62 Am. St. Rep. 687.

(c) When a party makes an offer of a certain sum to settle a claim, the amount of which is in bona fide dispute, with the condition that the sum offered, if taken at all, must be received in full satisfaction of the claim, and the party receives the money, he takes it subject to the condition attached to it, and it will operate as an accord and satisfaction. Redmond v. Atlanta, etc. Ry., 129 Ga. 133, 141, 58 S. E. 874; Ryan v. Progressive Publishing Co., 16 Ga. App. 83 (1, 2), 84 S. E. 834. Such would not be the rule, however, where the claim is not in bona fide dispute, and where the party receiving the money or property merely accepts a portion of that which already belongs to him, and which the payer could not have withheld under any bona fide right or claim. Alfred Struck Co. v. Slicer, 23 Ga. App. 62, 65, 97 S. E. 455. In the case last cited, if the pleadings had not shown on their face that the defendant's contention, forming the basis of the alleged accord and satisfaction, was not bona fide, in that it was contrary to his express agreement governing the amount of his fee, the payment made in the alleged accord and satisfaction would have been sufficient to form the basis of such a plea, in that the defendant, to the benefit of the plaintiff, would have parted with something which he had a right to withhold, and such payment would not have amounted to a mere surrender of a portion of plaintiff's own property.

(d) Where any part of a claim is in good faith disputed, a payment thereon, when made and accepted as in discharge of the whole indebtedness, is binding accordingly, even though the payment should go no further than to cover the amount admitted to be due. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 178 U. S. 353, 367, 20 Sup. Ct. 924, 44 L. Ed. 1099; Ostrander v. Scott, 161 Ill. 339, 43 N. E. 1089; Melroy v. Kemmerer, 218 Penn. 381, 67 Atl. 699, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018, 120 Am. St. Rep. 888, Case Note, 1022; 1 R. C. L. 196, § 31.

(e) In determining the validity of an agreement in accord and satisfaction of a disputed claim, it is not the merit, but the bona fides, of the debtor's contention which is the controlling factor; and this, as a general proposition, is a question of fact for the jury. Ryan v. Progressive Publishing Co., supra. (3); Dickerson v. Dickerson, 19 Ga. App. 269, 91 S. E. 346. In the instant case the defendants, in their alleged agreement of accord and satisfaction, relied solely, as the basis of the contention then made, upon a previous agreement which they claimed had been made with the plaintiff through one of its agents, whereby the defendants were to receive $1,000 for the immediate surrender to the plaintiff of their agency. Since the evidence of the plaintiff disputes and denies in toto all of the defendant's evidence with respect to the existence of any such surrender agreement, whether valid or invalid, authorized or unauthorized, the question as to the good faith of the debtors' contention as then made should, for this reason, have been submitted to the jury.

2. Trial \S 176—Contention that evidence demands finding in party's favor does not authorize direction of contrary verdict if such position wrong.

While it is true that, "where both parties to a cause consent that the court direct a verdict, though each moves that it be directed in his own favor, neither party can complain that the court erred in directing a verdict, though the losing party may except upon the ground that the verdict directed is erroneous" (Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., v. Beard, 105 S. E. 629; Mims v. Johnson, 8 Ga. App. 850, 70 S. E. 139), yet, in the absence of any such agreement, "the mere fact that a party to a litigation contends that the evidence demands a finding in his favor does not amount to a concession that, if this position is not correct, a verdict may be directed in favor of the other party." Broadhurst v. Hill, 137 Ga. 833, 841, 74 S. E. 422.

3. Insurance \S 84(6)—Accord and satisfaction defeats liability without regard to plea of recoupment based on counterclaim and embraced in the agreement; finding that accord and satisfaction invalid because set-off not asserted in good faith defeats plea in recoupment.

If, in accordance with the rulings above made, it shall be again shown on the second trial that there had been an agreement in accord and satisfaction, and if it should further appear to the satisfaction of the jury that the agreement was valid for the reason that it was entered upon under and by virtue of a bona fide contention of the defendants, such a finding must necessarily and without more be taken as sufficient to relieve the defendants of liability under their primary defense of accord and satisfaction, without going into the additional or secondary defense setting up the validity of the same claim by way of recoupment; since the validity of such claim need not be determined under the second plea, when the mere bona fide insistence thereon is sufficient under the other plea to relieve the defendants of liability. If on the second trial the jury should find that there had been an agreement in accord and satisfaction, but that it was invalid, in that it was based on a contention of the defendants on which they did not in good faith insist, for the reason that no agreement of any sort had ever been made by which the plaintiff's alleged agent had agreed in its behalf to pay them the thousand dollars, then it necessarily follows that the additional plea of recoupment could not avail; since it is based, not only upon the existence of such a contract, but upon its validity as well. It might be said, however, that if on the second trial the defense of accord and satisfaction should not be relied on, and the defendants' evidence offered under the plea of recoupment should be the same, it would require a finding of the jury upon the question as to whether or not the alleged contract with the special agent had been made, and, if so, whether he was acting within the scope of his authority, and, if not, whether the contract, if made, was ratified by the acts and conduct of the plaintiff. Roberts v. Bank of Eufaula, 20 Ga. App. 221, 92 S. E. 1015.

PLANTERS' BANK v. WARE. (No. 12404.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Nov. 29, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Husband and wife §155—Married woman may borrow money for payment of husband's debts, but not from creditor.

A married woman borrowed from a bank $1,500, $1,000 of which, according to her own testimony, was procured for the purpose of enabling her husband to buy out his partner's interest in a partnership. A check in the amount of the loan was turned over by the bank to the wife, who, after indorsing it, delivered it to her husband. On the same day and in one contemporaneous transaction, the husband disposed of this check and of certain other moneys belonging to him, as follows: $1,000 was paid to the partner in purchase of his partnership interest, and other and larger sums were paid by the husband to the bank on debts owing to the bank by the partnership. Held: A married woman may lawfully borrow money and give it to her husband to apply in satisfaction of his debts (Allen v. National Bank of Tifton, 14 Ga. App. 299, 80 S. E. 691); but if the lender is the husband's creditor and makes the loan to the wife for the purpose of collecting his own indebtedness, her obligation cannot be enforced (Ginsberg v. People's Bank, 145 Ga. 815, 89 S. E. 1086).

2. Husband and wife §155—That part of obligation represents husband's debt does not relieve wife from another portion definitely ascertained.

That a part of an obligation contracted by a married woman represents a debt of the husband would not relieve her from liability for any portion for which she may have become legally bound, provided such respective portions may be definitely ascertained and separated. Johnston v. Gullede, 115 Ga. 981(1), 42 S. E. 354; Jones v. Harrell, 110 Ga. 373 (1, 2), 375, 35 S. E. 690; Lanier v. Olliff, 117 Ga. 397(2), 43 S. E. 711.

3. Husband and wife §232(1)—Married woman held to have burden of showing obligation for borrowed money represented husband's debt; evidence held not to show money borrowed by wife was used to pay husband's debt to lender.

In the instant suit by the bank on the note thus made by the married woman, it was incumbent upon her to show that her obligation represented the debt due the bank by her husband; and since, under the undisputed evidence of the bank's officials, $1,000 of the loan went to the partner of the husband in purchase of the partnership business, in accordance with what the wife herself testified was the agreement and understanding, and since the contemporaneous payments to the bank on the partnership debts are by undisputed evidence fully accounted for as having been made out of other funds held by and belonging to the husband, except as to $500, the defendant failed to carry the burden imposed by her plea in respect to the $1,000 portion of the loan. The verdict for the defendant was therefore unauthorized, and the court erred in overruling the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

1. Frauds, statute of \S 32—Undertaking whereby promisor substituted and original promisor released not within statute.

"The provision of the statute of frauds which requires that the promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another must be in writing, in order to bind the promisor does not include an original undertaking whereby a new promisor, for a valuable consideration, substitutes himself as the party who is to perform, and the original promisor is thereby released." Williams v. Garrison, 21 Ga. App. 44(1), 93 S. E. 510.

2. Trial \S 259(1)—Failure to charge more fully not error, in absence of written requests.

While the charge might have submitted to the jury the contentions of the defendant more completely and fully, there were no written requests to charge; the instructions were sufficient, and the charge was not harmful for any of the reasons assigned.

3. New trial \S 70—Properly denied when evidence sufficient.

There was evidence to support the verdict, and the court did not err in failing to grant a new trial.

STEPHENS, J. (dissenting). To my mind only one inference can be drawn from either the allegations in the petition as amended or from the entire evidence, and that is that the obligation alleged to have been assumed by the defendant, Sam Callaway, to the plaintiff was to answer for the debt of Brantley Callaway, who was not released, and that such promise of the defendant, not being in writing, was within the statute of frauds, and therefore unenforceable.

HEWITT v. STATE. (No. 12773.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 1178—Exceptions not argued treated as impliedly abandoned.

Exceptions not specifically argued in the brief for the excepting party in this court will be treated as impliedly abandoned, and will not be considered where there is "no general insistence upon all the grounds of the motion."

2. Criminal law \S 596(1), 1151—Applications for continuances are addressed to court's discretion, which is reviewable only for plain abuse; denial not abuse of discretion when there were other witnesses to same facts.

"All applications for continuances are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial judge (Pen. Code 1910, § 992), and his decision thereon will not be reversed unless there has been a plain, palpable, and flagrant abuse of this discretion."

3. Judges \S 46—Relative guaranteeing payment of attorney's fee not a "voluntary prosecutor."

The fact that one has "contracted to guarantee the payment of the fee to be paid by the prosecutor to an attorney employed to aid the solicitor general in the prosecution of defendant" does not make him a volunteer prosecutor.

4. Criminal law \S 867, 956(13)—Remarks of sheriff and prosecuting counsel not ground for mistrial when not shown to have been heard by jury.

Under the facts of this case the judge properly refused to provide a new panel of jurors from which to strike, or to declare a mistrial.

5. Criminal law \S 1064(1)—Special ground of motion for new trial must be complete.

Before a special ground of the motion for a new trial will be considered, it must be complete within itself, and understandable without reference to other parts of the record.

6. Sufficiency of evidence.

There is some evidence to support the verdict.

S. Thos. Memory, of Blackshear, for plaintiff in error.

A. B. Spence, Sol. Gen., of Waycross, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] 1. As the alleged errors of the court in rejecting certain affidavits in support of the sixth and seventh grounds of the motion for a new trial, and upon the rejection of which error is assigned in the bill of exceptions, are not referred to in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, they will be treated as impliedly abandoned, and will not be considered by this court where there is no "general insistence upon all the grounds of the motion." Ga. L. 1921, p. 232, § 1.

[2] 2. Where a motion was made to continue a case on account of the absence of a witness, and it was made to appear that there were present several other witnesses who would testify to the same facts, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that there was a "plain, palpable, and flagrant abuse" of the discretion of the trial judge when he refused to continue the case. Especially should a new trial not be granted in this case on account of the refusal of the judge to grant a continuance, as among the witnesses sworn there were three who testified to the same material fact to which it was alleged the absent witness would swear.

"It is not cause for reversing the denial of a continuance that the movant made a legal showing as to the absence of one witness; it appearing by the same showing, on cross-examination, that another witness was present by whom he could prove the facts to which the absent witness was expected to testify, and it not appearing that the discretion of the court was abused." Huffman v. State, 95 Ga. 469 (2), 20 S. E. 216.

In Curry v. State, 17 Ga. App. 377 (1), 87 S. E. 685, this court held that—

"All applications for continuances are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial judge (Penal Code, § 992), and his decision thereon will not be reversed unless there has been a plain, palpable, and flagrant abuse of this discretion"—citing Sealy v. State, 1 Ga. 213, 44 Am. Dec. 641; Howell v. State, 5 Ga. 48; Roberts v. State, 14 Ga. 6; Revel v. State, 26 Ga. 275; Long v. State, 38 Ga. 491; Oglesby v. State, 121 Ga. 602, 49 S. E. 706; Rawlins v. State, 124 Ga. 31, 52 S. E. 1; Lyles v. State, 130 Ga. 294, 60 S. E. 578; Parker v. State, 3 Ga. App. 336, 59 S. E. 823.

See, also, Blount v. State, 18 Ga. App. 204 (1), 89 S. E. 78.

[3] 3. The fifth ground of the motion for a new trial alleges error "because the court erred in overruling the motion made by defendant to disqualify his honor, J. I. Summerall, presiding in said case," the alleged reason for his disqualification being that—

"One T. L. Tuten was a volunteer prosecutor and an illegitimate son of John Aspinwall, and that the said T. L. Tuten was related to his honor, J. I. Summerall, within the degree prohibited by the statute; that the said T. L. Tuten had contracted and guaranteed the payment of the fee to be paid by the prosecutor to an attorney, R. G. Mitchell, Jr., employed to aid the solicitor general in the prosecution of the defendant, Will Hewitt, in said case, and that the said attorney was actually rendering such aid on the trial of the case at the time of said motion."

Section 4642 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides in part that—

No judge "can sit in any cause or proceeding in which he is pecuniarily interested, or related to either party within the fourth degree of consanguinity or affinity."

In Luke v. Batts, 11 Ga. App. 783 (3), 76 S. E. 165, it was held that—

"The statutory grounds of the disqualification of a judicial officer, as contained in Civil Code, § 4642, are exhaustive. Elliott v. Hipp, 134 Ga. 844, 68 S. E. 736, 137 Am. St. Rep. 272, 20 Ann. Cas. 423."

While in Lyens v. State, 133 Ga. 587 (4), 66 S. E. 792, it was held that:

"Where one contributes to a fund to be used in employing an attorney to aid the solicitor general in the prosecution of a particular person for an alleged offense with which he is charged, and the attorney does render such aid upon the trial of the case, the person so contributing is to be considered as a volunteer prosecutor, and one who is related within the fourth degree to such volunteer prosecutor is not competent to sit as a juror on such trial"

—this rule will not be extended to one who has only "contracted to guarantee the payment of the fee to be paid by the prosecutor to the attorney employed to aid the solicitor general in the prosecution of the defendant."

[4] 4. The sixth ground of the motion for a new trial is based upon an alleged error in the refusal of the court to allow to the defendant "a new panel of jurors from which to strike, on the ground that such evidence and statements were prejudicial to the rights of defendant, and were very damaging to him, denying him the right to a fair and impartial trial." Ground 7 alleges that the court erred in overruling a motion to declare a mistrial, for the same reason alleged in ground 6. The "evidence and statements" referred to were a conversation between the sheriff and counsel employed to assist the state. The sheriff testified that he approached the said counsel and asked him if he had any objection to the jury going to the speaking that night (a speech at the courthouse by Mr. Bryan), and he said that "he did not, and didn't suppose you [counsel for the defendant] had any." The sheriff then said: "Well, Judge Summerall told me that Mr. Memory [counsel for the defendant] objected to it." Even if the error alleged in either of these grounds would be sufficient to require the grant of a new trial in the event the conversation was heard by the jury, before it could avail the movant it must affirmatively appear with reasonable certainty that the conversation was loud enough to be heard by members of the jury, and in this case it does not so appear from any legal evidence adduced. On the contrary, the sheriff testified:

"I was not talking nothing like loud enough for them to hear it. I do not think they heard it. The whole court was in an uproar. Mr. Mitchell was talking in a low tone like I was. I went and leant over there and asked him about it. * * * I just thought I would speak to him just between me and him, and I don't think the jury heard it. They were making a big racket around here. They were in the box at the time."

He further testified that some of the jurors were 12 or 15 feet from him, and others possibly 20 feet away. The above ruling is correct even though upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial on the following morning one of the attorneys for plaintiff in error swore:

"I am associated in the representation of this defendant. I heard the sheriff's statement just now that he was speaking in the same tone that he was using when he was talking to Judge Mitchell last night about this entertainment, and I could understand what he said."

The attention of this witness was, by the very circumstances themselves, directed to what the sheriff was then saying, and this witness further testified that he did not know "what the jury was doing," or "how much racket was in the courthouse" the night before when the sheriff was talking to counsel who was assisting the solicitor general.

[5] 5. The eighth ground of the motion for a new trial will not be considered by this court, because it is not complete within itself and not understandable without reference to other parts of the record.

[6] 6. Under a charge to which no exceptions were taken, and which will be presumed to be full and correct, the jury passed upon the contested questions of fact; their finding was approved by the presiding judge, there was evidence which positively identified the accused as the assailant of the prosecutor, and this court cannot say that there is no evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

Criminal law \S 1023(12)—Revocation of parole not reviewable as final judgment.

This case is controlled by the principle announced in Antonopoulos v. State, 107 S. E.

359, where it was held: "Where one is sentenced for a violation of a criminal statute, and, under the provisions of the acts of the General Assembly approved August 16, 1913 (Laws 1913, p. 112; Park's Pen. Code, §§ 1081 [a], [b], [c], [d]), on certain conditions named in the order, is allowed to serve the sentence 'outside the confines of the chain gang, jail, or other place of detention,' and while serving the sentence violates the terms of his parole, and the court, upon the defendant being brought before it, and after due examination, revokes its leave to the defendant to serve his term outside the chain gang or other place of detention, this is not such a final judgment as is subject to review on a bill of exceptions." See Antonopoulos v. State, 151 Ga. 466, 107 S. E. 158.

Under the above ruling the writ of error must be and is dismissed.

DEWITT v. STATE. (No. 12836.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Burglary \S 27—Indictment for having possession of explosives, etc., held sufficient.

The general demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled.

2. Burglary \S 27—Indictment for having possession of explosives, etc., need not allege whether offense was committed in daytime or nighttime.

An indictment drawn under section 183 (a) of Park's Penal Code need not specify whether the alleged violation of the law occurred in daytime or at night.

3. Indictment and Information \S 110(18)—Indictment in language of statute for having possession of explosives, burglar's tools, etc., held not defective.

The indictment was not subject to demurrer on the ground that it contained the generic terms "implements and things," and "other crime," without specifying the particular implements and things or naming the specific crime.

4. Criminal law §814(17)—Failure to charge on circumstantial evidence not error when there was direct evidence.

It is only where a case is wholly dependent on the law of circumstantial evidence that the trial judge is required to give in charge to the jury the law of circumstantial evidence.

5. Criminal law §814(15)—Instruction as to accomplice's testimony not required when there was no evidence that witness was accomplice.

"Where there was no evidence that a witness for the state was an accomplice, the court was not bound to charge Pen. Code 1896, § 991 [section 1017 of the Penal Code of 1910], as to the necessity of corroboration, even though the defendant contended the witness was an accomplice." Robinson v. State, 84 Ga. 674, 11 S. E. 544.

6. Sufficiency of evidence.

The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

F. Dewitt was convicted of an offense, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Porter & Mebane, of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

E. S. Taylor, Sol. Gen., of Summerville, and J. F. Kelly, of Rome, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. The indictment in this case is based upon section 183 (a) of Park's Penal Code (Ga. L. 1910, p. 136) and is as follows:

That the defendant, "feloniously and with force and arms, did unlawfully have in his possession an eight-ounce bottle containing about seven ounces of nitroglycerin, and eight dynamite caps with fuses attached to them, and six dynamite caps without fuses and other explosives, and other implements and things adapted, designed, and commonly used for the commission of burglary, larceny, safe cracking, and other crimes, with the intent to use, employ, and allow the same to be used and employed in the commission of a crime and did then and there know that the same were so intended to be used."

To this indictment a general demurrer and special demurrers were filed. These were overruled. Upon the trial the accused was convicted. He made a motion for a new trial, this was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The indictment, with sufficient fullness and certainty, sets out a crime, and the general demurrer thereto was properly overruled.

[2] 2. The second ground of the demurrer is as follows:

"Because it is not alleged in said bill of indictment whether the defendant had in his possession said nitroglycerin, dynamite caps, explosives, and other implements adapted, designed, and used for the commission of burglary, larceny, safe cracking, and other crimes in the day or night time."

There is no merit in this ground of the demurrer. Where an act provides that it shall be unlawful for a person to have in his possession "in the day or night time" certain enumerated implements and things, the plain purpose of the act is to prevent any person from having these articles in his possession at any time, either in the day or in the night. As the punishment is the same whether the possession be in the day or in the nighttime, these words could well have been left out of the act. Had a different punishment been provided for having any of these implements or things in the day and having them in the night, then it would have been necessary to allege in the indictment the specific time, whether day or night, "in order to regulate the appropriate punishment for the particular offense." See Wingard v. State, 13 Ga. 400 (2); Hinton v. State, 68 Ga. 323 (1).

[3] 3. The third and fourth grounds of the demurrer will be discussed together. They are as follows:

"Because said bill of indictment alleges that the defendant was in possession of other implements and things, adapted, designed, and commonly used for the commission of burglary, and so on, without alleging what the other implements and other things consisted of. That said bill of indictment should set forth of what said implements and other things consisted. That the terms 'implements and things' is only a conclusion, and such description is indefinite. That because of said bill of indictment failing to set forth of what said implements and things consisted, the defendant cannot properly prepare his defense in said case."

"Defendant demurs to the words in said bill of indictment, 'other crimes,' and says that said bill of indictment should set forth of what said other crimes consist. That the defendant cannot properly prepare his defense to said charge because he is not advised of what said other crimes consist. That the expression so used in said bill of indictment, 'other crimes,' is a conclusion of the pleader, and for said reason is demurrable."

The accused was charged with a statutory offense, and the indictment follows substantially the language of the statute. Section 954 of the Penal Code of 1910 provides that—

"Every indictment or accusation of the grand jury shall be deemed sufficiently technical and correct, which states the offense in the terms and language of this Code, or so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury."

In Stoner v. State, 5 Ga. App. 717, 63 S. E. 602, this court held that—

"As a rule, it is sufficient in an indictment for a purely statutory offense to describe the offense in the words of the statute"—citing Penal Code, § 954; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, 359; 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 520.

The Supreme Court, in Glover v. State, 126 Ga. 594 (1), 55 S. E. 592, held:

"An indictment which charges the offense defined by a legislative act in the language of the act, where the description of the acts alleged as constituting the offense is full enough to put the defendant on notice of the offense with which he is charged, is sufficiently specific."

The indictment in this case not only follows substantially the language of the statute, but it is so plain that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury, and is sufficiently full and specific to meet all the objects requiring particularity in setting out an offense enumerated by the Supreme Court in Wingard v. State, 13 Ga. 400 (2). The court did not err in overruling the third and fourth grounds of the demurrer. See, in this connection, Barbour v. State, 21 Ga. App. 243, 94 S. E. 272.

[4] 4. There was direct evidence to connect the defendant with the crime charged. "It is only where a case is wholly dependent upon the law of circumstantial evidence that the trial judge is required to give the law of circumstantial evidence." The indictment being supported by direct as well as circumstantial evidence, it was not erroneous for the court to fail to charge the law of circumstantial evidence. Williamson v. State, 22 Ga. App. 787, 97 S. E. 195. See cases cited.

[5] 5. There being in this case no evidence to authorize it, the court did not err "in failing to give in charge to the jury the law of accomplice and instruct the jury that it could not convict the defendant on the testimony of the accomplice unless the testimony of said accomplice was corroborated by other witnesses or other corroborating circumstances in the case." This is true even though the defendant contended that the witness was an accomplice. Walker v. State, 118 Ga. 34 (2), 44 S. E. 850. Where there is an accomplice but the state does not rely entirely upon his evidence to connect the accused with the offense, it is not incumbent upon the court, without request, to instruct the jury touching corroboration. Robinson v. State, 84 Ga. 674 (1), 11 S. E. 544; Cantrell v. State, 141 Ga. 98 (3), 80 S. E. 649.

[6] 6. The evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict, no error of law is shown to have been committed, the finding of the jury is approved by the presiding judge, and the motion for a new trial was properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Sales \S 384(4)—Seller not entitled to recover freight charges on refused property.

Where personal property is shipped by a seller to a purchaser under a contract of sale whereby the purchaser is obligated to pay the freight charges, the contract price having been agreed upon and fixed so as to include a sum sufficient to cover such charges, the seller, who has after the purchaser's breach of the contract in refusing to accept and receive the goods from the carrier at the point of destination, paid the freight charges and retained the property for his own use, cannot, since the purchaser is under no contractual obligation to pay the freight charges as such, recover the cost of such charges from the purchaser; but the seller's remedy is a suit against the purchaser for a breach of the contract, under the Civil Code 1910, \S 4181, where his measure of damage is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place for delivery.

2. Sales \S 384(4)—Seller not entitled to recover return freight charges.

The seller's entire damage for a breach by the purchaser of such a contract being the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place for delivery, it follows that the seller not only is not entitled to recover from the purchaser the freight charges above set out, but cannot recover the freight charges incurred by him in shipping the property from the point of destination back to the original shipping point.

1. Evidence \Leftrightarrow 432—Parol evidence admissible to show partial failure of consideration for note sued on.

Where negotiable promissory note purports to have been given "for value received," and suit is brought thereon by the payee, the maker may plead and by parol prove what the real consideration is, for the purpose of showing that the consideration has either totally or partially failed.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 302(3)—Ground of motion for new trial not setting forth evidence excluded not considered.

A ground of a motion for a new trial complaining of the exclusion of certain documentary evidence will not be considered when the evidence referred to is not set forth either literally or in substance in the motion or attached to it as an exhibit.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Duke Davis, Judge.

Action by the Bank of La Grange against C. H. Revis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. H. Thompson, of La Grange, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. Moon, of La Grange, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. The Bank of La Grange sued C. H. Revis, Sr., on a promissory note for the principal sum of $1,259.94, less certain credits, and for interest and attorney's fees. The defendant answered that he was not indebted to the plaintiff in the sum stated, alleging that the note sued on included $500 and interest on another note, which he had previously paid, and that therefore the note was without consideration as to the sum of $500. The case proceeded to trial, and the verdict was adverse to the defendant. He made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is as follows:

"Because the court erred in ruling out the following evidence of the defendant, O. H. Revis, on the objections of the plaintiff's counsel: On direct examination defendant sought to show by the witness C. H. Revis, the defendant, as follows: 'Q. You say that you executed the note sued on. What was the consideration of the note? A. There were executions and claims against me, amounting to $750, which the plaintiff took up and paid off. Some time before that I had borrowed $500 of the plaintiff, giving my note therefor, and also executing a deed to secure the note. Later on I paid off this $500 note and interest to the plaintiff and the deed was canceled off record. At the time I executed the note sued on I observed that it included the $500 note which I had previously paid off. This note for $500 was never delivered back to me when paid, and I called plaintiff's attention to it at the time I signed the note sued on. Mr. Render, the president of the bank, then and there stated that he would credit this last note with the $500. I then signed the same. The credit was never placed thereon and he is suing me for $500 more than I owe on this note. I have not received any consideration on this note for the $500 which I had formerly paid. The only amount I am due on the note now sued on is $759.94 less the credits appearing on the note and those credits for which I have the receipts.'"

The court excluded this evidence, on the ground that parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of a written contract. In doing so we think he erred, since the defendant was not trying to vary the terms of a written contract, but was endeavoring to show by the evidence excluded that there had been a partial failure of consideration. This the law recognizes he has a right to do, notwithstanding the general parol evidence rule, it being no longer an open question in this state that—

"One is not precluded from showing by parol that the real consideration of a contract is in fact different from the one actually recited in the instrument, for the purpose of proving that what is thus shown to be the true consideration has failed." Rheney v. Anderson, 22 Ga. App. 417, 418, 96 S. E. 217.

See, also, Anderson v. Brown, 72 Ga. 713 (3); Burke v. Napier, 106 Ga. 327, 32 S. E. 134; Camp v. Matthews, 143 Ga. 393, 85 S. E. 196; Simmons v. International Harvester Co., 22 Ga. App. 358, 96 S. E. 9.

[2] The only other special assignment of error complains of the exclusion of a deed tendered in evidence by the defendant, and this ground, under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, cannot be considered, since the documentary evidence referred to is not set forth either literally or in substance in the ground of the motion for a new trial or in an exhibit thereto. Arnold v. Mitchell, 23 Ga. App. 658, 99 S. E. 135, and cases cited.

For the reason stated above, the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

SOUTHERN FLOUR & GRAIN CO. v. CENTRAL TEXAS EXCH. NAT. BANK.
(No. 12110.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Nov. 1, 1921. Rehearing Denied
Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers ⇐58—Bank with which draft attached to bill of lading deposited held owner of the grain shipped.

Where a purchaser orders from a seller grain which is consigned by the seller to itself, with a memorandum on the bill of lading to notify the purchaser, and contemporaneously the seller draws a draft on the purchaser for the price of the grain, payable to a bank, to which is attached the bill of lading, indorsed by the seller, or in blank, and deposits with the bank the draft with bill of lading attached, and the amount of the deposit is credited to the depositor's general account, the bank becomes the purchaser of the draft with bill of lading attached, and the owner of the grain represented thereby.

2. Carriers ⇐58—Bank holding draft with bill of lading held entitled to maintain trover when purchaser refused to pay or surrender grain; bank suing in trover entitled to amount of draft with interest when not more than highest value of grain.

Where, in the case above stated, the bank presents the draft, with the bill of lading, to the purchaser of the grain and demands payment, and the purchaser refuses to pay the draft or to deliver the grain on demand, the bank has the right to bring an action of trover against the purchaser and to demand a verdict for the amount of the draft, with 7 per cent. interest, where the amount is not more than the highest proved value of the grain between the date of the conversion and the trial. O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Woodley, 118 Ga. 116, 44 S. E. 980; Milltown Lumber Co. v. Carter, 5 Ga. App. 353, 63 S. E. 270.

3. Carriers ⇐58—In trover by bank holding draft with bill of lading, direction of verdict for amount of draft with interest held not error.

There was no error in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the draft with 7 per cent. interest, this being less than the highest proved value of the grain, which the plaintiff had elected to take, and which the evidence, with all reasonable inferences and deductions therefrom, proved was its legal right.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Carriers ⇐58—Evidence held not to show seller was agent of holder of bill of lading in making agreement with buyer.

Where the sellers of grain deposited bill of lading and draft for the price with a bank, evidence held not to show that the sellers' representative in agreeing that the buyer might hold such grain as a margin against loss on other shipments was acting for or on behalf of the bank.

5. Carriers ⇐58—Evidence held not to show that bank holding draft and bill of lading surrendered its title.

Where a bank holding the draft and bill of lading for a shipment of grain permitted it to be delivered to the buyer for storage to prevent damage to the grain, evidence held not to show that it surrendered its title thereto.

6. Carriers ⇐58—Doctrine as to innocent person to bear loss from third person's acts held inapplicable against holder of bill of lading.

Where the bank, holding the draft and bill of lading for a shipment of grain, permitted delivery to the buyer for storage, and the sellers thereafter agreed that the buyer might hold it as margin to protect against loss on other shipments, the doctrine that the one of two innocent persons who put it in the power of a third person to inflict injury must bear the loss could not be invoked against the bank's legal rights.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Central Texas Exchange National Bank against the Southern Flour & Grain Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The Central Texas Exchange National Bank brought an action of trover against the Southern Flour & Grain Company for two carloads of oats. At the appearance term the defendant filed a general denial. At the beginning of the trial it filed two amendments, setting up in substance the following defenses: The defendant had purchased from the firm of McKie & Tilton, in Waco, Tex., a number of carloads of oats to be shipped to Atlanta, Ga. These oats were shipped by the firm in Texas under bills of lading with attached drafts on the defendant, drawn by the firm and payable to the plaintiff bank. It was claimed by the defendant that a number of these carloads did not come up to the grade contracted for, and thereupon the defendant and the sellers of the oats began negotiations for the purpose of adjusting the contracts between them as to the grades of the oats, including the two carloads involved in the present suit. When these carloads arrived in Atlanta they were graded "hot, musty, and wet." Thereupon the defendant wired to McKie & Tilton, informing them of the defective condition of these two carloads; their telegram containing the following: "Instruct bank to release lading. Will store in order to save ruining." The drafts and bills of lading covering these two cars were in the hands of the Third National Bank of Atlanta, having been forwarded by the plaintiff bank for collection. On receipt of this telegram from the defendant, McKie, of McKie & Tilton, went to the plaintiff bank in Waco and exhibited the telegram, requesting the bank for a release of the bills of lading, in order that the cars might be stored, and asked that it be complied with. Thereupon the plaintiff bank telegraphed the Third National Bank, authorizing it to surrender to the defendant the bills of lading covering the two cars involved in the suit.

It is further alleged by the grain company, as a matter of defense, that at this time there were also seven cars of oats in Atlanta against which drafts on the grain company and bills of lading were held for collection by the Third National Bank, against which the grain company held various claims arising out of off grades of the oats purchased from McKie & Tilton. At this time McKie, of the firm of McKie & Tilton, went to Atlanta for the purpose of adjusting the differences, and had an interview with the president of the grain company. As a result of this interview McKie agreed with the grain company that if it would pay the drafts against the seven other cars the grain company might hold the two cars involved in this suit, and which had been released for storage as a margin to cover deductions justified by off grades in the seven cars paid for, and the defendant alleged that the off grades of the seven cars totaled $840.06, which in the present suit is set up by the grain company as a counterclaim against the claim of the plaintiff bank.

The grain company alleges also as a matter of defense that it had no notice, and did not know until after it had paid the drafts covering the seven cars that the bills of lading covering the two cars in suit belonged to the plaintiff bank. It further alleges that the plaintiff bank authorized McKie, of the firm of McKie & Tilton, to come to Atlanta for the purpose of adjusting the differences alleged, and that any arrangement or adjustment made by McKie with the grain company in Atlanta was made when he was acting as the agent of the plaintiff bank, and for this reason the bank was bound by McKie's agreement with the grain company that the two cars in suit should be left with the defendant to indemnify it for any differences in the grades of the oats.

The undisputed evidence showed that drafts covering the cars in question were drawn on the defendant grain company by McKie & Tilton, payable to the plaintiff bank, which drafts the plaintiff bank bought, paying the full amount thereof, and credited to the account of McKie & Tilton, the bills of lading representing the oats being attached to the drafts, thereby putting the title to the oats in the bank. Subsequently the plaintiff bank released the bills of lading covering the two cars in suit, in compliance with the request of McKie & Tilton, made in pursuance of the telegram from the grain company, solely for the purpose of storing, in order to prevent the ruin of the oats, and the grain company was never authorized to make any other disposition of the oats, unless the plaintiff was bound by the agreement of McKie in reference thereto. The evidence further showed that immediately after the grain company got possession of the two cars of oats it began to sell them, receiving 20 to 24 cents a bushel more than the amount of the original purchase price. The bill of exceptions contains a large mass of evidence touching the grades and conditions of the oats in the other cars received by the defendant from McKie & Tilton, with a view of establishing the amount of the alleged counter-claim. On the question of the agency of McKie for the plaintiff bank the only evidence of a positive character throwing any light thereon is found in the evidence of Mr. Du Pree, an officer of the plaintiff bank, who testified as follows:

"I have not at any time, either directly or through any authorized agent, surrendered our claim of ownership over those two cars of oats covered by the bills of lading referred to. The suit being conducted in Atlanta, Ga., about these two cars of oats, is being prosecuted with my knowledge and authority. The account of McKie & Tilton was credited in full upon the date the items were deposited in our bank. The telegram from the Southern Flour & Grain Company, under date of September 12, asking McKie & Tilton for the privilege of storing these cars, or rather the contents of the cars, was immediately brought to the bank by McKie & Tilton, and they requested that we grant the permission, which was done. It was not the purpose or intention of the bank, in the granting of their request, to give authority to them to sell it; these are new people to us. We knew nothing about them and we were simply seeking to assist our customers in coming to a common understanding with their client, and this was followed by Mr. McKie's visit to Atlanta, upon which occasion he hoped to do the same thing."

Referring to the same subject Mr. Hoppe, the president of the defendant grain company, testified that—

"Mr. McKie stated the purpose of his visit was to adjust the claims on the cars we had paid and on those that were unpaid, and the payment of the drafts held in the Third National Bank, including the drafts covering the cars sued on. * * * He said that if we would pay the seven drafts we could hold the two cars turned over to us without pay to protect us against any loss or difference in grade of the seven cars unpaid. * * * Mr. McKie did not tell me, while he was in Atlanta, at any time before we paid those seven drafts, that these drafts and the two drafts covering the two cars sued for belonged to the Central Texas Exchange National Bank. * * * He told me they were his, and, as I stated in this answer, that we could hold them as a margin."

Evidence was also introduced to show that demand for the payment of the drafts covering the two carloads of oats was made on the defendant grain company subsequently to the negotiations between McKie and the grain company and the refusal by the grain company either to pay the drafts drawn on it for the oats or to return the oats. At the conclusion of the evidence the judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the drafts.

McElreath & Scott, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] 1. Under well-settled law and the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court, the undisputed evidence proved that the plaintiff bank held title to the two carloads of oats involved in the suit.

"Where a consignor of goods delivers them to a common carrier to be transported to a distant point, consigned to the order of the shipper, with direction to notify a designated person at the place of delivery, and a bill of lading is duly issued by the carrier to the consignor, and the latter attaches the bill of lading to his draft for the price of the goods on the person to be notified, and delivers it with the bill of lading, which is indorsed in blank, to his bank to be placed to his credit on his general account, and the amount of the deposit is credited to the depositor's general account and drawn against by him, the bank acquires title to the goods represented by the bill of lading." Alexander v. First National Bank of Fresno, 140 Ga. 266(2), 78 S. E. 1071.

The undisputed evidence in this case places the plaintiff bank clearly within the principle of law here announced. See, also, National Bank of Webb City v. Everett, 136 Ga. 372, 71 S. E. 660. The plaintiff having proved title, conversion, refusal to deliver or to pay on demand, it was entitled to a verdict unless the matters of defense set up caused such a conflict in the evidence as would require solution by a jury.

[3, 4] 2. It may be conceded that the defendant proved, as claimed, that an agreement had been entered into between it and McKie, representing McKie & Tilton, from whom the defendant had purchased, that the grain company could keep the two carloads of oats as an indemnifying margin against off grades of the oats contained in the other seven cars. But it must be conceded also that this arrangement constituted no defense unless McKie was acting for, or on behalf of, the plaintiff bank. And this is the claim of the defendant company. But this mental attitude is not only not based on evidence relating to the subject of agency between McKie and the plaintiff bank, but the only evidence on the subject is directly and positively to the contrary. The officer of the bank testified positively that the bank had never, directly or through any authorized agent, surrendered its claim of ownership over the two cars of oats covered by the bills of lading, and the only other witness on the subject is the president of the defendant company, who testified that McKie had positively told him, when he was endeavoring to adjust the differences arising out of the off grades of the oats, that they belonged to McKie & Tilton. This is the only evidence on the subject of agency between McKie, of McKie & Tilton, and the plaintiff bank, and, instead of tending to establish that relationship, it expressly negatives it.

[5] 3. The defendant grain company insists that if the plaintiff bank did hold title to the two carloads of oats it had surrendered the title thereto when they authorized the Third National Bank to deliver to it the bills of lading covering the two cars, and that the circumstances were sufficient to authorize the inference that the surrender was made for the purpose of enabling McKie, representing McKie & Tilton, to adjust the matters of difference between the defendant and McKie & Tilton, and that the arrangement which had thereupon been entered into by the defendant and by McKie was binding upon the plaintiff. This contention is not supported by the evidence. To determine whether or not the plaintiff had surrendered title to the two cars, we must consider the evidence which is not in conflict. This shows that the defendant company got possession of the cars as a bailee for the plaintiff bank and for the sole purpose of storing the cars to prevent the ruin of the oats. This was the purpose of the bailment, and, as far as the evidence discloses, the plaintiff bank relied solely on this fact. The purpose of this bailment was, without any authority whatever, afterwards changed by McKie, of McKie & Tilton, who authorized the grain company to hold the two cars as a margin for security for alleged claims against other cars already paid for. This apparently was a fraud perpetrated, not by the bank, or with knowledge on the part of the bank that it was being perpetrated, but it was perpetrated by a third party without the slightest authority from the bank, and after this party had sold to the bank the oats in question, and to induce the grain company to pay the drafts for the other oats.

[6] 4. Learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, in their able and exhaustive brief, failing to establish any agency whatever between McKie & Tilton and the plaintiff bank that would authorize the inference that the bank intended to release its title to the two carloads of grain or change the temporary character of its bailment in any manner, insists that, if neither the Texas bank nor the grain company was guilty of fraud and both were in a legal sense innocent, the loss should fall on the Texas bank, on the principle that when one of two innocent persons must suffer by an act of a third person, he who put it in the power of the third person to inflict the injury must bear the loss. This is a sound principle of equity, but we do not think, under the evidence, that it can be invoked against the legal rights of the plaintiff bank. It may be conceded that the grain company was under the impression that McKie & Tilton were the owners of the oats in question, and therefore had a right to make any arrangement with reference to them, but the evidence is undisputed and irresistible that the plaintiff bank had the title to the oats in question and consented to their delivery to the grain company for the sole purpose of storage, and never at any time, either directly or through any authorized agent, surrendered this claim of ownership. We do not feel warranted in concluding that the defendant grain company obtained possession of the bank's property under false pretenses of a bailment with intent to appropriate the property to its own use.

It is clearly shown that the act of the third person which might result in injury to one of two innocent persons was the act of McKie in untruthfully claiming to be the owner of the oats in question. The evidence clearly shows that the plaintiff bank as an innocent party would suffer great loss if the grain company, after getting possession of these oats under the pretense of storing them in order to save them from ruin, and at once beginning to sell them at a price from 20 to 24 cents a bushel greater than the original purchase price, should be allowed to retain possession of this money to pay the alleged counterclaim of about $800 against McKie & Tilton. This would amount to an appropriation of the property of the bank that is wholly unwarranted by the facts, the law, or equitable principles.

5. In an action of trover the plaintiff has the option to demand a verdict either for damages alone, or for the property alone and its hire, if any. Civil Code 1910, § 5930. In the present case the plaintiff elected a money verdict for the highest proved value of the property. And the evidence from the grain company's books showed that it had sold all the oats in question for an amount exceeding the amount of the original drafts, which was the amount sued for in this case. The learned trial judge ruled that the minimum of the plaintiff's recovery was the amount of the drafts, and for this amount the verdict was directed. A careful consideration of the evidence in the case convinces us that the verdict as directed by the court was demanded, and certainly the defendant cannot be heard to complain as to the amount of the verdict, as its own evidence proves that it has received from the sale of the oats not only a profit over the contract price, but a sum exceeding the amount of the drafts for which the verdict was directed.

Judgment affirmed.

MORAE v. STATE. (No. 12718.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 823(4)—Failure to define crime not error in view of indictment and charge as to burden of proof.

Where an indictment is full and minute and covers every element of the crime with which the accused is charged, and the judge in his instructions to the jury reads to them the indictment, and tells them that the burden is upon the state to establish beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of the accused as charged in the indictment, it is unnecessary to give to the jury the definition of the crime as laid down in the Code.

2. Criminal law \S 814(17)—Failure to charge on circumstantial evidence not error when evidence not wholly circumstantial.

This case is not dependent wholly upon circumstantial evidence, and it furnishes no ground for a new trial that the court failed to charge the law touching such evidence.

3. Sufficiency of evidence.

There is some evidence to support the verdict.

4. Criminal law \S 1159(2)—Verdict supported by evidence cannot be disturbed.

Where there is some evidence to support the verdict, the Court of Appeals, in the absence of legal error, has no authority to interfere.

Hal Lawson, of Abbeville, for plaintiff in error.

J. B. Wall, Sol. Gen., Jesse Grantham, and Saml. Kasewitz, all of Fitzgerald, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] 1. The first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial alleges that the judge erred because he "failed to give in charge to the jury the legal definition of simple larceny." The indictment set out the charge of simple larceny fully and minutely. In his instructions to the jury the judge quoted all of that portion of the indictment which charged the defendant with simple larceny, including the words "did wrongfully and fraudulently take and carry away with intent to steal the same." The judge further charged the jury that—

"The burden is upon the state to establish to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of the accused as charged and alleged in this bill of indictment before you would be authorized to convict."

In Smith v. State, 63 Ga. 168 (14), the Supreme Court held:

"The accusation being under section 4627 of the Code, and being full and minute in setting forth the acts laid to the prisoner's charge, it was unnecessary to read to the jury any of the Code, or to state what particular act or acts had to be proved in order to make out the case. This information was conveyed to the jury by reading to them the accusation, and calling upon them to render a verdict of guilty or not guilty."

Under the above ruling and when the entire charge is considered, there is no merit in this ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

[2] 2. The other ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial alleges error because "the court failed to charge the law of circumstantial evidence as laid down in the Penal Code of Georgia, § 1010." This case does not rest entirely upon circumstantial evidence, and without a proper and timely request therefor the court did not err in failing to instruct the jury on the law of circumstantial evidence. "It is only where a case is solely dependent upon circumstantial evidence that the court is required to instruct the jury as to the law of such evidence." Hegwood v. State, 138 Ga. 274 (1), 75 S. E. 133. In Reddick v. State, 11 Ga. App. 150 (3), 74 S. E. 901, this court held:

"When the facts from which the inference of guilt or innocence is to be drawn are all established by direct proof, and only the intent with which the alleged criminal act was committed, or the degree of criminality, must be inferred, the trial judge, in the absence of a timely request, is not required to give in charge to the jury the usual rule applicable to circumstantial evidence."

See, also, Scarboro v. State, 24 Ga. App. 29 (7), 99 S. E. 637, and citations.

[3, 4] 3. No error was committed upon the trial: there is some evidence to support the verdict, and "this court has repeatedly held that, in the absence of legal error, it has no authority to interfere with a verdict supported by some evidence."

Judgment affirmed.

DEVOE v. BEST MOTOR CO. (No. 12450.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Division No. 1. Nov. 17, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. New trial ¶128(2)—Motion must show ground of exclusion of evidence and that it was over objection.

In order for the rejection of testimony to be a ground for a new trial, the motion for a new trial must show upon what ground the testimony was excluded (unless it is shown that the judge rejected the testimony upon his own motion), and that it was excluded over the objections of the plaintiff in error or his counsel made to the court at the time of the exclusion. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Jaques, 23 Ga. App. 396 (2), 98 S. E. 357; Steed v. Cruise, 70 Ga. 168(4); Summerlin v. State, 25 Ga. App. 568 (1), 571, 572, 103 S. E. 832. Under the above ruling, the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is too defective to be considered.

2. Release ¶24(2), 58(4)—Question whether plaintiff understood what he was signing held for the jury; plaintiff held not required to tender back amount paid before pleading fraud.

The question as to whether the plaintiff, who could not read or write, understood what he was signing when he made his mark to the settlement paper, should have been submitted to the jury. It was not necessary, under his testimony, for him to tender back the money before he could plead fraud in getting him to sign a paper in settlement of his claim. See Butler v. Richmond & Danville R. Co., 88 Ga. 594 (2), 15 S. E. 668.

3. Verdict improperly directed.

Under the above rulings it was error for the court to direct a verdict for the defendant.

PER CURIAM. Judgment reversed.

BROYLES, C. J., and BLOODWORTH, J., concur.

LUKE, J., dissents.

LUKE, J. (dissenting). 1. I cannot concur in the ruling announced in the first paragraph of the decision in this case. I have heretofore upon two occasions dissented from similar rulings. The only burden that has to be carried by a plaintiff in error in an assignment of error upon the rejection of testimony offered by him is that of showing that the evidence offered has legal and probative value in the case. If such testimony be rejected, it matters not upon what ground of objection it was excluded. The ground of objection, whatever it may be, could certainly have no effect upon the admissibility of the evidence. The ground of objection could not add to or take from the evidence—its legality upon the issues involved in the case. The majority of the court, in my opinion, has been confused by the precedents which require that objections urged to the admissibility of evidence admitted be shown when error is assigned.

2, 3. Neither can I agree to the conclusion reached in the ruling stated in paragraph 2 of the decision, nor, therefore, to the judgment of reversal in this case. This was an action brought by Devoe against Best Motor Company for damages on account of the death of his minor son, Charles Devoe, Jr. The suit was met by a plea of accord and satisfaction, supported by a writing signed by Devoe acknowledging receipt of $152.75 in full settlement for his son's injury. The plaintiff sought to avoid the effect of this instrument by proof of fraud in its procurement. The evidence in this regard was substantially as follows: The morning after his boy's injury the plaintiff went to see one Best, manager of the Best Motor Company, and asked him what the company proposed to pay him for the loss of his boy. Best directed him to Mr. Willingham, who told him he was sorry his boy was hurt, and further said:

"We are going to help you some. * * * It is better to get a little than none. We will give you $50 to rest up a few weeks."

Plaintiff testified also that he could not read or write; that his hearing was defective; that he was overwrought because of his son's death; and that, though the receipt was read over to him, he signed it in ignorance of its contents. Defendant's evidence was, in effect, that the plaintiff was not overreached, that the writing was carefully read over and explained to him, and that neither his appearance nor his conduct indicated in the slightest degree that he did not know what he was signing. It was admitted that the plaintiff received $50 in cash. The remainder of the money receipted for was paid for the undertaker's bill and the hospital bill. None of this money was ever repaid or tendered back.

Answering the contention of the plaintiff that the settlement was made by a stranger, and was therefore invalid, the reply is: (1) That the evidence does not warrant this conclusion; and (2) that, in any event, if what is given by the stranger is accepted in satisfaction by the creditor, and his act is authorized or subsequently ratified by the debtor, this is a complete accord and satisfaction. 1 Corpus Juris, 535, §§ 27, 28, and the leading case of Leavitt v. Morrow, 6 Ohio St. 72, 67 Am. Dec. 834. It follows that it was not improper to exclude the evidence tending to show that an insurance company paid Willingham's fee and also the money expended under the settlement. Moreover, the judge's order allowing the amendment to the petition setting up fraud recited that "that portion [of the amendment] alleging that payments were made by an insurance company is refused," this order was not excepted to, and it is doubtful if the pleadings would have authorized the introduction of the evidence excluded.

Plaintiff's contention that defendant had previously obligated itself to pay the hospital bill and the undertaker's bill, and that these items could not furnish any consideration for the settlement, even if admitted, does not change the complexion of this case. The $50 actually paid the plaintiff was kept by him and never tendered back. It is the law of this state that—

"In order to obtain a rescission of the contract of release and recover upon the original cause of action, restoration or tender of the amount paid for the release is necessary." Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Atkins, 141 Ga. 743 (2), 82 S. E. 139.

The real question for decision here is: Did the facts of this case relieve plaintiff from restoring or tendering back the fruits of his contract? He contends that his case comes within the rule of the case of Butler v. H. & D. Railroad Co., 88 Ga. 594, 15 S. E. 668. The rule there established is that it is not necessary to restore or to offer to restore benefits received on account of a claim or debt entirely distinct from the subject-matter of the accord and satisfaction. For cases elucidating and distinguishing that decision, see Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Atkins, supra; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Burke, 97 Ga. 560, 25 S. E. 498; Petty v. Brunswick, etc., R. Co., 109 Ga. 666, 35 S. E. 82. In the case at bar it is neither pleaded nor proved that the plaintiff had any claim against the defendant other than that arising out of the tort sued for. Clearly the plaintiff's attempt to avoid the necessity of restoring or tendering back the fruits of his contract was ineffectual, and the judgment of the court directing a verdict for the defendant, in my opinion, was correct.

PHINAZEE v. STATE. (No. 12711.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Homicide \S 309(1)—Instruction on provocation in statutory language without explanation or qualification held not error.

The court when instructing the jury upon the law of manslaughter did not err in charging all of section 65 of the Penal Code of 1910, including the provision that "provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder," although the provision quoted was charged without explanation or qualification. Deal v. State, 145 Ga. 33(1), 88 S. E. 573; Id., 18 Ga. App. 70(7), 88 S. E. 902.

2. Instructions not erroneous.

The instructions complained of upon the subjects of "other equivalent circumstances," and "cooling time," were distinctly favorable to the accused, and were not harmful error (if error at all) for any reason assigned.

(a) The excerpt from the charge of the court upon the subject of justifiable homicide, given in connection with the charge upon "cooling time," when considered in connection with the entire charge, was sufficiently full, in the absence of a request for more particular instructions upon that subject.

3. Homicide \S 300(5, 9), 302, 303—Instruction held not to confuse law of justifiable homicide and self-defense; instruction held not erroneous because of absence of evidence of mutual combat; instruction as to justification properly omits defense of habitation or property when there is no evidence thereof.

Complaint is made of the following charge: "Every person has the right to take human life when necessary to prevent the loss of his own life, or in defense of his person against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony on him." This charge is not subject to the exceptions: (1) That it "confused and commingled the law of justifiable homicide as contained in sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code with the law of self-defense as contained in section 73 of the Code," or (2) that the provisions of section 73 were not applicable to the case, as there was no evidence of mutual combat. The charge here complained of consisted substantially of the applicable portions of section 70, and did not contain any part of section 73.

(a) In giving the above charge the court properly omitted that part of the section relating to the defense of habitation or property, as neither the evidence nor the defendant's statement authorized any instruction upon those phases of the law of justifiable homicide.

4. Criminal law \S 1178—Ground for new trial treated as abandoned when not referred to or insisted upon.

The fifth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is treated as abandoned, since it is not referred to in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error and there is no statement in the brief that all the grounds are insisted upon.

5. Ground of motion without merit.

There is no substantial merit in the sixth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

6. Homicide \S 309(4)—Evidence as to mutual intent to fight held to justify instruction on voluntary manslaughter; defendant's statement that she did not intend to kill deceased held to authorize instruction on manslaughter.

"It is well settled by numerous rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court that the law of voluntary manslaughter may properly be given in charge to the jury on the trial of one indicted for murder, where, from the evidence or from the defendant's statement to the jury, there is anything deducible which would tend to show that he was guilty of manslaughter, voluntary or involuntary, or which would be sufficient to raise a doubt as to whether the homicide was murder or manslaughter." May v. State, 24 Ga. App. 379, 382, 100 S. E. 797, 799, and citation.

(a) In the instant case some of the evidence and the defendant's statement to the jury showed that a very brief time before the homicide the defendant and the deceased quarreled, that the deceased called the defendant vile and opprobrious names, that both left the scene of the quarrel and returned near thereto almost immediately, the deceased with a razor and the defendant with a pistol, and that the deceased advanced upon the defendant with the razor in her hand, and that the defendant shot and killed her. These circumstances were amply sufficient to show a mutual intent to fight, and the court properly charged the law of voluntary manslaughter. Furthermore, the defendant, in her statement to the jury, said that when she was told that the deceased was dead she said that she "didn't intend to kill her." This statement tended to show that the killing was not necessary to save the defendant's life, and that she so realized at the time of the killing, and this admission, in connection with the evidence adduced, authorized a charge upon the law of manslaughter; there being no contention that the shooting of the deceased was accidental.

7. Criminal law \S 935(1)—New trial properly denied when verdict authorized.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

BRANDT v. BUCKLEY. (No. 12580.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Oct. 24, 1921. Rehearing Denied
Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Corporations \S 121(7)—Measure of damages for nondelivery of stock paid for in advance is actual or market value.

Where the purchase price of corporate stock has been paid to the seller in advance, and he fails to make delivery in accordance with the contract, the general measure of damages recoverable by the buyer for the breach is the actual or market value of the stock at the time when and the place where delivery should have been made.

2. Corporations \S 121(5)—Purchaser suing for nondelivery of stock must submit evidence of actual or market value.

In an action by a purchaser of corporate stock to recover damages in such a case, it is incumbent on him to submit evidence as to the actual or market value of the stock at the time and place when and where delivery should have been made.

3. Corporations \S 121(5)—Evidence \S 113 (4)—Verdict for damages for nondelivery of stock unauthorized when there was no evidence of value; evidence of market value three years after breach not evidence of value; no presumption that par value was actual value when evidence showed depression in value.

This being such a case, and there being no evidence of the actual or market value of the stock at the time when and place where it should have been delivered under the contract, the verdict for the plaintiff for general damages was unauthorized, and for this reason the refusal of a new trial was error.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Paul Buckley against R. Brandt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brought error to the Supreme Court, which transferred the case (107 S. E. 773) to the Court of Appeals. Reversed.

In November, 1915, Paul Buckley brought an action against Rudolph Brandt to require the defendant to specifically perform a contract by delivering to him certain shares of corporate stock which he had purchased of the defendant, under the terms of a contract between them executed January 10, 1914, and for which stock he had, on the date of the contract, paid the defendant the agreed price. A copy of the contract was attached to the petition as an exhibit. It appears from the contract that Brandt, in consideration of $1,000 paid him by Buckley, "and other valuable consideration," sold to Buckley a third interest in two specified and numbered letters patent, together with a like interest in any subsequent patents or improvements, in connection with a certain computing cloth-measuring machine covered by the letters patent, and that might be made prior to the organization of a corporation for the purposes set forth in the contract. Brandt further agreed to organize, together with such persons as he might associate with him, a corporation for the purpose of manufacturing and selling computing cloth-measuring machines under the patents referred to, and such other patents as might be granted to him in connection with such machine, and to sell and transfer to such corporation as might be so organized all of such letters patent, receiving from the corporation in payment therefor such number of its shares of stock as might be agreed upon between him and his associates in the enterprise, and that when the shares of stock should be so issued to him he would transfer and assign to Buckley one-third of the number of shares of such stock that might be issued to Brandt. The petition alleges that the defendant and his associates had a charter granted to them under the corporate name of the American Cloth Register Company, and that the corporation was duly organized and 4,400 shares of the common stock and 400 shares of the preferred stock of the corporation were issued to Brandt, and 3,600 shares of stock in the corporation were held in the treasury as treasury stock. It is alleged that under the contract he is entitled to have transferred and assigned to him by the defendant one-third of all the shares issued to the defendant, but that the defendant refused, on demand, to make such transfer. The main and substantial prayer of the original petition is for a decree requiring the defendant to specifically perform his contract by assigning or transferring to the plaintiff one-third of the stock mentioned.

On the trial the petition was first amended as follows:

"Petitioner alleges that by reason of the failure of the said Brandt to secure the additional patents for the improvements he had so made on said invention and to make formal transfers of the same to said American Cloth Register Company, as in equity and good conscience he was bound to do, the ownership of said patents and inventions by said company is uncertain and the value of the stock in said American Cloth Register Company is necessarily depressed, so as to make a recovery for the value of the stock to which plaintiff is entitled * * * [a] wholly inadequate and insufficient measure of relief to petitioner. * * * As hereinbefore alleged, the said Brandt is the owner of a majority of the stock in the American Cloth Register Company, and he is likewise the president and general manager of the same, and absolutely controls and dominates the policy of said corporation. Said defendant is thus in a position to manipulate the affairs of said company to fit the exigencies of this litigation, and has exercised his power in the manner above stated so as to render the value of the stock in said corporation small, uncertain, and difficult of ascertainment. Petitioner further alleges that the value of said stock cannot be readily ascertained, as in the case of ordinary corporations, but that the same is of a peculiar character and its value is to a large extent prospective and dependent upon whether formal transfers of all patents, letters patent, and inventions which should have been made to it have been so made, and likewise dependent upon a successful and profitable operation of the business, which has not been attempted by said defendant. The conduct of said defendant, Brandt, with reference to said corporation has thus made uncertain and difficult of ascertainment the value of said stock, and petitioner's damages are irreparable, and the only fair and adequate relief that can be granted petitioner is the rendition of a decree for specific performance of said defendant's contract with the plaintiff as prayed."

The testimony of the plaintiff tended to sustain the allegations of this amendment.

The plaintiff submitted no evidence as to the value of the stock, either common or preferred, and the only evidence tending to show its value at any time was the testimony of the defendant. He testified:

"The last sales made of the stock of the American Cloth Register Company (the corporation whose stock is here involved) were made in September, 1918. I don't know exactly how many shares were sold, but I think about 10 or 12. The par value of the stock is $100 per share, and this stock was sold at the rate of $75 per share for the preferred stock. The common stock has never been sold. No price has ever been put on it."

After the defendant had so testified, a second amendment to the petition was made, as follows:

"The defendant having in his pleading and testimony in the court shown that he has by voluntary act of his own transferred and assigned to others 440 shares of the common stock in the American Cloth Register Company and 40 shares of the preferred stock in said company, which stock the plaintiff alleges he was entitled to have transferred to him under the contract sued on, and the defendant's counsel contending that a decree for specific performance of said contract could not be decreed for the reason that the plaintiff [the defendant?] has by the transfer of said stock put it out of the power of this court to enter any decree for specific performance, and plaintiff's counsel having taken the further position that a decree could not be enforced against the defendant for the reason that since the filing and service of the petition and process the defendant has voluntarily removed his domicile to the state of Connecticut and is now a resident of said state, the plaintiff now prays that damages be awarded him for the breach of said contract, and that the plaintiff be awarded as such damages the sum of $15,666.66, being the value of 146½ shares of the common stock in said company at the value of $100 per share and 13½ shares of the preferred stock of said company at $75 per share."

The action having been converted by amendment into one for the recovery of damages for the failure of the defendant to deliver the corporate stock in pursuance of the contract set forth in the petition, a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $15,666.66, which was the specific amount of damages prayed for in the amendment of the plaintiff quoted above. The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it. Upon the overruling of the motion he excepted.

Green & Michael, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

Erwin, Erwin & Nix, of Athens, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] This suit, as finally framed by amendment, was for damages on account of the breach of a contract for the delivery of certain corporate stock for which the plaintiff had paid the defendant. There is evidence to establish the contract and its breach by the defendant. The vital point is whether there is any evidence authorizing the jury to find that the amount of their verdict in favor of the plaintiff represents the damages recoverable under the law for the breach of the contract. The general rule is that the measure of damages recoverable of the seller for failure to deliver goods sold is the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time and place for delivery; and it is incumbent on one who seeks to recover such damages to submit evidence as to the market price at the time and place for delivery, in order to recover compensatory damages. In the absence of such evidence no actual damages can be recovered. To this general rule as to the measure of damages there are some exceptions. Bloom v. Americus Grocery Co., 116 Ga. 784, 43 S. E. 54; Sizer v. Melton, 129 Ga. 143 (7), 58 S. E. 1055; Edwards v. Hale, 129 Ga. 302, 304, 58 S. E. 817; Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Adam, 134 Ga. 821, 68 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 192. This is the general rule where the purchase price has not been paid. A contract for the sale of stock in a corporation is governed by substantially the same principles as a contract for the sale of any other personalty, both as to its formation and as to its construction and performance. 3 Clark & Marshall, Private Corp. § 608. And the remedy of the parties in the case of a breach of the contract for the sale of stock in a corporation is substantially the same as in the case of a contract for the sale of any other personal property. Id. § 615. The claim of the buyer for damages for the failure of the seller to make delivery is ordinarily a claim for unliquidated damages, and the general damages recoverable in such a case, if the price has been paid in advance, is the market value of the subject-matter of sale, because by reasonable diligence the subject-matter may be obtained by the buyer in the market at its market value. 24 R. C. L. 69, § 335.

"In case of a nondelivery of stock in accordance with the contract, if the purchase-price has been paid, the general measure of damages is the actual or market value of the stock at the time when delivery should have been made, or, in other words, at the time of the breach of the contract." 14 C. J. 717, § 1097, and cases cited in note 58.

Where the buyer has paid the purchase price, and—

"stands on the contract, as by suing for its breach, he must be content if the law places him in the position he would have occupied if the contract had been performed. This it does by permitting the recovery of the market value of the property at the time and place when and where it should have been delivered." 2 Sutherland, Damages (4th Ed.) § 656, notes 75 and 76.

In Bank of Culloden v. Bank of Forsyth, 120 Ga. 575, 48 S. E. 226, 102 Am. St. Rep. 115, it was held that the measure of damages for the failure of a bank to make a transfer on its books and to issue a certificate therefor of stock in the bank owned by a purchaser is the value of the stock at the time of the demand and refusal to transfer and issue the certificate.

[3] There was no exception to the charge of the court in the instant case, and it is not in the record. We therefore assume that the court instructed the jury that the rule for the recovery of damages in the case was that which we have stated. There was no evidence tending to show the market value of the corporate stock at the time the defendant contracted to deliver it to the plaintiff. As set forth in the preceding statement of facts, the only evidence tending to show the value of the stock at any time was that of the defendant, who testified:

"The last sales made of the stock of the American Cloth Register Company (the corporation whose stock is here involved) were made in September, 1918. I don't know exactly how many shares were sold, but I think about 10 or 12. The par value of the stock is $100 per share, and this stock was sold at the rate of $75 per share for the preferred stock. The common stock has never been sold. No price have ever been put on it."

This evidence tended to show the value of the preferred stock in September, 1918, when the last sales of it were made, more than four years after the contract was executed, and nearly three years after the institution of this suit, and, of course, nearly three years after the breach of the contract. This evidence, therefore, threw no light on the value of the preferred stock at the time the defendant should have delivered it under the contract, nearly three years previously. According to the evidence there was no market value for the common stock at the time the defendant agreed to deliver it, nor at any other time, as none of it had ever been sold, nor had any price ever been "put on it." Even if, in the absence of evidence of actual sales, the par value of paid-up stock is presumptively its market value, no such rule could apply in the case at bar, in view of the allegations of the first amendment made to the petition, which the plaintiff's evidence tended to sustain, to the effect that by certain acts of the defendant the value of the stock was greatly lessened, even from the organization of the corporation. So if the par value was $100 per share, its value was greatly depressed by the alleged acts of the defendant. It was therefore incumbent upon the plaintiff to establish the actual value of the common stock at the time the defendant agreed to deliver it by showing the property of the corporation as compared with its liabilities, or its dividend earning capacity at that time. 14 C. J. 718, § 1099. There was no such evidence.

We confidently conclude that there was no evidence to authorize the verdict rendered in behalf of the plaintiff for $15,866.66 as damages for defendant's breach of contract, and the court therefore erred in refusing a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

BRANDT v. COMPUTING CLOTH-MEASURING MACH. CO. (No. 12581.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
Nov. 18, 1921.)

1. Courts ⇐217—When prayers for specific performance stricken, finding that contract was binding on defendant disregarded as surplusage.

An equitable petition filed in the superior court by its allegations was essentially a petition for specific performance of a certain contract with prayers for incidental relief. The petition contained also a prayer for a specific money verdict, based upon the binding effect of the contract in question. All the prayers of the petition were stricken by amendment, except that which asked for a money verdict and the further finding that the contract sued upon

"is binding according to its terms and provisions" upon the defendant. A verdict was found in accordance with these prayers, and a writ of error was sued out to the Supreme Court. On considering the record that court (108 S. E. 61) ruled that the case be transferred to the Court of Appeals, as one at law based on contract. Held: The verdict, in substance and effect, was for the specified sum of money, and that portion thereof relating to the contract may be treated as surplusage.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Patents \Leftrightarrow 203—Evidence held to support recovery of amount agreed to be paid for assignment.

In an action against the assignee of patents on his agreement to pay the sum of $2,000 therefor upon organization of a firm or company to manufacture and sell the patented machines, evidence held sufficient to support a recovery of such sum, as against the objection that the patents were worthless and the company organized to manufacture machines under different patents.

3. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1033(9)—Defendant could not complain that verdict was for less than evidence warranted.

Where a verdict for plaintiff for $2,000 would have been amply supported by the evidence, defendant could not complain that the jury found a verdict for only $1,500.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Suit by the Computing Cloth-Measuring Machine Company against R. Brandt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brought error to the Supreme Court, which transferred the case (108 S. E. 61) to the Court of Appeals. Affirmed.

This was an equitable petition filed by the Computing Cloth-Measuring Machine Company against R. Brandt, in the superior court of Clarke county, asking for the specific performance of a contract and for other incidental relief. The contract, briefly stated, embraced certain letters patent upon a computing cloth-measuring machine, which had been issued by the commissioner of patents to Eugene A. Luster, and the contract assigned these patents, together with a model, with the absolute and exclusive right to manufacture and sell all machines and devices and all improvements that might thereafter be made upon the same in conformity with said patent rights and model. Under the terms of this contract, and as a consideration for the assignment of the patent rights and other privileges acquired by the defendant from the Measuring Machine Company, he agreed to organize a firm or company to manufacture and sell the machines that might be manufactured thereunder, and upon the organization of such firm or company he was to pay the measuring machine company $2,000 in cash, and when a certain number of machines had been sold he should pay the further sum of $2,000, and that thereafter he or his assigns or successors in title were to pay a royalty for each machine sold up to the number of 1,000 machines. It was further agreed that Brandt should spend $1,000, more or less, not exceeding $2,000, in further perfecting such measuring machines and the organization of a firm or company to manufacture the same. The petition alleged that in pursuance of this agreement Brandt went forward and organized the company for the purpose of manufacturing and selling the machines, the said corporation having been chartered in the state of Delaware, under the name of the American Cloth Register Company, and under the terms of the contract the sum of $2,000 was then due and payable. In the original suit the American Cloth Register Company was made a party defendant, and the measuring machine company sought to obtain jurisdiction of the Delaware corporation by service by publication. Subsequently this defendant, and all reference to it, was stricken from the petition. Among the prayers of the petition was one that judgment should be rendered against the said R. Brandt for $2,000, which had become due, under the terms of the contract, upon the organization of the Delaware corporation. There was a further prayer that a decree be entered that the contract of May 8, 1913, which was the contract sued upon, "is binding according to its terms and provisions upon the said Brandt." By amendment all of the prayers of the petition were stricken therefrom by the plaintiff, except these two.

Brandt, in his answer, admitted organizing the Delaware corporation, but contended that, on being organized in pursuance of the agreement with the plaintiff, he found, after using his best endeavors to perfect the model obtained from the plaintiff, by the expenditure of large sums of money, he became convinced that the patent so acquired from the plaintiff was worthless, and he abandoned it; the paragraph of his answer on this point alleging as follows:

"Defendant distinctly avers that neither he nor his associates are operating under the Luster patents, being the patents referred to in the plaintiff's petition, but releases all rights and claims to said patents, and that the plaintiff in this case is entirely welcome to the same."

Other contentions raised by the defendant in his original answer and the amendments are to the effect that an official of the measuring machine company made certain false representations to him when he acquired the said patent rights. He further averred that he had expended a large sum of money and a great deal of his time and skill in endeavoring to perfect the patents for the machines acquired from the plaintiff, much more than the $2,000 which he had agreed to expend for the purpose of perfecting them, and that this sum amounted to $13,000 or $14,000, which he set up as a counterclaim in the nature of recoupment. Subsequently, however, by amendment he abandoned this counterclaim. On the trial all the material prayers were stricken from the petition, except the prayer that a decree should be entered pronouncing the contract binding upon Brandt, and the further prayer that the plaintiff should be given a judgment for $2,000 against the said Brandt. Brandt abandoned all the defenses set up in his original answer, and on the trial of the case the only issues submitted to the jury were the two stated above, and he insisted that the Luster patents for the machine which had been assigned and transferred to him by the plaintiff were found to be worthless, after a faithful, earnest, and persistent effort on his part to perfect the same, and that thereupon he had abandoned these patents as worthless, and that the Delaware corporation which he had organized was for the purpose of acquiring inventions for a measuring machine which he had devised and for which he held patents entirely independent of the Luster patents. After considering the case made by these issues the jury returned a verdict against the defendant for $1,500 principal and $446 interest, and further found that the contract in dispute was binding upon Brandt; and judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

Green & Michael, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

Erwin, Erwin & Nix, of Athens, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] Originally filed as an equitable petition praying for the specific performance of a contract, all equitable features of the case were eliminated, by amendments, and, when the case reached the Supreme Court, on an investigation thereof the case was transferred to this court for adjudication, on the ground that, properly construed, the petition as amended made a plain action at law based on contract. Reduced to its last analysis, the petition as amended asked only for a money judgment of $2,000, which it was alleged was due the plaintiff under the contract; for, of course, it could not be contended that the money was due unless the contract was valid and binding upon Brandt. This makes it necessary for this court to decide only the question made by this issue, and the evidence on this issue, although quite voluminous, may be substantially stated as follows:

There was no dispute that the contract as set out in the petition was entered into by the parties. Under the terms of this contract the Luster patents were transferred and assigned to Brandt for a consideration of $4,000. Brandt agreed that he was to perfect the measuring machine covered by the Luster patent and was to organize a company for the purpose, and when this company was organized he was to pay the $2,000 to the plaintiff, and when the machines were perfected he was to pay the additional $2,000, and thereafter royalties on the machines as manufactured. The evidence clearly shows that, in accordance with the terms of this contract, Brandt did proceed to organize a company and did endeavor to perfect and manufacture the measuring machines covered by the Luster patents, which had been transferred to him by the plaintiff. He set up, however, as a defense to the payment of the $2,000, that after an earnest and faithful endeavor he found that the Luster patents, or rather the machines according to the Luster patents, were so defective that they were worthless; that thereupon he abandoned the effort to perfect or manufacture this machine and proceeded to organize a company in Delaware for the manufacture of a different machine, wholly independent of the Luster patents. The evidence for the plaintiff tends to establish the fact that Brandt's contention that the Luster patents were worthless and he had abandoned them was untrue, and as a matter of fact he had organized this Delaware company for the purpose of manufacturing machines under the Luster patents and according to the terms of his contract made with the company. This evidence was by expert witnesses, who called the attention of the court to the similarity in the machines which Brandt proposed to manufacture in the Delaware company to those covered by the Luster patents. Brandt by his testimony alone denied these facts.

[3] One significant fact insisted upon by the plaintiff is that Brandt never informed the plaintiff of the alleged worthless character of the Luster patents; that no contention of this sort was set up until the trial; and the plaintiff further calls attention to what are claimed to be admissions on the part of Brandt, made in case filed by Paul Buckley against him in the superior court of Clarke county. In that case it was sought to recover the value of stock alleged to have been issued by the Delaware company organized by Brandt, and it was alleged by Brandt that this Delaware company was organized for the purpose of manufacturing and selling the measuring machines covered by the Luster patents, which had been assigned to him by the measuring machine company, and the stock in question had been issued to him by the Delaware company for the assignment by him of the right to manufacture and sell the machines under the Luster

GILBERT v. STATE. (No. 12696.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Nov. 16, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 656(3)—Witnesses \S 359—Question as to number of convictions for selling whisky properly excluded; remarks of judge in excluding question not error.

The trial judge did not err in refusing to allow a witness to answer the question, "How many times have you been convicted of selling whisky recently?" nor in stating, in connection with that ruling, "She does not have to answer anyhow, unless she wants to; that is not the way to prove it anyway."

2. Criminal law \S 1169(2)—Larceny \S 43—Evidence as to condition of stolen automobile when recovered properly admitted; admission harmless where other witness testified to the same effect.

No error was committed in permitting a witness to testify as to the condition of the stolen automobile at the time it was recovered.

3. Criminal law \S 696(2), 921—Refusal to rule out evidence not ground for a new trial when exception went to whole evidence, part of which was admissible; objection to evidence admitted provisionally waived when no motion made to exclude.

(a) "A ground of a motion for a new trial to the effect that the court erred in excluding the testimony specified as a whole is not a good ground, when a part of the testimony so specified is objectionable."

(b) Where evidence is admitted provisionally and no motion is thereafter made to exclude it, objection to it will be held to have been waived.

4. Criminal law \S 918(10, 11)—Remarks of judge not available on motion for new trial unless motion for mistrial made.

Where certain language used by the judge in passing upon objections to testimony is alleged to be prejudicial to the cause of the defendant, but no motion for a mistrial is made, and the case proceeds, without objection to the remarks of the judge, no question as to the prejudicial nature of these remarks can be raised in the motion for a new trial.

5. Criminal law \S 511(1)—Evidence independent of that of accomplice held to take case to jury.

In this case there is some evidence which within itself, and independently of the testimony of the accomplice, would lead to an inference of guilt of the accused.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. Criminal law \S 407(1)—Jury authorized to consider defendant's failure to reply to accusation as implied admission of guilt.

Under Civ. Code 1910, \S 5782, relative to the effect of silence as an admission, defendant's failure to reply when charged with an alleged accomplice with getting the car claimed er patents. While admissions or allegations of facts in pleadings are conclusive only on the parties in the case or their privies as admissions in judicio, yet these allegations made by Brandt in the Buckley suit were admitted by the trial court as extrajudicial admissions, and certainly, if relevant to the issue, gave strong support to the contentions of the plaintiff that Brandt's denial that he did organize the Delaware company for the purpose of carrying out the agreement made with the plaintiff was not true; and these admissions, taken in connection with the expert evidence in behalf of the plaintiff's claim, were sufficient to establish the contention of the plaintiff that it was entitled to the payment of the $2,000 which Brandt had expressly agreed to pay upon the organization of the company for the purpose of manufacturing and selling the machines made under the Luster patents. Without further elaboration of the evidence as to this issue, this court is of the opinion, from a careful consideration thereof, that the evidence is clearly sufficient to support a verdict for $2,000 against the defendant. The fact that the jury found a verdict for $1,500 with interest is not a matter of which the defendant Brandt can complain, in view of the fact that under the evidence a verdict for $2,000 would have been amply supported by the evidence.

[1] The verdict, in addition to finding for the plaintiff the sum of $1,500 as principal, with interest, further found "that a decree be entered to the effect that the contract sued upon is binding by its terms and provisions upon the said Brandt." This part of the verdict may be treated as a matter of inducement or surplusage, for there is nothing in the verdict, construed as a whole, that requires the defendant to do anything except to pay the money portion of the verdict. The verdict simply finds the validity of the contract between Brandt and the Computing Cloth-Measuring Machine Company as the reason why the payment should be made, and this is the view the Supreme Court must have taken in its judgment transferring the case to this court for adjudication. Treating the verdict, therefore, as a money verdict, and the other portion thereof, referring to the contract, as surplusage, we have reached the conclusion that the general grounds of the motion are without merit.

The specific assignments of error in the amended motion for a new trial relating to the rulings on testimony and refusal to charge do not present any reason why the money verdict, which is amply supported by the evidence, should be set aside and a new trial granted.

Judgment affirmed.

JENKINS, P. J., and STEPHENS, J., concur.

to have been stolen might properly have been construed by the jury as an implied admission of his guilt.

7. Criminal law §741(5)—Sufficiency of corroboration of accomplice is for jury.

Under Pen. Code 1910, § 1017, relative to the necessity of corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, the sufficiency or weight of corroborative evidence is a question solely for the jury.

8. Criminal law §1156(2) — Discretion of court in denying new trial not disturbed for insufficiency of corroboration of accomplice.

Where the jury found the evidence to corroborate an accomplice sufficient, the Court of Appeals will not interfere with the trial judge's discretion in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Jno. D. Humphries, Judge.

Henry Gilbert was convicted of larceny of an automobile, and he brings error. Affirmed.

H. A. Allen, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. A. Boykin, Sol. Gen., and E. A. Stephens, both of Atlanta, for the State.

BLOODWORTH, J. Robert Thweatt, Dewey Bland, and Henry Gilbert were indicted for the larceny of an automobile. Upon the trial of the defendant Henry Gilbert a verdict of guilty was rendered against him, the jury recommended that he be punished as for a misdemeanor, and this recommendation of the jury was complied with.

[1] 1. The trial judge did not err, upon objection made, in refusing to allow a witness for the state, the owner of the stolen automobile, to answer the question, "How many times have you been convicted of selling whisky recently?" Nor did the judge err in stating, in connection with said ruling:

"She does not have to answer anyhow, unless she wants to. You cannot make a person answer those questions. That is not the way to prove it anyhow." Morgan v. State, 17 Ga. App. 125(3), 86 S. E. 281.

[2] 2. No error was committed when a witness was permitted to testify as to the condition of the stolen automobile at the time it was recovered. Even if it was error to admit this evidence, the error was harmless, as another witness, without any objection being made thereto, testified to the condition of the car, and his evidence showed its condition to be substantially the same as was testified to by this witness.

[3] 3. Exception is taken to the refusal of the judge to "rule out all of the evidence of the sheriff as being incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant," and because "it does not in any way connect this defendant with this automobile." This alleged error of the court will not require the grant of a new trial, for two reasons: (a) This exception went to the entire evidence of the sheriff, and a part of it was clearly admissible. Jones v. Teasley, 25 Ga. App. 784 (1-b), 106 S. E. 46, and cases cited. (b) This evidence was admitted provisionally, and, as no motion was thereafter made to exclude it, counsel for the plaintiff in error will be held to have waived his objection thereto. Stone v. State, 118 Ga. 705 (9), 45 S. E. 630, 98 Am. St. Rep. 145; Quinn v. State, 22 Ga. App. 634 (2), 97 S. E. 84, and cases cited.

[4] 4. It is insisted that a new trial should be granted because certain language of the court, used in passing upon objection to testimony made by counsel for the defendant, "was calculated to give a jury of laymen the impression that the court thought counsel for movant was making captious objections, and if the jury did get that impression from the language used by this court, it was calculated to prejudice them against the defendant on trial." No motion was made to declare a mistrial because of the use by the judge of the language alleged to be prejudicial. "Counsel, having failed to make such motion and having proceeded without objection with the trial, cannot, after conviction, raise the question as to the prejudicial nature of the remarks complained of in a motion for a new trial." Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 277 (1), 69 S. E. 184. See, also, Woodall v. State, 25 Ga. App. 8 (3), 102 S. E. 913.

[5-8] 5. There is some evidence which, within itself and independently of the evidence of the accomplice, would lead to an inference of the guilt of the accused. In his statement at the trial the plaintiff in error admitted that early in the morning of the day on which the car was stolen he was in a café in Atlanta with the other defendants, and went with them in the stolen car to Ocee, "back in the mountains," and that one of them (Thweatt) asked him to drive the car. The car was recovered by the sheriff of Forsyth county. A witness testified:

"I had them together. Gilbert accused Thweatt of driving the car, and Thweatt accused Gilbert. They both insisted that the other drove the car. Each man was claiming that the other drove the car."

Another witness testified that the accused "said he did go to the mountains with the boys" (those jointly indicted with him). Another witness swore that Thweatt said to the accused: "You just as well come on and take your medicine. You know you got the car." While Thweatt was present the accused did not deny the above statement, but after Thweatt left he did deny it. When Thweatt said to the accused, "You know you got the car," had he been guiltless he would most probably have denied the charge. As he made no reply, the jury were authorized to construe his silence as an implied admission of his guilt. See Civil Code 1910, § 5782; McElroy v. State, 125 Ga. 40, 53 S. E. 759. In Davis v. State, 25 Ga. App. 532 (2), 103 S. E. 819, this court held:

"While the testimony of an accomplice must be corroborated by other evidence, which directly connects the accused on trial with the perpetration of the crime, before such testimony will authorize a conviction of a felony, yet the law does not require that the corroborating evidence shall in and of itself alone be sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty, or that the testimony of the accomplice shall be corroborated in every material particular. On the contrary, slight evidence that the crime was committed by both defendants, and identifying them with it, will corroborate the testimony of the accomplice and warrant a conviction"—citing Penal Code 1910, § 1017; Evans v. State, 78 Ga. 351; Pritchett v. State, 92 Ga. 33(1), 18 S. E. 350; Boswell v. State, 92 Ga. 581, 17 S. E. 805; Chapman v. State, 112 Ga. 56(2), 37 S. E. 102; Dixon v. State, 116 Ga. 186(7), 42 S. E. 357; Nance v. State, 126 Ga. 95(1), 54 S. E. 932.

The sufficiency or weight of corroborative evidence is a question solely for the jury. In this case they have found it sufficient, and, their finding having been approved by the trial judge, this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

HORNE v. STATE. (No. 12628.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1,
Nov. 16, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law § 264—Arraignment for misdemeanor held sufficient.

"Where, in the trial of one charged with a misdemeanor, upon arraignment of the prisoner the indictment was read to him by the solicitor general and a plea of not guilty was entered, no other or more formal arraignment was required. Penal Code, § 946; 12 Cyc. 344, and citations." Fears v. State, 125 Ga. 739 (2), 54 S. E. 667.

2. Witnesses § 61(1)—Evidence of conversation with defendant's wife admissible on trial for wife beating.

Evidence of a third person as to a conversation had with the wife of one charged with wife beating is not inadmissible on the ground "that the wife would be an incompetent witness and any statement she might have made would not be admissible as against the defendant," since a wife is competent "to testify against her husband upon his trial for any criminal offense committed, or attempted to have been committed, upon her person." Penal Code 1910, § 1037, par. 4.

3. Criminal law § 363, 366(6)—Res gestae depends rather on spontaneity than on precise time; evidence of wife's appearance, condition, and statements within five minutes held admissible on trial for wife beating.

"Inquiry as to whether particular sayings constitute a part of the res gestae of the transaction turns on the particular circumstances of each case, and is directed rather to the spontaneity of the events related, considered as a part of the occurrence under investigation, than to the precise time which may have elapsed between the main fact and the statements made in reference to it." Cobb v. State, 11 Ga. App. 52 (5), 74 S. E. 702. Under the above ruling and the facts of the instant case, the evidence of a witness as to the wife's personal appearance and physical condition, and as to statements made by the wife, within five minutes after her alleged beating by her husband, was admissible as a part of the res gestae. See, also, Walker v. State, 137 Ga. 398 (3), 73 S. E. 868.

4. Criminal law § 935(1)—New trial properly denied when verdict authorized by evidence.

The evidence amply authorized, if it did not demand, the conviction of the defendant, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

WILLIAMS v. McCRANIE. (No. 12372.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2,
Nov. 18, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence § 546, 555—Testimony of physician as to direction of bullet held admissible.

The court did not err in admitting the testimony of a physician in reference to the opinion given by him as to whether the bullet wound inflicted by the defendant upon one of the plaintiff's witnesses, who claimed to have seen the homicide, had entered from the front or the rear of the witness. This evidence was admissible for what it was worth, although the physician testified that he hardly thought he was entitled to an opinion, for the reason that he did not examine the wound at the point of exit; since the question as to whether a witness in a particular instance is qualified to give an opinion is to be determined by the court and is not governed by opinion of the witness himself as to his competency. Glover v. State, 129 Ga. 717, 718(9), 59 S. E. 816. The witness, although an expert, gave his reason for his opinion, as follows: "I can give you my best opinion as I got it from that careless examination. I saw the front of it. Where the bullet goes in, it is always a cleaner cut wound; where it comes out it lacerates the tissues. In other words, the point of entrance is clean cut and smooth, and the point of exit is more ragged. The front part of the wound on Josh Terry's head looked pretty smooth to me. I will not say positively about the back part of it, because I was rather careless about my examination. There were blood clots in the back of his hair, but I am not prepared to say that the back part of the wound was lacerated. I will say positively that the front part of the wound was smooth. I have never seen a bullet wound with both a smooth entrance and a smooth exit. The entrance is always smooth."

2. Death \S 21, 104(1)—Charge on justifiable homicide proper; justifiable homicide defined.

Exception is taken to the following portion of the charge: "Not only must the killing be in self-defense, but it must be necessary to prevent the attack and injury amounting to a felony on the person killing, or the person killing must really and honestly so believe at the time, and in good faith have acted upon such belief and not in a spirit of revenge." The defendant contends that, since, under Penal Code 1910, § 70, self-defense always justifies, the court improperly placed a double burden upon defendant in thus instructing the jury that there were other things which had to concur in order for the defense to excuse the homicide. This excerpt from the charge, while giving in disjunctive form the doctrines of justification as embodied in both sections 70 and 71 of the Penal Code, does not confuse them. Self-defense does justify but the slayer must be thereby protecting himself from the commission of a felony upon his person, and the taking of human life is not justified as being in self-defense where it is only some lesser injury which by the killing is sought to be avoided. Simmons v. State, 79 Ga. 696(8), 4 S. E. 894; Battle v. State, 103 Ga. 53, 54(4), 29 S. E. 491. As was also in substance further charged in the disjunctive form, the defendant would have been justified if the circumstances were such as to excite the fears of a reasonable man that such a felonious attack upon his person was about to be perpetrated, and in the killing he really acted under such fears and not in a spirit of revenge.

3. Appeal and error \S 1066—Instruction, defining "homicide" as defined by statute, not prejudicial error, though matter embraced in definition not involved.

The judge charged in its entirety the substance of the first sentence of section 4425 of Civil Code 1910, as follows: "The word 'homicide,' used in this section shall be held to include all cases where the death of a human being resulted from a crime or from criminal or other negligence." While no issue of negligence was in any way involved, either under the pleadings or the evidence, "it was not cause for a new trial that the judge read in charge to the jury a Code section, part of which was applicable to the case under consideration and part not; it not appearing that the reading of the inapplicable part was calculated to mislead the jury, erroneously affected their verdict, or was prejudicial to the rights of the complaining party." Eagle & Phenix Mills v. Herron, 119 Ga. 389(3), 46 S. E. 405.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Homicide.]

4. Death \S 95(2)—Method of computing present value of future earnings stated; "present worth."

Exception is taken to the following excerpt from the charge: "After you have fixed upon the amount representing the yearly earnings of the deceased and the number of years he would probably have lived, you can by multiplying the one by the other determine approximately what would have been the gross amount of the earnings of his whole life. The gross amount must be reduced to its present cash value, which would necessarily be less than the gross amount, and which may be arrived at by dividing this gross sum by one dollar, plus the legal rate of interest, 7 per cent. per annum, for the expectancy years of the deceased." The exception is without merit, and is admittedly controlled by the ruling of this court, in Standard Oil Co. v. Reagan, 15 Ga. App. 571(5), 589, 591, 84 S. E. 69. "The present worth of a debt payable at some future period without interest is such a sum as being put at interest will amount to the debt at the period when the debt becomes due." Sanford's Higher Analytical Arithmetic, 226. The rule given by this author to obtain the present worth is to "divide the given sum or debt by the amount of $1 for the given time at the given rate; the quotient will be the present worth."

5. Evidence \S 501(10)—General statement as to annual value of decedent's services not inadmissible in action for death.

The rule which precludes a witness in a case such as this from proving the amount of damages by a mere general statement would not exclude testimony as to the annual value of the decedent's services, especially where, as here, the witness, who is subject to cross-examination, goes into details as to the facts upon which his opinion is based. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Hartley, 25 Ga. App. 110, 112(4), 103 S. E. 259, 262, and cases there cited. See, also, Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co. v. Gornto, 129 Ga. 204, 206(1), 58 S. E. 769.

6. Trial \S 296(11)—Court's reference to life expectancy of average person of deceased's age held not to justify reversal.

The exception taken to the reference by the court to the life expectancy, under the annuity table, "of an average person of the age of deceased," could not justify a reversal on the theory that the court thus inferentially fixed the expectancy of the deceased, especially since the court had already charged that the tables were not binding upon the jury, and that they were not obliged to use them at all, and had previously instructed them that, "if in the case at bar the expectancy of the deceased would, under the evidence, have probably been greater or less than that of the average man, the amount of the damages to be allowed, if any, should be diminished or increased accordingly."

7. Death \S 58(1), 104(1, 6)—Trial \S 25(8)—Charge on earning capacity of deceased held justified; charge on effect of plea of justifiable homicide held proper; admission entitling defendant to open and close; unlawful killing presumed.

The remaining grounds of the motion for a new trial are without merit. In the judge's statement of the plaintiff's contentions he did not err in including her contention that the deceased was an expert automobile mechanic. A number of witnesses testified as to his mechanical ability in that line. See Napier v. Strong, 19 Ga. App. 401, 409(4), 91 S. E. 579. Nor was it error, especially in view of such evidence, to charge upon what might have been the increased earning capacity of the decedent. The remaining ground of the motion, upon which counsel appear especially to rely, is treated in the opinion.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; H. H. Merry, Judge pro hac.

Action by Mrs. Parrish McCranie against W. W. Williams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This was a suit for damages on account of the homicide of the plaintiff's husband, the petition alleging that he was unlawfully and intentionally shot and killed by the defendant, not by the commandment or with the permission of law, and not in self-defense or in defense of habitation, property, or person, under any such circumstances as would justify the killing. The defendant, by his original plea, admitted his residence in the county where the suit was brought, admitted the shooting and killing of the plaintiff's husband, and that it was not done by the commandment of law, and denied each and every other allegation set forth by the petition. By amendment the plea alleged:

"It is true that on the 11th day of October, 1919, the defendant shot the petitioner's husband, Parrish McCranie, with a pistol, inflicting wounds which resulted in the death of the said Parrish McCranie, but the defendant alleges that he killed the said Parrish McCranie in self-defense, and that said killing was justifiable homicide, and that at the time of the said killing the said Parrish McCranie was manifestly intending and endeavoring by violence and surprise to commit a felony on the said W. W. Williams."

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $20,000. The defendant excepts to the overruling of his motion for new trial.

Thos. W. Hardwick, of Atlanta, and E. L. Joiner, W. J. Hammond, and C. E. Hay, all of Thomasville, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-7] Exception is taken to the following portion of the charge of the court:

"The court instructs you as a matter of law that the effect of the admissions in the answer that the defendant did kill the plaintiff's husband by shooting him with a pistol, as charged in paragraph 2 of the petition, and by the filing of the amendment to the answer, specifically pleading justification, is to establish prima facie that said killing was unlawful, and that, if the plaintiff has proved sufficient facts or data from which the jury can form a reasonable estimate as to the value of the life of the said deceased, then such proof, together with said admission and said plea, would make out a prima facie case."

This instruction is alleged to be error, and harmful to the defendant under the pleadings in the case, for two reasons:

(1) That the admission in the answer to paragraph 2 of the petition, and the admission in his plea of justification whether standing separately or taken together, did not in law have the effect of establishing prima facie that the killing was unlawful, nor did the statements contained in said plea in law constitute an admission that the killing was prima facie unlawful; and (2) "that the effect of such plea of justification, either standing alone or taken along with the answer, when considered with the testimony of the plaintiff as to the amount of damages, did not amount to a prima facie case for the plaintiff in the sense that the term 'prima facie' case is used in the law."

The defendant contends that—

"Mere proof of damages by the plaintiff without more, would have made out no [prima facie] case, and that it was harmful error for the court to have coupled this proof of damage with a statement in the defendant's plea of justification, and thereupon charged the jury as a matter of law that the admission of an unlawful killing by the defendant in his plea, considered with the proof of damage, would make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff;" that, "without proof in this case from which an unlawful killing would arise, the plaintiff would in no event have been entitled to have recovery; and that, therefore, the court supplied the proof that the plaintiff should have made by telling the jury that the defendant had admitted that the killing was prima facie unlawful."

It cannot be said, nor did the judge charge, that the admission in the defendant's plea had the effect of establishing what could be strictly called a complete prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff. The admission did not cover the amount of the damage. Under the provisions of section 4488 of Civil Code

1910, this was not necessary, however, in order for the defendant to obtain the opening and conclusion by assuming the affirmative of the main issue under a plea of justification. This section of the Code provides as follows:

"In every case of tort, if the defendant was authorized by law to do the act complained of, he may plead the same as a justification; by such plea he admits the act to be done, and shall be entitled to all the privileges of one holding the affirmative of the issue; but such plea shall not give to the defendant the right to open and conclude the argument before the jury, unless it is filed before the plaintiff submits any evidence to the jury trying the case."

In actions ex contractu and in cases arising ex delicto, where the act complained of is not such as could be justified under the law, in order to obtain the opening and conclusion the defendant must admit a complete prima facie case, and to do that he must make such admissions as would, without more, prima facie entitle the plaintiff to recover in the amount sued for. Brunswick & Western R. Co. v. Wiggins, 113 Ga. 842 (2), 39 S. E. 551, 61 L. R. A. 513. In the instant case the judge did not state to the jury that the defendant had made such an admission as would without more, prima facie entitle the plaintiff to recover in the amount sued for, but in substance he instructed them that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover such damages as she had proved, unless the defendant had carried his portion of the burden by showing that the admitted homicide, though presumed by law to be unlawful, was in fact justifiable. This, we think, is in clear accord with the recent ruling in Darby v. Moore, 144 Ga. 758, 759 (5), 87 S. E. 1067, in which the Supreme Court upheld as sound the following charge:

"I charge you, gentlemen, that defendant having admitted by his pleadings the killing of O. G. Moore, and that the plaintiff is the widow of O. G. Moore, I charge you that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover damages for the slaying of her husband, unless it is shown to you that such killing was justifiable, or excusable, under the rules of law which will be hereafter given to you in charge."

Where the act which the defendant admits is one which as a matter of law is presumed to be unlawful a prima facie presumption of its unlawfulness follows, not as an additional admission, but as a legal consequence; and this result the defendant cannot escape by attaching to his admission of the act a plea of justification. This presumption of law is the thing which by his plea he proposes and assumes to disprove, and this is incumbent upon him to do. He must show that, contrary to the legal presumption, the admitted act was in fact lawful. By his admission of the act charged, coupled with a plea of justification, he does not place himself out of court by himself admitting the unlawfulness of the act. This he in fact denies. The law raises the presumption, the actual truth of which the defendant denies. The resulting legal inference is something which he cannot be heard to dispute; but since it is prima facie only, it is his privilege to deny and disprove its truth. It cannot be disputed that when the homicide is shown or admitted the law presumes malice, and it devolves upon the defendant to show justification. This the counsel for defendant do not, in their exceptionally able arguments, undertake to controvert. They do not deny that the defendant by his plea voluntarily assumed the burden of showing that the killing was justifiable. What they object to is the statement by the judge that, upon the admission of the act of killing, the law raised a mere prima facie presumption that it was unlawful. Their contention is that—

"No presumption or inference of the law will arise against him from such a plea, nor will he be held to have admitted even prima facie that the act, which he has voluntarily assumed to prove was a lawful act, was an unlawful act. This would be to put upon him the additional burden, not only of proving by his evidence that the alleged act was lawful, but of going to the jury handicapped by a solemn admission that his act, which he has assumed to show was lawful, was unlawful."

They argue that the rights of the defendant, under the quoted section of the Code (section 4488) are nullified by the charge that the effect of admitting the act of killing raises a prima facie legal presumption that the killing was unlawful, when the admission is coupled with the plea of justification. As we see it, there would be no burden for the defendant to assume, if, after admitting the killing, the law did not prima facie establish that such act was unlawful. The legal presumption is the very thing which the defendant finds it necessary to deny and disprove. It is not the existence, but the truth, of this presumption which the defendant under his plea of justification seeks to dispute. Nor, as we see it, does his plea of justification burden him with any admission that his act was unlawful. This he denies. It is the law, not the defendant, which says that the admitted act shall be deemed unlawful until the contrary shall be shown; and this, under his plea, it is his privilege to disprove. The only burden which the defendant has assumed is the one which he seems to admit he has assumed, to wit, the burden of showing that the killing was lawful. It is true that the provisions of section 4488, supra, give to a defendant pleading justification in an action of tort the right to the opening and conclusion by assuming the affirmative of the main issue, without admitting a complete prima facie case; but they do not give him such a privilege stripped of the attendant burden of carrying the onus which he thus actually assumes.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers \Leftrightarrow 11, 355—Duty to keep ticket offices open for reasonable time before trains; passenger's duty to use diligence to obtain ticket.

It is the duty of railroad companies to keep their ticket offices open for the sale of tickets for a reasonable time before the departure of trains, and the rules of the Railroad Commission of this state prescribe the method by which such duty shall be performed. It is the duty of passengers to use proper diligence in supplying themselves with tickets before boarding trains. Southern Ry. Co. v. Fleming, 128 Ga. 241, 57 S. E. 481.

2. Carriers \Leftrightarrow 256, 381(1)—Rights of passenger not afforded opportunity to purchase ticket, stated; train rate may be collected from junction point where passenger fails to obtain ticket; presumption that tickets were on sale and could have been purchased.

A passenger who has not been afforded a reasonable opportunity to purchase a ticket before boarding a train can only be charged the regular ticket rate for his fare, and he cannot while en route be required to leave the train in order to make such a purchase (Central R. Co. v. Strickland, 90 Ga. 562, 16 S. E. 852); but where a passenger, without fault on his part, boards a train without having provided himself with a ticket, and where he tenders and pays to the conductor the regular ticket rate, but only to the junction point of the carrier's line, and where he fails to show any reason which would explain his failure to there provide himself with a ticket for the remainder of his journey, the conductor of the other train is entitled to demand fare at the train rate instead of the ticket rate (Brown v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 128 Ga. 635, 58 S. E. 163). The presumption is that tickets were on sale and could have been purchased at the junction office. *Ga. Ry. & El. Co. v. 1. Testimony held conflicting.

The record discloses a conflict in the testimony as to whether or not the defendant complied with its statutory duty to blow the whistle of the locomotive in approaching the crossing at which the homicide of the plaintiff's husband occurred. While there was plain and positive testimony going to establish a compliance with such duty, there was some evidence which, if accepted by the jury, would nevertheless have authorized a finding to the contrary.

2. Negligence \Leftrightarrow 136(31)—Railroads \Leftrightarrow 350 (7, 13)—Questions of negligence and contributory negligence held for jury.

The railroad having thus failed to show by undisputed evidence that it had used all ordinary and reasonable care, the direction of a verdict in its favor was erroneous, since it devolved upon the jury to say whether or not the defendant, under the disputed testimony, was guilty of this negligence as charged, and, if so, whether the company had proved that the negligence per se of the decedent in approaching the crossing in an automobile at a rate of speed greater than that permitted by law, when taken together with any other proven act or omission on his part in approaching such place of danger which they as a matter of fact might have adjudged to constitute negligence, contributed to the homicide and exceeded in degree the negligence of the defendant, or whether such negligence on the part of the decedent contributed to the homicide and amounted to a lack of ordinary care. Central of Ga. Nov. 15, 1921.)(Syllabus by the Court.)*

1. Joint tenancy §9—Where joint tenant redeems from judicial sale, others may redeem their interests by paying proper part of purchase price.

A purchase of the common property by one joint tenant at a judicial sale made to satisfy a lien against such property for which all of the joint tenants are bound is for the benefit of all, and each may redeem his interest in the property by paying his proper proportion of the purchase price.

2. Joint tenancy §9—Where joint tenant, on assignment of vendor's lien, sues and purchases land under execution, the other may redeem.

Where one of the joint owners of a tract of land, subject to a vendor's lien which both of such owners are under obligation to discharge, pays off such lien, and takes an assignment of the same to himself, and brings a suit in his own name as assignee of the vendor to subject the whole of the common property to sale in satisfaction of such lien, and at a sale decreed in such suit becomes the purchaser of such property, he will be held to have made the purchase for the common benefit, and his co-owner may redeem his interest in such land by paying his proper proportion of the purchase money.

3. Joint tenancy §8, 13—Where joint tenant sells part of common property purchased at judicial sale to bona fide purchaser, such tenant must account to co-owner for price.

Where, in such case, the joint tenant, who purchased at the judicial sale, sells a part of such common property to a bona fide purchaser before any proceeding is instituted by the other interested party for the purpose of redeeming his interest therein, such purchaser will be protected, but such co-owner will be compelled to account for the purchase money so received by him.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Suit by A. D. Preston against Fred Dixon, Jr., and others. Decree for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. N. Read, of Hinton, and Price & McWhorter, of Lewisburg, for appellants.

Dillon & Nuckolls, of Fayetteville, for appellees.

RITZ, P. Plaintiff by this appeal seeks to reverse a decree of the circuit court of Greenbrier county which set aside a sale made to him of certain lands belonging to the plaintiff and the defendant jointly, and decreed that the defendant might have his interest in said lands upon payment of his proportion of the purchase money paid therefor by the plaintiff.

On the 14th day of December, 1908, the plaintiff and one Samuel Dixon purchased from S. T. Hedrick a tract of 225.41 acres of land, lying in Greenbrier county, at the price of $5,635.25. Of this sum $2,254.10 was paid in cash, and for the residue two notes were given for the sum of $1,690.57 each, payable in one and two years from date, with interest, and secured by a vendor's lien in the deed of conveyance from Hedrick to Dixon and Preston. At or about the same time the parties also purchased another small tract of land, lying near the above tract, for the sum of $200, all of which was paid in cash, and the title to which was taken in the name of the plaintiff, A. D. Preston, for the benefit, however, of both parties. It appears that the purpose of the parties in purchasing these lands was to operate them for the purpose of manufacturing cement, or else sell them for the purpose of such operation. Nothing was ever done, however, in furtherance of this purpose. On the 19th of June, 1911, Samuel Dixon conveyed his one-half interest in the 225.41-acre tract of land to his son Fred Dixon, Jr., reciting in said deed a consideration of $2,500. After the purchase of this land by Preston and Dixon an arrangement was made with the former owner by which he remained on the land and paid rent therefor; the rent being credited upon the interest accruing upon the deferred purchase-money notes, and being insufficient at any time to entirely discharge such interest. The two deferred purchase-money notes were not paid by Dixon and Preston, and in the fall of 1916 some correspondence was had between Fred Dixon and his father, Samuel Dixon, on the one hand, and Preston on the other, in regard to the payment of these notes.

It appears that Preston paid off the notes to Hedrick on the 7th of December, 1916, and then wrote to Fred Dixon advising him that he (Preston) had been called upon to discharge the notes, and that he had done so, and demanding of Dixon that he pay his one-half of the amount necessary therefor, and inclosed a statement showing this amount to be $2,044.47, which included one-half of certain taxes paid in addition to the one-half of the deferred purchase money notes. This communication was answered by Samuel Dixon, in which reply Preston was advised to draw a draft for the amount upon Fred Dixon through the American National Bank of Washington, D. C., attaching thereto the notes and tax tickets, and the same would be paid. Preston made no reply to this letter, nor did he draw the draft as requested; his excuse being that he did not want to part with the tax tickets and the paid notes. He made no further effort to collect the amount from Fred Dixon, nor did he make any further demand upon him that he pay the same. At the time Preston paid off these notes he took a deed of assignment from the holder of the vendor's lien by which the same was transferred, set over, and assigned to him, together with the notes secured thereby. On the 12th of February, 1917, Preston then brought a suit for the purpose of enforcing the vendor's lien assigned to him by the holder thereof, Hedrick, against the whole tract of land, and asked for a sale of the whole tract of land in satisfaction of the lien so assigned to him. At the time he brought this suit he wrote a letter to Samuel Dixon, inclosing a copy of the process, and asked him to have it accepted by his son Fred Dixon. To this letter Samuel Dixon replied, declining to accept service of process, or to have it served on his son, and further advised that there was no necessity for the institution of any suit, and calling the attention of Preston to his former letter asking him to draw a draft for the amount through the American National Bank of Washington, D. C., and again advising him that if he would draw such draft the same would be paid. Preston paid no attention to this, but had an order of publication posted and published against Fred Dixon, and proceeded with the cause.

On the 17th of April, 1917, a decree was entered granting the relief asked for by the plaintiff. This decree found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the vendor's lien, adjudicated that the same was a lien upon the 225.41-acre tract of land, and decreed said tract of land to be sold in satisfaction of said lien, and further provided that the proceeds of such sale should be applied: First, to the payment of costs of suit and expenses of sale; second, to the payment of plaintiff's lien, with legal interest; and, third, that any residue should be divided equally between the plaintiff, A. D. Preston, and the defendant Fred Dixon, Jr. The term of the court at which this decree was entered adjourned on the 19th of April, two days after its entry. The sale provided for in the decree was made on the 26th of May, 1917, and at this sale Preston became the purchaser of the land for the sum of $5,635.25, the exact amount of the original purchase price paid by him and Samuel Dixon therefor. This sale was confirmed on the 26th of June, 1917, and in that decree credit is given Preston for the amount of the vendor's lien upon the purchase price of the property, which left a balance of $1,511.05. This amount he paid, and out of it the costs of suit and expenses of sale were paid, and the residue, $1,365.83, in accordance with the provisions of the decree of April 17, 1917, was divided, and one-half thereof paid to Preston and a check for the other one-half thereof sent to Fred Dixon, Jr., by registered mail. This check was received by Fred Dixon and held by him until the filing of this proceeding to set aside the sale, but was never used, and in fact is filed with his petition herein. The special commissioner who made the sale at which Preston became the purchaser made a deed conveying the land to Preston, and shortly thereafter Preston sold 100 acres off of the tract to a man by the name of A. A. Scott for the sum of $4,000, leaving remaining 125.41 acres.

On the 16th day of May, 1919, Fred Dixon filed his petition, in which he asked that the decree of sale and the deed to Preston, above referred to, be set aside, or that the same be held to be for his benefit, as well as the benefit of Preston. Preston insisted that Dixon was not entitled to file this petition because the same was not tendered within two years from the entry of the decree complained of. In addition to desiring to redeem his one-half interest in the 225.41-acre tract, Dixon in his pleadings attempted to have the legal title for the small tract of about 10 acres abstracted from Preston to the extent that he (Dixon) was the owner thereof. Dixon also asked that the sale made by Preston to Scott of the 100 acres for $4,000 be set aside. The circuit court held that Dixon was not entitled to have the interest of the parties in the small tract of 10 acres determined in this proceeding, and declined that relief. He also declined to set aside the deed made by Preston to Scott for the 100 acres, holding that Scott was protected under section 8 of chapter 132 of the Code (sec. 4942), but held that Dixon was entitled to the benefit of this sale, and that Preston must account to him for one-half of the purchase money received from Scott, and further held that Dixon was entitled to redeem his half interest in the remaining 125.41 acres by paying to Preston one-half of the amount paid by Preston to the original vendor, as well as one-half of any taxes or other proper expenses which Preston had paid.

Preston contends that the court erred in allowing Dixon to attack the sale made by the commissioner at which he became the purchaser of the land, for the reason that it was more than two years from the entry of the decree until the filing of the pleading attacking the same, and that because of this lapse of time said decree could not be attacked by Dixon under the provisions of section 14 of chapter 124 of the Code (sec. 4750); and, further, that even though the attack on the decree was made in time, still no error has been shown therein; while Dixon contends that the two-year period of limitations provided by the statute relied upon does not begin to run from the entry of the decree of sale, but only from the entry of the decree confirming the same, his contention being that the decree of sale was not a final decree; and, further, that even though two years had expired, that would not prevent him from bringing the suit to redeem his interest under the facts shown to exist in this case; that he and Preston being cotenants in the property, the purchase by Preston at a sale made under a lien against the whole property was nothing more than a redemption by Preston from the lien, and that he is entitled to have the benefit of such redemption upon paying his one-half of the costs thereof, which he offers to do. Dixon also assigns as cross-error the refusal of the court to set aside the sale made to Scott of the 100 acres, and also the refusal of the court to determine the rights of himself and Preston in the small 10-acre tract, the legal title to which is held by Preston admittedly as a trustee for himself and Samuel Dixon.

[1] It is very well established that a cotenant in dealing with common property must exercise the utmost good faith toward those jointly interested with him. If there is an incumbrance upon the property which all of the cotenants are obligated to pay, the discharge of it by one cotenant is simply a redemption for the benefit of all, upon the others paying their proper share; and it has likewise been repeatedly held that where the common property is sold, either under a decree of court or under a deed of trust given to secure a debt which all of the common owners are obligated for, and is purchased by one of the cotenants at such sale, such purchase amounts to no more than a redemption of the joint property, and inures to the benefit of all of the cotenants, should they desire to take advantage thereof by paying their proper proportion of the indebtedness. Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 151; Weaver v. Akin, 48 W. Va. 456, 37 S. E. 600; Reed v. Bachman, 61 W. Va. 452, 57 S. E. 769, 123 Am. St. Rep. 996; Goodloe v. Woods, 115 Va. 540, 80 S. E. 108; Roberts v. Thorn, 25 Tex. 728, 78 Am. Tisdale*, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 596, 64 Am. Dec. 775.

[2] What was the effect of the purchase made by Preston at the special commissioner's sale? It must be borne in mind that when he discharged the vendor's lien he took a regular deed assigning the same to himself. He did not rely upon the equitable lien which would arise in his favor against Dixon's half of the land for one-half of the money paid by him. He did not bring a suit to subject Dixon's one-half of the land to the satisfaction of this equitable lien, but he did bring a suit as holder of the vendor's lien to subject the whole of the land, and to have sale of the whole of the tract in satisfaction of the lien against it. This suit could have no different effect than if it had been brought by Hedrick, the original owner of the vendor's lien. Preston stepped into Hedrick's shoes by reason of the assignment to him by Hedrick, and the suit was brought to enforce that lien against the whole tract of land, and the decree was for the sale of the whole tract of land in satisfaction of the lien. Now, it is quite well settled that if Hedrick had brought exactly the same kind of suit which was brought by Preston as his assignee, and a joint tenant had purchased the common property at a sale made in such suit, such a purchase would have been for the common benefit, and could be taken advantage of by any of the cotenants upon paying their proper proportion of the purchase price. But could Preston give the proceeding a different color because he was enforcing the lien as Hedrick's assignee? Can it be said that the assignment and transfer of the notes to him, and of the vendor's lien securing them, would add anything to a suit brought by him to enforce that lien against the whole tract of land that would not have attached to such a suit had it been brought by his assignor? If the suit had been brought by his assignor, and at a sale the land purchased by a stranger, then, of course, no complaint could be made by Dixon; and so in this case, if the land had been bought at the sale by a stranger, neither of the parties could complain. Manifestly the court had jurisdiction to enforce the lien. Preston could, however, have brought a suit seeking to subject only the interest of Dixon to the satisfaction of his equitable lien for the amount which he had paid in discharge of notes that Dixon should have paid. This suit, however, would not have been a suit to enforce a vendor's lien. The common property would not have been involved in the suit as such. It would have been a suit only involving the undivided interest of Dixon, and the vendor's lien against the whole tract of land would not have been involved, but only the establishment of Preston's equitable lien against Dixon's half, and the procurement of satisfaction thereof by a sale of that interest. Preston, however, treated himself as a purchaser of the vendor's lien and took an assignment thereof. In this way he acquired an incumbrance against the joint estate, and under the doctrine of the above authorities such acquisition was for the common benefit. When he brought the suit to enforce this lien, he was acting for both himself and Dixon, for the purchase of the lien by him was for the benefit of both, and he could not, by bringing a suit to enforce it, exclude Dixon from the benefits arising from such enforcement. What were these benefits? Nothing less than the procurement of a sale of the land, and when Preston became the purchaser at the sale in the absence of outside bidders, he became such for the purpose of protecting the property in which they were both interested. Preston stands in no different position than if the suit to enforce the vendor's lien had been brought by his assignor and he had become the purchaser at a sale made in such a suit, in which event it is quite clear from the authorities that his co-owner would be entitled, upon paying his proportion of the purchase price, to have his original interest in the subject-matter of the purchase, provided, always, such a condition had not arisen as to destroy his rights. No such condition is shown to have existed here. We are therefore of opinion that Dixon was entitled to maintain a bill to redeem his half interest in the land.

It may be said, however, that Dixon did not file such a bill; that he filed a petition and answer and cross-bill apparently in the original suit brought by Preston to enforce the vendor's lien for the purpose of opening up that proceeding and having relief therein. It is true that the pleadings filed were attempted to be filed in that suit. Their allegations, however, are sufficient for a bill to redeem the interest of Dixon, and to re-vest the title thereto in him. Process was duly served upon Preston and upon Scott, the purchaser of the 100 acres, and full defense was made thereto, and there is no reason why the court may not treat these pleadings as an original bill, and grant the relief to which Dixon has shown himself entitled.

A great deal of argument is indulged in by the parties as to whether or not Dixon's petition and answer and cross-bill were filed in time to open up the decree of sale. In view of the conclusion we have reached, this is entirely immaterial. Dixon's right to redeem does not depend upon opening up the vendor's lien suit. The purchase made by Preston in that suit amounted to nothing more than a redemption of the land for the common benefit, and Dixon is entitled to redeem his interest from Preston so long as he is not barred of that right in some of the ways provided by law.

[3] Did the court err in refusing to set aside the sale by Preston of the 100 acres to Scott? Scott claims to be protected as a purchaser under the provisions of section 8 of chapter 132 of the Code, while Dixon contends that Scott was required to take notice of everything of which the record would have informed him. The court in the vendor's lien suit undoubtedly had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties. Its decrees entered in that suit were not void. The purchase by Preston made in that suit was interpreted by the court as being for his exclusive benefit. But does that fact deprive Scott of his title to the 100 acres? This purchase was made by Scott after Preston's title was complete, and there was no proceeding pending to reverse or correct the decree entered by the circuit court in the vendor's lien suit. It matters not that Scott did not purchase directly from the special commissioner. Under our holdings he is protected, under the provisions of section 8 of chapter 132 of the Code, when he purchases from a party to the suit, to the same extent as though he had been a purchaser at the judicial sale. Chapman v. Branch, 72 W. Va. 54, 78 S. E. 235.

Nor did the court err in refusing to take cognizance of the interests of the parties in the 10-acre tract referred to in the pleadings. Their interests in this tract were entirely separate and distinct from their interests in the 225.41-acre tract. In fact, it does not appear that Fred Dixon has any interest in the 10-acre tract, or had such an interest at the time of the institution of the suit, or at the time he filed this proceeding to redeem his interest in the other tract. It involved a controversy, if, indeed, there is any conflict between the parties in regard to it, entirely dissociated with the matters involved here and likely between different parties.

Upon a careful review of the matters presented, we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court correctly determines the interests of the parties, and the same will therefore be affirmed.

STATE v. WEISSENGOFF. (No. 4197.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 18, 1921. Rehearing Denied Dec. 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \S 1153(3)—Departure from usual order of introducing evidence not error unless discretion is abused.

A departure from the usual order of introduction of evidence in the trial of a case does not constitute error, unless it amounts to an abuse of discretion in the trial court.

2. Witnesses \S 401—Party making opposing witness his own while cross-examining may indirectly contradict his testimony.

Although a party making an opposite witness his own, by cross-examination as to matter not testified to in chief, cannot directly impeach him by the testimony of another witness, he may prove, by such other witness, any fact that is admissible as part of his case, notwithstanding conflict in the evidence of the two witnesses, and thus impliedly and indirectly contradict the witness so made his own.

3. Witnesses \S 305(1)—Privilege because tending to incriminate waived by answering without objection.

The privilege of a witness to decline to answer a question tending to incriminate him is strictly personal, and is waived and lost, for the purposes of the trial, by his answering it without protest or objection, and in such case the trial court may properly overrule a motion to strike out his answer to such question.

4. Criminal law \S 351(8)—Evidence showing defendant's attempt to obtain perjured testimony is admissible.

Testimony tending to prove an attempt on the part of the defendant in a criminal case to obtain perjured testimony in his behalf is relevant, material, and therefore admissible, even though its probative value is slight.

5. Criminal law \S 390—Any evidence tending to prove defendant's innocent intention admissible.

Upon a material issue as to the actual bona fide intention of a party to a transaction, anything that casts light upon his motive and purpose, and tends to prove innocence of intentional wrongdoing, is admissible. For such purpose, action under advice of counsel as to matters involving positive law, ignorance of which does not excuse, is admissible.

6. Criminal law \S 814(3)—Instruction not supported by any evidence is error.

An instruction that includes an hypothesis not supported by any evidence at all cannot properly be given.

7. Criminal law \S 778(11)—Proof of merely technical flight will not warrant an instruction thereon.

Proof of a merely technical flight by an accused person, if any at all, attended by circumstances rendering it highly improbable that he actually fled from the scene of the alleged offense, does not appreciably tend to prove flight as an incriminating fact, wherefore an instruction cannot properly be predicated upon it.

8. Homicide \S 296—Testimony on whether accused knew he was resisting an officer with a valid writ held to justify instruction as to whether officer commanded him to stop.

Upon an issue in a criminal case as to whether the accused, in resisting an officer, knew he was resisting an attempt of the latter to put him under arrest by virtue of a valid writ then in his possession, testimony to the effect that, before the struggle began, the officer commanded the accused to stop, told him he had a warrant for him, and, at the beginning of the struggle, declared him to be under arrest, justifies inclusion in an instruction of an inquiry as to whether, in the struggle, the officer commanded him to stop, the attempt to enforce the order being, in law, a repetition thereof.

9. Criminal law \S 785(3)—Instructing that jury may arbitrarily believe or disbelieve any witness is error.

It is reversible error to instruct the jury in a trial that they may arbitrarily believe or disbelieve any witness testifying in the case.

10. Criminal law \S 821(2)—Accidental omission of material instruction does not excuse error.

Inadvertence or accident in the omission to give a proper and material instruction requested does not excuse the error in the failure to give it.

Error to Circuit Court, Grant County.

Pete Weissengoff was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail, and to pay a fine, and he brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

Neely & Lively, of Fairmont, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., Chas. Ritchie, Asst. Atty. Gen., Arthur Arnold, Pros. Atty., of Piedmont, and Harry G. Fisher, of Keyser, for the State.

POFFENBARGER, J. The new trial awarded Peter Weissengoff, by the decision on a former writ of error in this case, reported in 85 W. Va. 271, 101 S. E. 450, resulted in his conviction of involuntary manslaughter and imposition of imprisonment in the county jail, with labor on the public roads, and a fine of $2,000, by way of punishment. On this writ of error, he complains of the judgment, assigning errors in the judgment itself, and predicating several other assignments of error upon rulings made in the trial, respecting admission and exclusion of evidence and the giving and refusal of instructions.

[1, 2] On his cross-examination, certain questions were propounded to him, respecting a matter not referred to nor brought out on his examination in chief, and, after he had answered them, a motion to strike out that part of his evidence was overruled. One ground of this motion was lack of right in the state to elicit the information by cross-examination, its admissibility being assumed. This pertains to the mere order or mode of introduction of evidence, a matter largely left in the discretion of the trial court. It is not error to adhere to the rules of practice. On the other hand, the court has discretion to relax them. In the latter case, there is no error, in the absence of an abuse of discretion. Bond v. National Fire Ins. Co., 77 W. Va. 736, 88 S. E. 389; State v. Littleton, 77 W. Va. 804, 88 S. E. 458; Pocahontas Collieries Co v. Williams, 105 Va. 708, 54 S. E. 868. We have no decision in which a judgment has been reversed for departure from the rule limiting the cross-examination to the subject-matter of the examination in chief.

The questions under consideration related to an alleged conversation between the accused and one Albert Davis, relied upon by the state as suggesting acceptance of money from the accused, by Davis, with which to procure testimony favorable to the former. They were all answered without protest or objection, and then a motion was made to strike out the answers.

[3] It may be true that the questions tended to incrimination of the witness, and he was under no duty to answer them. But, if so, in answering them he waived his constitutional privilege. Right to it is strictly personal, and, if not promptly claimed, it is waived, and so lost. Taylor v. U. S., 152 Fed. 1, 81 C. C. A. 197; Morgan v. Halberstadt, 60 Fed. 592, 9 C. C. A. 147; Eggers v. Fox, 177 Ill. 185, 52 N. E. 269; State v. Laudano, 74 Conn. 638, 51 Atl. 860; 40 Cyc. 2552; 28 R. C. L. 428.

Admissibility of Davis' testimony to the conversation, which the court likewise refused to strike out, depends upon whether the alleged fact was relevant and material to the issue. If it was the ruling was correct, even though it may not have been admissible for impeachment of the accused. The state could prove the fact by Davis, in support of its case, notwithstanding the implied contradiction of the accused in doing so, even though it be conceded that the cross-examination made him the state's witness as to the transaction. Lambert v. Armentrout, 65 W. Va. 375, 64 S. E. 260, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 556; Hickory v. U. S., 151 U. S. 303, 14 Sup. Ct. 334, 38 L. Ed. 170.

[4] Admittedly, the accused asked Albert Davis, while the trial was in progress, if he had not heard a certain person, who does not seem to have testified, say the sheriff, Donald P. Davis, was drinking or drunk on the occasion of the transaction in which he was killed. Davis testified that he had gone further, and said in that connection, "Money is no object to me. I want to get out of it." This alleged conversation seems to have been regarded as involving solicitation to Davis to obtain perjured testimony for the accused and an offer of money for that purpose. A jury could so interpret it, if they believed the suggestion as to money, which the accused denied. Being susceptible of such interpretation, it was the province of the jury to say what it meant, and it was admissible, if in any legitimate sense probative. State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 603, 39 S. E. 676. An attempt to prevent a fair trial by corruption of a witness is admissible evidence against the party resorting to it. Maynard v. Bailey, 85 W. Va. 679, 102 S. E. 480, 9 A. L. R. 981. Vagueness of this evidence detracts from its value, but its probative value is not the test of admissibility.

No doubt the court, if requested, would have instructed the jury not to consider Davis' testimony as matter directly contradicting the statement of the accused. A general objection to it did not impose that duty on the court, however.

[5] The liberality of the rule, justifying admission of this evidence, would have admitted the testimony of the accused, tending to prove ignorance on his part, at the time of the attempted arrest, of the sheriff's possession of a capias authorizing it. If permitted, he would have told the jury he had been advised by his attorneys that his case had been continued at the April term of court, until the July term, and, in substance, that he could go about his business until that time. Having direct bearing upon a vital issue in the case—resistance of arrest, resulting in the death of the officer—this evidence was improperly excluded. Neither liability of the accused to arrest, forfeiture of his recognizance, issuance of the capias, the officer's possession thereof, nor its validity was in issue or contradicted by this evidence. It pertained solely to the intention and purposes of the accused, on the occasion of the fatal transaction. Upon an issue as to the actual bona fide intention of an actor in any transaction in which such intent is material, anything that directly casts light upon his probable motives is competent for the consideration of the jury. Blodgett Paper Co. v. Farmer, 41 N. H. 398; Harvey v. Stevens, 58 N. H. 338; Tobin v. Walkinshaw, Fed. Cas. No. 14,070; Bottomley v. United States, Fed. Cas. No. 1,688. Nothing is better calculated to accomplish such a result under the circumstances here disclosed than the advice of counsel.

There was no error in the giving of the state's instruction No. 1. In connection with its correct statement of the theory of the prosecution, it included the timeworn rule of presumption of intention as to consequences of a wrongful act. Properly guarded, as it was here, this rule may always go to the jury in homicide cases, if there is evidence of such acts resulting in death. State v. Taylor, 57 W. Va. 228, 50 S. E. 247; State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 52 S. E. 981.

[7] Instruction No. 4 given for the state should have been refused. It propounds the theory of flight of the accused as an incriminating circumstance. After the tragedy occurred at the West Virginia end of the bridge, between Piedmont, W. Va., and Westernport, Md., the accused merely went from that place to his home in Westernport. In the collision, both he and some of his children were hurt. If it can be said there was technical flight in leaving the state, the circumstances were such as fully repelled all inferences of guilt arising from it. All taken together, they do not appreciably tend to prove consciousness of guilt.

[8] An instruction was given over objection of the accused, based upon the alleged conversation between him and the witness Davis, hypothetically submitting the theory of the state as to it, and telling the jury they might consider it as a circumstance with all the other testimony, in passing upon the guilt or innocence of the accused, if they believed Davis. It should have been refused because it embodies an hypothesis not sustained by any evidence at all, namely, an "attempt to influence any witness for the state." The conversation did not relate to Davis' own testimony, nor anything to which he could have testified, and Ravenscroft, the man mentioned, was not a witness.

The objection to the giving of the state's instruction No. 7 is untenable. There is evidence that Davis commanded the accused to stop, told him he had a warrant for him, jumped on the running board of the car, and said, "Pete, you are under arrest." This clearly tends to prove the hypotheses submitted by the instruction, which it is argued are unsupported by evidence. All that followed was an attempt to make good the order of submission to arrest.

[9] State's instructions Nos. 8 and 13 were improperly given over objections. In substance, they are the same as instructions disapproved in State v. Ringer, 84 W. Va. 546, 100 S. E. 413, and State v. Long, 108 S. E. 279, there interpreted as having authorized the jury arbitrarily to believe or disbelieve any witness testifying in the case. In both of those cases, the giving of such an instruction was held to be reversible error. We perceive no reason for departure from them as precedents.

[8] State's instruction No. 15 does not assume knowledge on the part of the accused of the sheriff's possession of the capias, while they were struggling for control of the car. It submits to the jury an inquiry as to previous arrest by virtue of the capias offered in evidence. This could not have occurred with his knowledge of the writ. At any rate, the reference to the writ, in the submission of that inquiry, was sufficient to carry knowledge on the part of the accused of its possession by the sheriff to the jury as part of the hypothesis, and the jury could not have been misled by the subsequent phrase, "knowing the sheriff held the capias." For the purposes of another trial, however, it should be made more specifically hypothetical as to knowledge of the writ.

[10] The court erred in its unintentional refusal to give instruction No. 10, requested by the defendant. It is identical with instruction No. 16, refused on the former trial, but approved by this court in our disposition of the former writ of error. That refusal thereof was inadvertent is immaterial. The result is just as detrimental as if it had been intentional.

It is impossible to concur in the view urged here, that the errors herein noted are harmless. The case involves an issue as to whether the fatality was occasioned by the accused or by the action of the deceased himself, and that is a question for jury determination in a trial free from erroneous rulings by the court, in the progress thereof, working prejudice to the accused.

As the judgment will have to be reversed for the errors herein noted, particularly those committed in rulings on instructions, it is unnecessary to enter upon an inquiry as to the extent of the constitutional limitation upon penalties applicable to misdemeanors, and not defined by statute. The verdict upon which the present judgment stands will be set aside, and then there will be neither a verdict nor a judgment. If there should be another conviction, the judgment to be rendered upon it may be clearly and concededly valid.

For the reasons stated, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

STATE v. McDONIE. (No. 4283.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 4, 1921. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Jury \S 148(1)—Oath administered to jury in felony case need not be entered on record.

It is not necessary that the form of the oath administered to the jury in a felony case should be entered on the record. It is sufficient if the record shows that the jury was duly sworn.

2. Jury \S 148(1)—Recital that jury was duly sworn not overcome by recital giving effect of oath.

A recital in the order impaneling the jury in a felony case that the jury was duly sworn will not be overcome by another recital attempting to give the effect of the oath administered, which indicates a failure of full compliance with the form of oath usually administered in such cases.

3. Criminal law \S 564(3)—Venue need not be proven by direct testimony.

The venue in a criminal case need not be proven by direct testimony. When the facts proven show that the crime could not have been committed in any other county than that named in the indictment the venue is sufficiently proven.

4. Criminal law \S 304(6)—Court will take judicial notice that city is county seat of certain county.

Judicial notice will be taken of the fact that the city of Huntington, W. Va., is in the county of Cabell, and is the county seat thereof.

5. Assault and battery \S 83—Witnesses not recognizing defendant's voice may testify, where others did recognize voice.

Where the basis of a prosecution is successive assaults inflicted upon a child of tender years, evidence of persons that, within a few days prior to the last assault, which resulted in the arrest of the defendant, they heard, coming from the house of the defendant, outcries indicating that the child was being severely castigated, and heard what they took to be the defendant's voice in connection therewith, is admissible; and the fact that some of the witnesses who testified to these occurrences may not have distinguished the defendant's voice does not render their evidence inadmissible, where it appears that other witnesses, who heard the same occurrences, did recognize the defendant's voice in connection therewith.

6. Mayhem ⚡—"To maim" defined.

"To maim" means to violently inflict a bodily injury upon a person, so as to make him less able to defend himself or annoy his adversary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Maim.]

7. Criminal law ⚡800(3), 830 — Technical words charging offense should be defined, but refusing inaccurate instruction is not error.

In the trial of a criminal case, where technical words are used in charging the defendant with the offense, the court, upon request, should define such technical terms to the jury; but it is not error to refuse an instruction attempting to define such a technical term, when the definition given is not accurate.

8. Assault and battery ⚡82—Where defendant's punishment of his minor stepson was excessive, jury may infer malice and criminal intent.

In a prosecution against a stepfather for committing a felonious assault upon his six year old stepson, if it is shown that the treatment to which such stepson had been subjected was such as to result in serious bodily injury to him, the jury may from that fact find that the punishment inflicted was in excess of that which the law contemplates, and may also find from the same fact that such stepfather was actuated by malice, as well as that he acted with a criminal intent.

9. Criminal law ⚡404(4)—In prosecution for felonious assault, underclothing and bandages, found in the injured child's bed, held admissible.

In a prosecution against a stepfather for assault upon his stepson, the child's underclothing, found in the bed from which the child was removed by officers arresting the father, as well as bandages therein found, which apparently came from the legs of such child, are properly admitted in evidence, even though the witnesses did not notice these articles at the time they removed the child, but upon their return, later the same day, discovered and removed them.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

10. Assault and battery ⚡83—In prosecution for felonious assault on stepson, officer's evidence as to finding child's mother in house held not erroneously admitted.

In prosecution of a stepfather for a felonious assault on a stepson, testimony of an officer to finding the child in bed and to his condition, and to finding his mother in a back room in the dark, throwing a light on her, and asking her what she was doing there, held not erroneously admitted.

Error to Circuit Court, Mason County.

Joe McDonie was convicted of malicious assault, and he brings error. Affirmed.

D. B. Daugherty and R. L. Saunders, both of Huntington, and B. H. Blagg and Somerville & Somerville, all of Point Pleasant, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., R. A. Blessing, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Robt. L. Hogg, Pros. Atty., of Point Pleasant, for the State.

RITZ, P. The defendant was found guilty by a jury upon an indictment charging him with having committed a malicious assault upon his stepson, James Gibson, with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill him, the said James Gibson; and to review a judgment sentencing him to confinement in the penitentiary, rendered upon said verdict, he prosecutes this writ of error.

It appears that in the month of June, 1920, the defendant, Joe McDonie, married Susie Gibson, who was the widow of James M. Gibson, and the mother of James Gibson, a boy 6 years of age. Prior to her marriage to McDonie this child had lived for some time with his grandparents, but when the McDones went to housekeeping in the city of Huntington the child was taken to live with his mother and stepfather. On the 21st of August, 1920, the child's uncle had information from some source that the boy was being mistreated, and went to the residence of the McDones to inquire about it. When he got to the McDonie residence, he asked Mrs. McDonie how the boy was, and upon being informed that he was all right he asked where he was, and if he might see him. He was informed by Mrs. McDonie that the boy was upstairs, but that he could not see him. He then attempted to go upstairs to see the child, but was prevented by Mrs. McDonie. He thereupon went to the telephone to call the police, and Mrs. McDonie attempted to prevent him from doing so; but in this he succeeded, and when the officers came they entered the house and found the child in a room upstairs lying in bed. An examination disclosed that he had been badly mistreated, and the chief of police directed the boy to be taken to a doctor for attention. The boy's uncle took him to a hospital, and called a doctor and also a trained nurse to attend him. He was examined upon his arrival at the hospital, and the doctor and nurse testify as to his condition at that time. It was found that he was very much emaciated, was suffering from shock, and from abrasions and bruises all over his body.

The nurse testifies that his head was one mass of bruises; that his left ear was torn at the top and bottom, and that there was a deep abrasion at the back of this ear; that his right ear was also torn at the top, and a deep abrasion at the bottom of it; that two lower teeth were missing and the cavities filled with pus; that there was a deep abrasion in his lower lip, and his tongue cut in several places; that his throat was lacerated; that he was unable to swallow even water; that his back was covered with scratches, bruises, and cuts, many of which were infected, the nurse testifying that she counted 68 of these cuts on his back; that there was a cut in his left arm extending across the axillary; that there was a burn on his left hand of considerable size and that the knuckles of his right hand had a seared burn thereon; that the palms of both hands were blistered with burns, which left deep pits, in which there was pus; that his abdomen was a solid bruise, being black at the time of the examination, changing to green in 48 hours thereafter; that the back of one of his legs had two seared burns, underneath which there were scabs; on the left leg was one burn; that both feet were badly scalded, the burns extending from his toes up to his ankles and all over the feet, on one foot extending underneath and between the toes, so that gauze had to be kept between them to keep them from growing together. His condition was such that the child, according to the testimony of the physician and nurse, was on the verge of convulsions, and for three or four nights neither ate nor slept, but simply lay in a stupor. The doctor who attended him testifies that he was very much alarmed as to his condition and about his recovery.

The defendant and his wife were arrested and taken to jail. An indictment was found against them, charging them with maliciously wounding the child, and on their motion the case was removed for trial from Cabell county into the circuit court of Mason county. Upon the trial of the case the state introduced a number of witnesses, who testified that they heard screams from the child at various times during the week just previous to the arrest of the defendants; that they heard splashing in the bathtub, and the child calling for help while this was going on; and that they heard McDonie's voice apparently in the same room.

At the time he was arrested he admitted having whipped the child much harder than he should have, and also admitted that after he had so whipped him he tied his feet together, and held him in the bathtub, and turned the hot water in on him, and held him there for the purpose of scaring him, as he says; that the water was hotter than he thought it was, and severely scalded both of the child's feet, so badly that the skin pulled off them when his socks were removed after he was taken in charge by the police officers. McDonie denies that he ever whipped the child on any other occasion, except once very moderately. He testifies that the occasion for the last whipping administered to him was that on the night before, when he came home to his supper about 8 o'clock, the child went upstairs with him; that he shaved and was getting ready to take a bath, when he noticed the child's absence; that he called down to his wife to know if he was downstairs, and upon being informed that he was not that he immediately dressed and went out and searched for the child; that this was about 10:30 o'clock in the evening; that this search continued until some time after midnight, and that the child was recovered and brought back by his uncle somewhere near 2 o'clock; that they then ate their supper and went to bed; that on the next day they got up about 11 o'clock in the morning, and had breakfast between that time and 12 o'clock; that after breakfast was over he made inquiry of his wife as to whether or not the boy should be corrected or chastised for running away the evening before, and his wife suggested that he be sent to bed and made to stay there all day. She told the boy to go upstairs and go to bed, and he says the boy refused to do so; that his wife thereupon got him some switches, and he took the switches and the boy upstairs and chastised him; that he was not able to make him submissive by the use of the switches, and he thereupon conceived the plan of tying his feet together and putting him in the hot water in the bathtub; that when he discovered that this water was hotter than he thought it was he allowed the boy to get out of the tub and get in bed, and he went to a drug store and got some salve, which his wife applied to the boy's feet, and put some bandages on them; and that he thereupon went out to his work, and was subsequently arrested on the street about 9 o'clock. It was further shown upon the trial that McDonie had been married to the boy's mother less than two months; that the boy's father had been killed in a railroad accident several years before, in fact before the boy's birth, and that in a suit to recover on account of his wrongful death the sum of $3,750 was awarded, one-half of which belonged to the boy at the time of the occurrences herein referred to, and one-half to the mother. After being arrested, McDonie stated to a deputy sheriff at the jail that he had whipped the child because he had run away, and put him in the bathtub to scare him, and tied his feet together, but that he did not know the water was warm enough to do the child any injury. He also stated to another witness, while being taken to jail, that they were going to try to railroad him for the offense, and in reply to an inquiry stated that he did whip the child unmercifully; that he whipped the blood out of him all over. These statements McDonie did not deny, nor did he attempt in any way to explain them. His wife was introduced as a witness in his behalf, and corroborated his statements as above outlined.

The theory of the state was that this child had been subjected to repeated indignities during at least the week prior to the arrest of the defendant; that this is borne out by the testimony of the witnesses who heard the child's outcries on different occasions, and heard McDonie's voice apparently directing his chastisement; that it is further borne out by the fact that his limbs and his body were covered with sores, a number of which were apparently of some age, from the reason that they had become infected and filled with pus; that the result of these repeated assaults or attacks and chastisements which culminated in the conduct above narrated on the 21st day of August was that the boy was at the point of death at the time he was rescued by his uncle. In fact, it was apparent from the testimony of the physician who attended him, and of the nurse in whose custody he was for two weeks, that, had he not received medical attention at the time he did, he would not long have survived.

[1, 2] The defendant assigns a number of errors committed by the court during the trial of this case, the first of which is that it appears from the record that the jury was not properly sworn. The order impaneling the jury relates that the plea of not guilty was entered and issue joined thereon, and proceeds:

"And thereupon came [naming the 12 jurors], 12 good and lawful men, selected in the manner required by law, duly qualified to sit in said case, who were duly sworn to well and truly try according to the evidence, and true deliverance make of the prisoner at the bar, Joe McDonie, whom they should have in charge."

It is contended by the defendant that, if the order had only recited that the jury had been duly sworn, it would have been sufficient, but that, inasmuch as it goes on and attempts to recite according to defendant's contention, the oath that was administered, and which oath does not appear to have all of the requisites of the oath required by law, this negatives the statement that they were duly sworn, and shows affirmatively that the oath administered was not the oath required by law. It is true that, if the recital in the order contains the oath actually administered, then it is not in the form ordinarily administered in felony cases. There is no statute prescribing any particular form of oath, but there is a form well recognized, with which the profession is fully acquainted, the requirements of which it is contended are not met by the oath administered in this case. Does the order in this case attempt to set out the oath actually administered; or, to state the proposition in another way, is the matter contained in the order, after the recitation that the jury was duly sworn, anything more than the clerk's interpretation of what was done, merely a paraphrase by him of the oath actually administered? The order does not in so many words say that the language in it was the oath administered, but it does say in direct language that the jury was duly sworn; and can it be said that this positive declaration will be overcome by the further statement above quoted? It does not appear in the record that any objection was made to the oath administered to the jury at the time it was impaneled, and this fact is significant, for it is unthinkable that the defendant and the eminent counsel who represented him at the trial would sit by and permit an improper oath to be administered to the jury, without calling it to the attention of the court. The statement in the order is not very far from the requirements of the oath ordinarily administered in this kind of a case, and even though it appeared affirmatively that the oath was administered in that form, we are not prepared to say that it would not be a substantial compliance with the requirements of the law.

It is not necessary, however, for us to discuss this proposition, as we are of the opinion that this order does not undertake to quote the oath actually administered, but simply to give the clerk's interpretation of it, and that, inasmuch as the order shows affirmatively that the jury were duly sworn, we will presume, in the absence of something more positive to the contrary, that the law has been complied with; and this presumption is strengthened by the fact that, so far as the record shows, neither the prisoner nor his counsel made any objection to the oath as it was actually administered to the jury. This conclusion is fully supported by our decisions upon this question. Lawrence v. Commonwealth, 30 Grat. (Va.) 845; State v. Sutfin, 22 W. Va. 771; Wells v. Smith, 49 W. Va. 78, 38 S. E. 547; State v. Kellison, 56 W. Va. 690, 47 S. E. 166. In each of these cases the language used in the order, that the jury was duly sworn, was supplemented, in some of the cases by a statement that the jury was sworn to speak the truth upon the issue joined, and other qualifications showing the interpretation that the clerk, in making up the order, put upon the oath. In each of the cases, however, the court held that this recitation was only explanatory, and did not undertake to recite the oath actually administered, and was not, therefore, sufficient to overcome the positive declaration that the jury was duly sworn, particularly in view of the fact that it did not appear that any objection was made to the form of the oath at the time it was administered.

[3, 4] The defendant's next contention is that the venue was not properly proven. There is no merit in this contention. The evidence of the boy's uncle shows that he observed the condition of the child in the city of Huntington, which is in Cabell county, W. Va., and the other witnesses all testified that the McDonie home in which it is claimed the crime was committed was in the city of Huntington. While they do not specifically state that the city of Huntington that they refer to is in Cabell county, still they do show that it is the same city referred to by the boy's uncle who testified in the case, thus conclusively showing that all of the transactions occurred in Cabell county. Further than this, we take judicial notice of the fact that the city of Huntington, W. Va., is in the county of Cabell, and is the county seat thereof. State v. Hensley, 86 W. Va. 434, 103 S. E. 204.

[5] The next ground relied upon by the defendant for reversal of the judgment is the action of the court in refusing to strike out certain evidence of Mrs. C. H. Vie, Mrs. Frank Williams, and Mrs. Cora Gill, upon the ground that their evidence did not connect the defendant with the occurrences testified to by them. Mrs. Vie testified that on one occasion, in the week before the occurrence which resulted in the arrest of McDonie, she heard the child screaming and being very severely chastised; that this was just a few days before the 21st of August; that it was in the nighttime, and that her husband was present. She does not testify that she heard McDonie's voice in connection with the transaction, but her husband testified in relation to the same occurrence, and he says that he heard a man's voice in connection with the whipping that the child was receiving, and that the voice sounded like McDonie's. This was sufficient to connect the defendant with this transaction. Of course, the probative force of it was for the jury. Mrs. Williams, who lived in an adjoining house, also testified that just previous to the time McDonie was arrested she heard the child's cries, and a noise indicating that he was being punished in some way in connection with water running in the bathtub, and that she heard Mr. McDonie's voice in connection with the transaction, but she could not distinguish anything he said. Mrs. Gill, who is the mother of Mrs. Williams, testified to this same occurrence, and while she did not say that she recognized the voice of McDonie, the fact that her daughter did is sufficient to admit her evidence as corroborative of the statements of her daughter as to what transpired.

[10] The action of the court in refusing to strike out certain statements made by Tom Harrison and John Coon is also relied upon for reversal. Harrison was one of the police officers who went to the McDonie home upon the occasion that the child was taken to the hospital. He testifies to finding the child in bed, and to its condition, and testifies to finding the mother in a back room in the dark, and throwing a light on her and asking her what she was doing there. Coon also testifies to this same state of facts. The objection of the defendant goes to the action of the court in allowing the statements of Harrison and Coon as to finding the mother in an adjoining room to remain in the record. We see no objection to this. It, perhaps, had little, if any, probative force in connection with the case; but they were only detailing the conditions which they found in the house at the time they went there and removed the child. They told about finding the child in bed, about the condition of the bed, and the room in which the child was, and about the mother being in an adjoining room, in which there was no light. It would perhaps, have been more significant of bad conduct on the part of McDonie and his wife if no one at all had been found in the house. We do not see how it could in any way prejudice the defendant for these witnesses to testify to the fact that the child's mother was in an adjoining room at the time the child was removed.

[6] The defendant's counsel earnestly insist that the court committed error in refusing to give instruction No. 6 offered on behalf of the defendant. This instruction is as follows:

"The jury are hereby instructed that before you can legally convict the defendant of a felony you must believe from the evidence, beyond all reasonable doubt, that the defendant committed the act complained of with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, or kill, and unless you believe the defendant committed the act complained of, intending at the time to maim, disfigure, disable, or kill the said James Gibson, then you should acquit him of malicious or unlawful wounding. You are further instructed that to maim is to deprive a person of some member of the body; that to disfigure is to impair or injure the beauty, symmetry, or appearance, or to render unsightly or misshapen; that to disable is to cripple, or to render incapable of proper or effective action, and to kill is to deprive of life; and before you have a right to convict the defendant you must believe two things beyond all reasonable doubt, and such belief must be produced from the evidence: First, that the defendant maliciously or unlawfully did the things complained of in the indictment; second, that the acts were done with the intent to maim, disfigure, disable or kill, and unless you do believe both things from the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt, you should find the defendant not guilty of either malicious or unlawful wounding."

[7] It will be noted that in this instruction an attempt is made to define the terms "maim," "disfigure," "disable," and "kill," and it is true that no other instruction was given in the case which does define these terms. All of the other elements of the instruction are covered by other instructions given on motion of the defendant. Counsel for the defendant insists that the defendant was entitled to have these terms defined to the jury, that they are words of technical signification, and that the jury might not know just what was comprehended within their meaning. We agree with this contention. It is true these words do have a technical signification, but we do not believe that this technical meaning is very much different from the meaning ascribed to them by the average person. However this may be, the defendant was entitled to have the jury told what these terms meant in the indictment in this case, as distinguished from the ordinary or colloquial significance which attaches to them. But, when the defendant seeks to define these terms, he must do it correctly and accurately. He cannot complain of the refusal of the court to give to the jury a definition, unless that definition is accurate. Now, this instruction tells the jury that to maim is to deprive a person of some member of the body. This, no doubt, is the popular meaning ascribed to this term; but it is not the technical meaning, and it was this technical meaning that the defendant complains that he was not allowed to have given to the jury. The technical meaning of the term "maim" is to violently inflict a bodily injury upon a person, so as to make him less able to defend himself or to annoy his adversary. 4 Blackstone's Commentaries, 206; 6 New Oxford English Dictionary, 260.

It may be said that it is technical to justify the refusal of this instruction for the failure to properly define this term. The answer to this criticism is that the defendant's only contention of his right to have it defined is because it is a technical term and has a technical meaning. The definition as given tells the jury that in order to maim it is necessary to deprive one of some member of his body. This is not so at all. To so injure a fighting member of the body that it cannot be used, or cannot be used as effectively as it could theretofore, is as much maiming as it is to entirely sever the member, and when we consider this instruction in connection with the facts proven in this case the vice of this definition at once appears. The principal offense alleged against the defendant was the scalding of the boy's feet. This might not result in the boy losing his feet, or either of them; but it can very well be seen that it might result in their being of less use to him in repelling or making an attack. In fact, the nurse says that, if he had not received attention when he did, the toes of one of his feet would have grown together. This would not have been maiming under the definition given of this word in the instruction, but it would in fact be maiming in the legal sense of the term.

[8] Complaint is also made of the action of the court in refusing to give instruction A and instructions Nos. 1 and 4. Instruction A and instruction No. 1 are mandatory. Instruction No. 4, which was refused, is in effect mandatory. All of these instructions would have compelled an acquittal of the defendant, and that was their purpose. They are attempted to be justified on the theory that this defendant stood in the position of a parent to this child, and that no malice or wrongful intent could be attributed to him from the fact alone that defendant chastised or corrected the boy. This contention is quite correct. A parent, or one standing in loco parentis, has the authority to administer chastisement or correction to his child. The moral sense of children is not sufficiently developed in all cases to admit of a successful appeal to the child to desist from wrongdoing without the aid of physical coercion, but it has never been recognized that this chastisement or correction could go beyond what the child's reasonable welfare demands. It has never been recognized that a parent has the right or power to maim or disfigure or disable a child simply because he might be stubborn and not respond to correction in the manner the parent might think proper. It is true, in this case, no malice can be attributed to the defendant from the mere fact that he administered correction to this child, nor can any criminal intent be attributed to him from that fact alone; but when his conduct exceeds the bounds of chastisement, and goes to the extent of actually endangering the child's life or limb, then proof showing these facts is just as effectual to prove malice and criminal intent as proof of an unjustifiable assault is in any other criminal case. The doctrine that one intends to do that which is the natural and probable consequence of his acts is just as applicable in a case like this as in any other sort of a case. The proof of chastisement, however, in order that any presumption or inference may arise therefrom as to malice or intent, must show that such chastisement has been administered beyond any real or apparent necessity. A parent can no more commit a brutal attack upon his child, resulting in the infliction of serious injury upon it, than he can commit such injury upon a stranger; and when he does so, and the jury is satisfied that the punishment inflicted has resulted in such serious injury, such fact, when found, may be treated as proof of malice upon the part of such parent as well as of a guilty intent.

[9] The action of the court in admitting in evidence certain clothes and bandages which were offered by the state is also assigned as error; it being insisted that these articles were not sufficiently identified. The evidence in regard to them is that after the defendant and his wife were arrested and taken to jail the police officers went back to the room where they had found the boy, and there found a suit of underwear apparently belonging to the boy and some bandages which had upon them stains, whether from blood or salve which had been used on the wounds does not appear. These garments were admitted in evidence. It is contended by the defendant that, because they were not discovered when the officers were there on the first occasion and took the boy away, they are not sufficiently identified to permit their admission as evidence. It appears that the officers went back to the house within a very short time, not more than an hour or two, after the first occasion, and procured these articles. Why they did not see them and procure them when they were there before does not appear, nor is it material, so far as their admissibility as evidence is concerned. It may go to the question of their weight as evidence, but not to their admissibility. They bore all the earmarks of genuineness, and were introduced for the purpose of showing the stains upon them. Whether those stains were made by blood or by the salve which the defendant says was applied to the wounds, or both, was a question for the jury, and that tribunal was entitled to give to them such probative force as in their judgment they might be entitled to, after an examination of them.

We have carefully reviewed this case, and have considered maturely every objection raised by the defendant to the action of the court during the trial. There was no undue haste in forcing him to trial, and while the occurrence created strong feeling against him in the city of Huntington, where he lived, the officers of the state charged with the administration of justice, upon his application, removed his case for trial to another county, where the influence of this feeling would not be felt. His trial was had several months after the occurrence. The learned judge of the trial court was apparently solicitous to afford to the defendant every privilege to which he was entitled; he had the aid of eminent counsel in his defense; and the jury, after consideration, found him guilty of a very infamous crime, the like of which has not stained the criminal annals of this state, and, finding that he has been given this fair and impartial trial with this result, we must refuse to disturb the judgment and permit him to suffer the punishment to which his conduct, as interpreted by the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the trial court, has condemned him.

STATE ex rel. KEENEY et al. v. BLAND,
Judges. (No. 4467.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Prohibition \Leftrightarrow 10(1)—Inferior court may be prevented from proceeding only for lack of jurisdiction.

The only ground of jurisdiction in a superior court, to prevent an inferior court from proceeding in any cause or matter is lack of jurisdiction of such cause or matter in the inferior court, for some reason.

2. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 100(1)—No lack of jurisdiction in either of two inferior courts of concurrent jurisdiction until plea of abatement in one.

If two inferior courts of concurrent jurisdiction are entertaining identical causes of action between the same parties at the same time, there is no lack of jurisdiction in either of them until after an application to one of them for abatement of the action pending in it, or relinquishment of its jurisdiction, has been made and sustained by proof.

3. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 100(3)—Attachment of jurisdiction of first of concurrent courts does not of its own force preclude jurisdiction of the other.

In such cases, attachment of the jurisdiction of the court of first cognizance does not of its own force preclude jurisdiction of the court of second cognizance. It merely affords the parties concerned the means or ground for procuring abatement of the second action, or discharge of persons or property seized under the process of the court in which it is pending.

4. Prohibition \Leftrightarrow 3(1)—Will not lie to court of second cognizance before a hearing to determine its jurisdiction.

Upon the plea in abatement filed under such circumstances, or an application for discharge of the person or property seized, the court of second cognizance has jurisdiction, upon such pleas or application, to ascertain the facts necessary to determination of the question whether the same cause of action between the same parties is pending in the court of first cognizance, and previously came within its actual jurisdiction, or whether the same person or property is in the custody of such other court and was first seized under its process, as the case may be; wherefore the writ of prohibition cannot be awarded against the court taking subsequent jurisdiction of the cause of action or the person or property, before a hearing and determination as to its right to retain jurisdiction has been had, upon a proper application therefor, in the manner above indicated.

5. Prohibition \Leftrightarrow 10(1)—Court cannot be deprived of its right to determine jurisdictional facts, although evidence is absolutely conclusive.

If the question of a court's jurisdiction depends upon issues of fact, it has power and jurisdiction to decide them, even though the evidence relied upon to prove the jurisdictional facts is wholly uncontradicted and absolutely conclusive, and it cannot be deprived of its right to do so by prohibition or any other collateral proceeding.

6. Prohibition \Leftrightarrow 10(3)—Will not lie at instance of one indicted as accessory to murder in two counties to enjoin one court prior to its hearing on its jurisdiction.

Prohibition does not lie at the instance of a person indicted, as an accessory before the fact to the crime of murder, in courts of two counties having concurrent jurisdiction of the offense, and held in custody under process issued by one of such courts, to prevent the other from proceeding against him, by process for his arrest or otherwise, in advance of a hearing in such other court as to facts upon which its supposed lack of jurisdiction depends, such as his identity, his arrest, and possibly other matters.

Original proceeding by the State, on the relation of C. F. Keeney and others, against Robert Bland, Judge, for writ of prohibition. Writ refused.

C. J. Van Fleet, H. W. Houston, and T. C. Townsend, all of Charleston, for relators.

Chafin & Estep, of Logan, and Osenton & Lee, of Fayetteville, for respondents.

POFFENBARGER, J. By the usual procedure, C. F. Keeney and Fred Mooney, under indictment in Kanawha county and in Logan county for the same offense, being charged in each as accessories before the fact to the crime of murder alleged to have been committed in said last-named county, and now in custody by virtue of process issued on the indictment in said first-named county, seek a writ of prohibition against the judge of the circuit court of Logan county, to prevent him from proceeding against them, on the indictment pending in his court, upon the theory of concurrent jurisdiction of the offense in both courts, and antecedent attachment of that of Kanawha county, the petitioners having been first arrested and incarcerated under its process, and no arrest having been effected under the Logan county process, although the Logan county indictment was first found. The immediate purpose of this proceeding is prevention of arrest of the petitioners on a capias issued by order of the circuit court of Logan county November 5, 1921, and now in the hands of the sheriff of Kanawha county, and the ultimate purpose, to prevent trial on the Logan county indictment, while the other is pending in Kanawha county.

[1] If, upon the admitted facts alleged and the law as claimed by the petitioners, the remedy sought is inappropriate or unavailing, it is unnecessary to inquire whether the legal propositions advanced in support of the application for it are sound or not. For the purposes of the case, the constitutionality of section 8, c. 152 (sec. 5465) Code, interpreted as authorizing indictment and trial of an accessory, in either county, when the accessory acts occur in one county and the crime is consummated in another, may be conceded. So may the correctness of that interpretation, the existence of concurrent jurisdiction and prior attachment of that of the intermediate court of Kanawha county. If, all of these propositions being so conceded, prohibition does not lie, there is no occasion for questioning their soundness. No inquiries as to them properly arise. We proceed, therefore, to the inquiry as to the applicability of the remedy sought.

The position assumed by the petitioners admits jurisdiction of the circuit court of Logan county over the subject-matter. It also admits right and power in that court to obtain jurisdiction of themselves, by arrest or seizure, but for prior arrest under process of the intermediate court of Kanawha county. The act sought to be prohibited is invasion of the jurisdiction of the latter court, by exercise of the jurisdiction of the former, treated as an act in excess of the invading court's jurisdiction.

[2, 3] This argument assumes lack of jurisdiction in the second court, in every instance in which the same plaintiff institutes two suits against the same defendant, upon the same cause of action, in different courts. Viewed in the light of ordinary procedure not involving any seizure of person or property, its fallacy is apparent. Pendency of a former suit for the same cause of action, whether in the same court or another, is mere matter of abatement, and must be pleaded in abatement, and at the first opportunity, else the defense is lost. Robrecht v. Marling, 29 W. Va. 765, 775, 2 S. E. 827; Delaplain v. Armstrong, 21 W. Va. 211; Bradley v. Welch, 1 Munf. (Va.) 284; Monroe v. Redman, 2 Munf. (Va.) 240. If this defense were jurisdictional, in the sense of lack of power in one court to try an action identical with one pending in another, and render judgment, the rule respecting its interposition would not be so strict. The defense is a personal privilege allowed the defendant, rather than a lack of power in the court; wherefore, upon his waiver of it, by failure to set it up by plea, filed at rules, the court may proceed to hear and determine the case. The rule by which a plea of another suit pending abates the one in which it is filed and sustained has, for its object, mere prevention of unnecessary vexation of a party by two or more suits upon the same cause of action. N. & W. R. Co. v. Nunnally's Adm'r, 88 Va. 546, 14 S. E. 367; Olmins v. Delaney, 2 Str. 1216; Richards v. Stuart, 10 Bing. 322. The fact that it must be set up by a plea, brought to the attention of the court in a strictly formal manner, and without the slightest delay, proves its nonjurisdictional character.

Nor is there any precedent in our decisions for its availability in any other way. If it is lost by mere failure to set it up in the suit in a proper manner or in proper time, on account of its dilatory nature or nonrelation to the merits of the cause, it certainly cannot be made available outside of the case by collateral procedure of any kind. In other words, if a court may reject it, although brought to its attention, because of mere delay in its interposition or lack of formality, and proceed with the case, as undubitably it may do, there can be no reason for permitting it to be made a ground or cause of prohibition to stop the case, or any other collateral proceeding.

It does not follow, however, that a defendant must submit to two judgments for the same cause of action. He may waive or lose his right to have the second suit abated by reason of the pendency of the first, and yet prevent two judgments, by pleading the judgment first rendered in bar of further prosecution of the other action, in which judgment has not been recovered. Both suits may be prosecuted and defended, each as if the other were not pending; but the moment judgment is rendered in one of them, for either plaintiff or defendant, it is a weapon in the hands of the defendant with which, by pleading it, he may defeat the other action. Here, again, is a demonstration of the unsoundness of the proposition that attachment of the jurisdiction of one of two courts of concurrent jurisdiction deprives the other of its jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the other continues, subject to power in the defendant to defeat it by proper procedure in the case and at its bar, but not otherwise. In all such cases, there is complete jurisdiction of both subject-matter and person, in both courts, until that of one of them is ousted by a plea in abatement or a plea of res judicata. A cause of action concurrently cognizable by two courts belongs to the jurisdiction of the one in which it is first brought, and is excluded from that of the other, only in a potential sense, not actually. The law confers upon the parties the right to confine it to the former and exclude it from the latter by proper procedure. This is the sense in which the observation respecting this subject, so often found in the books, must be taken.

[4, 5] No jurisdictional distinction between cases involving seizure of the person or property and others not involving it is perceived. The court of concurrent jurisdiction, making the first seizure, is entitled to retain jurisdiction, and the legal presumption is that the other, upon a proper and timely application founded upon the fact of the previous seizure under process of the other court, will relinquish the person or property seized, just as, in the other class of cases, the second suit is abated upon a proper and timely plea of the pendency of the first. The court under whose process the second seizure was made has undoubted and clear jurisdiction, if that of the other court has not attached by previous seizure or otherwise. Whether it has or not is a mixed question of law and fact, which such second court has power and jurisdiction to pass upon. In most cases, the question is free from doubt and easy of solution, but, however clear it may be, the court has right to determine it, and no other court, in a collateral proceeding, be it prohibition or what not, has any power or authority to decide the question for it. To do so would be a plain and palpable trespass upon its jurisdiction, an usurpation of power. There may be no doubt about the identity of the person or thing, the fact of seizure or the validity of the process under which the first seizure was made; but that does not affect the question of jurisdiction. Many of the cases submitted to the courts for decision are so clear and plain that any layman could correctly decide them. But no man can obtain an adverse judgment in the clearest case, otherwise than by submission thereof to a court of competent jurisdiction and procurement of the exercise of its judicial powers. Until the court of second cognizance by seizure has passed upon the application for release, or vacation of its action, it cannot be deemed to have exceeded the limits of its jurisdiction. If it has not power to ascertain and determine the identity of the subject, whether person or property, the fact of seizure and the validity of the process under which it was made, which may depend upon the question of jurisdiction of the issuing court, it is perfectly obvious that it might be wrongfully deprived of its own clearly rightful jurisdiction of the subject. The other court may have no jurisdiction of the subject at all. Its process may be void on its face for some reason. The person or property seized may not be identical. The court of second cognizance cannot possibly satisfy itself as to any of these matters, otherwise than by a judicial inquiry and determination, nor can it safely act in the premises without having made them. To say the representations made to the superior court, upon which the application for restraining process is founded, put all such questions beyond the realm of doubt or debate, is not a sufficient response to this argument. It is the province, function, and right of the inferior court to pass upon them, however clear they may be. Even though the facts are agreed upon in such manner as to preclude jurisdiction, the agreement must be put into the record of the case in which it is relied upon. If it has been made out of court, it must be proved in the case, to be availing. And it is the duty of the party seeking release from the jurisdiction of a court to submit to it the issues of fact relied upon as ground of release, for decision. Neither he nor a superior court can assume either incapacity or unwillingness on its part to decide them correctly. Both are bound by the presumption of its capacity and willingness to do so.

These conclusions bring the procedure in cases involving seizure or custody of persons and property clearly within the principle governing cases in which it is not involved. On the plea of another suit pending, an issue is made as to the identity of the cause of action and parties in the two cases. And no doubt the jurisdiction of the court in which it is pending may be a proper subject of inquiry. Even though the identity of the cause of action and parties and the jurisdiction of the court may be clear beyond question, the plea must be filed and the facts it avers established, else the court of second cognizance may proceed. In cases of seizure, the same principle applies, but the procedure may be different. In a criminal case of concurrent jurisdiction, the issues might be raised by a plea, or they might arise upon the return of the officer indorsed upon the process, or process against him or some other officer. The procedure need not be defined nor indicated. Nothing is involved here except the question of jurisdiction in the circuit court of Logan county, and that depends upon facts to be determined by it. If a court, in passing upon its own jurisdiction, decides only a question of law, the decision in its favor may be at its peril. But, if the question depends upon facts to be ascertained and determined, a wrong decision is mere error. McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134; Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483; Ex parte Ellyson, 20 Grat. (Va.) 24.

[6] In the argument, the issue has been correctly treated as one of jurisdiction. Prohibition lies only in case of the inferior court's lack of jurisdiction in some form. Its lack of jurisdiction, if any, confers jurisdiction by prohibition upon this court. When it has jurisdiction, we do not. Our decisions uniformly hold that prohibition cannot be awarded upon any ground save lack of jurisdiction in the inferior court. No lack of jurisdiction in the circuit court of Logan county having been shown, the writ cannot be awarded consistently with law.

As a precaution against misapprehension of the scope and effect of this decision, we observe that it is limited to the facts upon which it is predicated. We are not to be understood as saying or intimating that a court of concurrent jurisdiction may not, in a case of this kind, overstep the limits of its jurisdiction by its decision upon an application for release, or by its subsequent action. The point at which its jurisdiction terminates in such cases is not a subject of inquiry here. It certainly extends to and includes a hearing and decision as to whether cognizance has attached. There are instances of action in excess of jurisdiction, by the judgment rendered upon a hearing properly entertained. Bracey v. Robinson, 83 W. Va. 9, 10, 97 S. E. 295; In re Nielsen, 181 U. S. 176, 9 Sup. Ct. 672, 33 L. Ed. 118; Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 131, 18 L. Ed. 281; Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 163, 21 L. Ed. 872; In re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 7 Sup. Ct. 556, 30 L. Ed. 658; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. 935, 29 L. Ed. 89.

There are cases in which the writ of prohibition has been awarded by superior courts against inferior courts of concurrent jurisdiction, to prevent one from trespassing upon the jurisdiction of the other, in instances of seizure of property, but in most, if not all, of them, the excess of jurisdiction was found or existed in their judgments or action with knowledge of facts making their lack of power to proceed perfectly apparent. Dunbar v. Bourland, 88 Ark. 153, 114 S. W. 467; Maclean v. Speed, 52 Mich. 257, 18 N. W. 396; Wells v. Montcalm, 141 Mich. 58, 104 N. W. 318, 118 Am. St. Rep. 520; State v. Ross, 122 Mo. 435, 25 S. W. 947, 23 L. R. A. 534; State v. Wear, 129 Mo. 619, 31 S. W. 608; State v. Reynolds, 209 Mo. 161, 107 S. W. 487, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 963, 123 Am. St. Rep. 468, 14 Ann. Cas. 198; State v. Murphy, 132 Mo. 382, 33 S. W. 1136, 53 Am. St. Rep. 491. In Kentucky and South Dakota, the jurisdiction of the courts of last resort, in prohibition, is deemed to have been so enlarged by constitutional provisions as to vest it in cases not dependent solely upon action by the inferior courts, without jurisdiction. Clark County Ct. v. Warner, 116 Ky. 801, 76 S. W. 828; Hindman v. Toney, 97 Ky. 413, 30 S. W. 1006; Boone v. Riddle (Ky.) 86 S. W. 978; Gates v. McGee, 15 S. D. 247, 88 N. W. 115. Under this broad power of regulation, some of the Kentucky cases seem to treat prohibition as allowable for mere guidance of courts of concurrent jurisdiction in criminal cases, by way of avoidance of probable conflict. We have no such latitude.

For the reasons stated, the writ prayed for will be refused and the rule dismissed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF REEDY v. BROTON et al.

(No. 4225.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 4, 1921. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Creditors' suit \Leftrightarrow 27—Decreeing lien priorities without making trustee under trust deeds parties is reversible error.

In a judgment creditor's suit, when deeds of trust with outstanding legal titles in trustees are involved, it is error for which the decree will be reversed to decree the amounts and priorities of the liens on the land of the judgment debtor proceeded against and his lands to be sold, without the presence as parties of the trustees holding the legal title.

2. Creditors' suit \Leftrightarrow 51—Court should set aside decree on notice of absence of necessary parties.

When the absence of such necessary parties is brought to the attention of the court, though it be after such erroneous decree has been entered, the court should set aside the decree and require the bill to be amended and the absent parties and the legal title to the land to be brought before the court, and the parties affected by such erroneous decree given an opportunity to prove and have decreed to them their debts and liens in the order of priority to which they are entitled; and it is immaterial that one of the trust creditors was made a party to the suit and appeared before the commissioner and had audited a debt secured to him by a deed of trust on one of the tracts of land properly proceeded against.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wirt County.

Suits by the Jackson County Bank against the First National Bank of Reedy and others and by the First National Bank of Reedy against C. C. Brotton and others, in which the Jackson County Bank and J. H. Smith, its trustee, intervened. The suits were consolidated, and from a decree therein the interveners appeal. Decree reversed, and cause remanded.

T. J. Sayre, K. K. Sayre, and J. L. Wolfe, all of Ripley, for appellants.

S. P. Bell, of Spencer, and James L. Smith, of Elizabeth, for appellees.

MILLER, J. The second of the above styled suits, a judgment creditor's suit, was the first to be brought, in Wirt County, in which the Jackson County Bank and J. H. Smith, Trustee, were made defendants. The only allegations against the Jackson County Bank and J. H. Smith, Trustee, were that the bank held a deed of trust executed by C. C. Brotton and wife to Smith, Trustee, covering certain lands in Wirt County. Neither the Jackson County Bank nor its trustee, Smith, answered the bill, but the bank by its cashier, Cole, appeared before the commissioner to whom the cause was referred and proved the bank's debt secured by the deed of trust on the lands of the trust debtor in Wirt County; but being ignorant of the fact that the bill also involved the lands of Brotton in Jackson County, on which the bank held another deed of trust, and in which one K. K. Hyre was the trustee, to secure another and different debt, and as to which no allegation was made in the bill, no proof was offered of the existence or amount of this debt, except that in his testimony before the commissioner, in referring to a payment made it by Archer, the trustee in a third deed of trust on the Jackson County land, Cole explained that that payment was upon a debt secured to it by a trust deed on land in Jackson County and not on the debt secured by the deed of trust to Smith, trustee on the Wirt County land. Wherefore, there being no exceptions to the commissioner's report, the court, in determining the liens and their priorities on the lands of the debtor in Wirt County and Jackson County, and ordering the sale thereof, made no decree in favor of the Jackson County Bank for its trust lien on the land in Jackson County. This decree was pronounced on September 9th, 1919. Subsequently, on January 7th, 1920, the Jackson County Bank appeared in court and filed its plea, and Hyre, its trustee, on the same day also intervened by petition, each setting up their respective rights as lienor and trustee, explaining the bank's omission to prove its lien on the Jackson County land, and that Hyre, the trustee, had not been made a party to the suit, so as to bring before the court the outstanding legal title to the land covered by the deed of trust of May 25, 1918, and asking that the plaintiff be required to amend its bill.

Upon the filing of these pleadings, the circuit court, on January 7, 1920, suspended the sale of the 122½ acres covered by the deed of trust to Hyre, Trustee, decreed to be sold, and adjudged that the cause be remanded to rules, and that process be issued to the several parties thereto to answer said petition, and that the bill of complaint should be amended by making Hyre, Trustee, a party thereto, and by proper allegations set up the said deed of trust.

The first of the above styled suits—that of the Jackson County Bank against the First National Bank of Reedy et al.—shows that while it was still pending at rules, the bill in the original suit not having been amended nor process issued thereon as required, the Jackson County Bank, at the March rules, 1920, of said court, filed its answer to the original bill, in the nature of a cross-bill, making the parties to the former bill and Hyre, Trustee, parties thereto, and the papers and proceedings in the former suit parts thereof, and praying that the former decree made in the absence of the proper and necessary parties be set aside and held for naught, in so far as the same gave right and priority to the other creditors over the lien of respondent upon the 122½ acres of land in Jackson County, and that respondent's rights be fully protected.

As already stated, the plaintiff in the original suit never did amend its bill as required by the decree of January 7, 1920, but upon the filing of appellant's answer thereto, and making its trustee and others parties to the suit, the court, by the decree complained of, undertook to consolidate the two causes, namely, the original cause, and the one introduced by appellant's answer, without requiring plaintiff to amend its bill as formerly ordered, and to dismiss appellant's case made upon its answer, and to deny it any relief in respect to the deed of trust of May 25, 1918, and ordering the commissioner appointed in the original suit to proceed to execute the decree of sale, thereby holding, according to the written opinion filed, that appellant, because of its failure to prove its debt secured by the deed of trust on the Jackson County land, had lost its right to participate in the proceeds of the sale thereof in the order of priority to which it would otherwise have been entitled.

[1] So the sole question presented, and which is comprehensive of all the specific errors assigned in the decree appealed from, is: Did the appellant, the Jackson County Bank, lose the priority of its debt and lien in the way indicated, on the 122½ acres of land in Jackson County? As already stated, the trustee, Hyre, in the deed of trust of May 25, 1918, had not at the time of the entry of the original decree of sale been made a party to the suit. Nor did the bill contain any allegation respecting appellant's lien on the 122½ acres. Nor did the court below, before reaffirming its prior decree of sale, require the plaintiff to amend its bill and bring in the necessary and proper parties. The theory of the circuit court seems to have been that as Hyre, Trustee, had filed his petition in the original suit and had been made a party defendant to appellant's cross-answer, which undertook to set up its rights, any defect of parties to, or subject matter of, the plaintiff's bill was cured thereby, justifying the decree dismissing appellant out of the cause and denying it the right on proper pleadings, and after the proper and necessary parties were before the court, to prove and have allowed and decreed to it its lien in the proper order of priority thereof on said Jackson County land. It seems to have been the opinion of the court that the statute, section 7 of chapter 139 of the Code (sec. 5099), made the decree of sale pronounced on the commissioner's report in the original cause a bar to the lien of the bank. That statute would undoubtedly be applicable if the court at the time of its decree of sale had had before it the necessary parties and subject matter. But in this case, as the court before the filing of appellant's answer determined that the bill was defective in point of necessary allegations and of parties, if correct in this, unless cured by the answer of appellant and process thereon, the error in the decree remains, and the order that plaintiff amend its bill and bring in the necessary parties has not been complied with.

At the time of the original decree of sale the legal title to the 122½ acres in Jackson County was outstanding in Hyre, Trustee, and the court had not before it that title to dispose of. The decree of sale as to the tract involved here remains unexecuted, and we have no question presented as to the rights of a purchaser under such decree. The futility of undertaking to decree a sale of the land when there are existing liens thereon by deeds of trust, without the presence as parties of the trustees in such deeds, has been repeatedly adjudicated in former decisions. It was so decided in Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 656; McMillan v. Hickman, 35 W. Va. 705, 14 S. E. 227; Turk v. Skiles, 38 W. Va. 404, 18 S. E. 561; Farmers' Bank of Fairmont v. Watson, 39 W. Va. 342, 19 S. E. 413; First National Bank of Webster Springs v. McGraw, 85 W. Va. 298, 307, 101 S. E. 474; Bragg v. United Thacker Coal Co., 70 W. Va. 655, 74 S. E. 946.

It is unnecessary to repeat here the reasoning of the cases cited for this proposition. The rule is too well settled to depart from it in this case. In Bilmyer v. Sherman, supra, it was said a decree of sale in the absence of the trustee holding the legal title would be reversed although the trust creditor had had his debt audited in the suit. See, also, Marshall's Ex'r v. Hall, 42 W. Va. 641, 646, 26 S. E. 300. In McMillan v. Hickman, supra, the necessity of bringing as parties trustees holding the legal title before decreeing the sale of a debtor's land was declared and reinforced, and reference was made to the statute making it the duty of a plaintiff in a judgment creditor's suit to make all lien creditors disclosed by the record parties thereto. Counsel for plaintiff in this case excuses his omission to make Hyre, Trustee, a party by alleging in a reply to appellant's plea that in examining the records of Jackson County he overlooked the deed of trust to Hyre, Trustee, though it appears to have been duly recorded and might easily have been found.

[2] The absence of Hyre, Trustee, was, as we have already said, brought to the attention of the court, not only by the plea of the appellant, but also by the petition of Hyre, Trustee. When his absence was thus made to appear, it was the duty of the court to have set aside the prior decree, and that is what it undertook to do, and require the plaintiff to amend its bill and implead all necessary parties before undertaking to adjudicate the rights and priorities of any of the parties to the suit, and it could make no difference, as our decisions hold, how the absence of the necessary party was brought to the attention of the court. Gallatin L. C. & O. Co. v. Davis, 44 W. Va. 109, 28 S. E. 747.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decree and remand the cause for further proceedings to be had in accordance with the views herein expressed.

WEST VIRGINIA PULP & PAPER CO. v. WHITMORE et ux. (No. 4176.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Nov. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Set-off and counterclaim \S 33(1)—Whether matter constitutes set-off depends on susceptibility of determination rather than its arising out of basic transaction.

Whether matter relied upon as an offset may properly be treated as such does not depend upon whether the same grows out of the transaction which is the basis of the plaintiff's suit, or arises out of a different transaction, but upon the character of the claim itself. If it is susceptible of accurate determination by calculation, it is proper matter for offset.

2. Set-off and counterclaim \S 33(1)—In assumpsit on note for advancements, held, that defendant might set off materials furnished to plaintiff.

In an action of assumpsit on a note given by the defendant to secure advancements made to him by the plaintiff in the performance of a contract between the parties by which the defendant furnished to the plaintiff certain material, and which contract the defendant is prevented from performing by the refusal of the plaintiff to make further advancements in accordance with the terms of the contract, defendant may set up as an offset the price or value of the material so received by the plaintiff from him under the contract, and recover over should the price or value of such material exceed the advancements made. Such a claim is not one for unliquidated damages.

3. Trial \S 343—Verdict in gross sum for defendant held to constitute determination that set-off exceeded plaintiff's claim.

Where, in an action of assumpsit, the defendant files a claim of set-off exceeding in amount the claim of the plaintiff, and the jury finds in favor of the defendant a gross sum, such verdict is a finding upon all of the matters submitted to the jury, and is a determination by it that the defendant's claim exceeds the plaintiff's claim by the amount of the jury's verdict.

4. Trial \S 343—Verdict interpreted as being in favor of defendant filing set-off.

In interpreting the verdict of a jury the court may look to the pleadings in the case, and where it appears therefrom that two defendants were sued, one of whom was simply surety for the other, and the principal defendant filed a claim of offsets which exceeded the amount of the plaintiff's claim, and the jury finds a verdict in favor of the defendant for a gross sum, it will be interpreted as a finding in favor of the defendant who filed the claims of set-off.

Error to Circuit Court, Berkeley County.

Action by the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Company against John L. Whitmore and wife. Judgment for the defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. H. Emmert, of Martinsburg, for plaintiff in error.

Luttrell & Rodgers, for defendants in error.

RITZ, P. This action of assumpsit was brought to recover on a negotiable promissory note for the sum of $375, executed by the defendants to one T. C. Baker, and by him indorsed to the plaintiff. The defendant John L. Whitmore, the principal debtor, the other defendant, his wife, being only surety, filed a plea of offsets, and upon a trial of the matters involved before a jury a verdict was found in favor of the defendant for the sum of $1,125, upon which judgment was duly rendered, to review which this writ of error is prosecuted.

There is no conflict in the evidence. The testimony offered by the plaintiff to establish the note sued upon is not questioned; neither is the evidence offered by the defendant John L. Whitmore to establish his offset. The facts disclosed by the record are that Whitmore entered into a contract with the plaintiff by which he agreed to cut for it certain pulpwood at certain prices; the agreement being that the plaintiff would furnish him from week to week advancements of money sufficient to meet his expenses, these advancements to be deducted from the amount due him when the wood was received by the plaintiff, and the quantities definitely ascertained. Under this arrangement advancements of considerable sums were made to Whitmore by Baker, the agent of the plaintiff. At the time of giving the note sued on in this case Whitmore applied for an advancement to take care of the wages due his men. Baker, representing the plaintiff, advised that he could not make any further advancements without security; that the wood all remained in the woods, and because of the severe weather the plaintiff had been unable to take the same up, for which reason no insurance could be obtained thereon, and should it be destroyed the loss would fall entirely on the plaintiff, without any means of protecting itself. Whitmore agreed to give his note evidencing the advancement, but Baker advised him that this would not be sufficient; that he must have security thereon; and suggested that Whitmore have his wife become his surety. Whitmore declined to ask his wife to become surety on the note, but Baker did ask her to become such surety, and explained to her the arrangement under which and the purpose for which the note was given, and advised her that she would never have any of it to pay. With the understanding that it was given to secure an advancement made to her husband upon the contract for getting out the pulpwood, she became surety on the note sued on in this case. Whitmore was unable to secure further funds to carry on his business. He had borrowed all he could at the banks for the purpose, and the plaintiff declined to make him any further advancements, as it was required to do under its contract, so that he was compelled to discontinue the work of cutting the wood. When weather conditions improved, the plaintiff sent its men upon the ground and took up the wood already cut by Whitmore, and never accounted to him therefor. A witness who actually measured the wood taken up by the plaintiff says that there were 267 cords of pulpwood, for which Whitmore was to be paid under the contract $15.50 a cord, 47½ cords of cordwood at the price of $10 a cord, and 30 tons of bark at $12 a cord, making a total of $4,973.50. There is no attempt made to controvert these figures. Whitmore says that the plaintiff is entitled to a credit of $2 a cord for hauling the pulpwood, which would reduce this amount to the extent of $534; and, further, that it is entitled to a credit for all of the advancements made to him, amounting to the sum of $3,146.78; and that, giving the plaintiff credit for these advancements and for hauling the pulpwood, he is entitled to recover the sum of $1,282.72. The jury found in his favor only the sum of $1,125. As above stated, there is no conflict in the evidence on any of these propositions, and a recovery by the defendant for an amount approximating that found by the jury must have been a foregone conclusion, and the judgment rendered thereon must be affirmed here, unless the propositions of law relied upon by the plaintiff compel its reversal.

[1, 2] The first contention of the plaintiff is that the defendant's claim of offset is for unliquidated damages, which, under our decisions, cannot be filed as an offset, but can only be treated as a recoupment, and then only allowed to the extent of extinguishing the plaintiff's claim, and the cases of Monongahela Tie & Lumber Co. v. Flannigan, 77 W. Va. 162, 87 S. E. 161, and Van Raalte Co. v. Solof Bros. Co., 108 S. E. 438, are relied upon to support this contention. From what we have said it is apparent that the offset filed by Whitmore does not include any damages for the failure of the plaintiff to keep its contract with him. In other words, he has waived the damages sustained by him by reason of plaintiff's breach of its contract, and has simply filed his offset for the material actually furnished at the contract price, or at prices which it is admitted in this record are the actual value of the property taken. If Whitmore in this case was presenting a claim for profits which he would have made had he been allowed to complete the work under the contract, then the decisions cited would have some application. In the case of Van Raalte Co. v. Solof Bros. Co. the offset attempted to be filed was for damages which the defendants claimed by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to ship it certain goods which the plaintiff had contracted to furnish; and in the case of Monongahela

Tie & Lumber Co. v. Flannigan, the offset insisted upon was for damages which the defendant claimed because of being deprived of an opportunity to sell her property by the failure of the plaintiff to keep its contract. The distinction between an offset and a recoupment under our practice is that recoupment must, of necessity, in order to be available, grow out of the transaction upon which the plaintiff's suit is based, while offset, whether growing out of the same transaction or another transaction, must be for a claim readily ascertainable—in other words, in the nature of a liquidated claim. It is not material whether the offset arises out of the same transaction or a different transaction. The thing that characterizes it as an offset is not the transaction out of which it arises, but whether the items set up are of that certain character which makes the amount easily ascertainable by simple calculation. Cook Pottery Co. v. Parker, 86 W. Va. 580, 104 S. E. 51; Tidewater Quarry Co. v. Scott, 105 Va. 160, 52 S. E. 835, 115 Am. St. Rep. 864, 8 Ann. Cas. 736. In this case there is no uncertainty at all about the items claimed as an offset. They were of that character which might be recovered in an action for goods sold and delivered. The damages, if any, sustained by the defendant from the breach of the contract by the plaintiff are not claimed in this suit. The allowance of this offset in this case is strictly in accord with the practice in this jurisdiction.

[3, 4] The plaintiff further insists that the judgment should be reversed and the verdict set aside, for the reason that it does not respond to the issues in the case. The verdict was simply a finding in favor of the defendant for the sum of $1,125. The argument is that this does not definitely determine the plaintiff's claim, which was set up and undenied, nor does it indicate which defendant the finding is in favor of. It is quite true the verdict does not in terms dispose of the plaintiff's claim, but the record discloses very clearly that the matter involved upon the trial was the balance due, if any, to the defendant J. L. Whitmore because of the material furnished by him to the plaintiff, and the verdict necessarily determined all of the matters submitted by the parties upon this question, including the note sued upon, which had been given to secure an advancement made by the plaintiff to the defendant Whitmore. In Black's Adm'r v. Thomas, 21 W. Va. 709, it is held that where, in an action of assumpsit, the defendant pleads payment and files with his plea a specification of set-off exceeding in amount the demand of the plaintiff, and the jury by its verdict finds for the defendant a gross sum, under the provisions of section 9, c. 126 of the Code (sec. 4829), such verdict is interpreted as a finding that the set-off exceeds the amount to which the plaintiff was entitled by the sum so found, and the verdict is not ambiguous. This is bound to be the case, for the record discloses that the matter to be determined by the jury was the status of the accounts between the parties, and their verdict can be interpreted in no other light than as ascertaining that the plaintiff owed the defendant $1,125 more than it had advanced to him. It means this and nothing else.

Nor is there any merit in the plaintiff's contention that the verdict is so ambiguous that judgment could not be rendered thereon because it simply finds in favor of the defendant, without stating which one of the defendants the finding is in favor of. In interpreting the verdict the court may look to the pleadings in the case. Williams v. Ewart, 29 W. Va. 659, 2 S. E. 881; Adamson's Adm'r v. Traction Co., 111 Va. 556, 69 S. E. 1055. When we do this we find that there is only one substantial defendant in the case. There was only one defendant setting up any offset, and he was the principal in the note sued on. There could be no recovery in favor of the other defendant, for the very good reason that she filed no offset and made no counterclaim against the plaintiff. Looking at the pleadings, we are not left in doubt as to which defendant the jury found in favor of, and the court below properly rendered judgment in favor of the only defendant who had filed a claim of offsets.

There is no more merit in the plaintiff's contention that the evidence does not justify the verdict. The plaintiff insists that the verdict is excessive and cannot be justified. To reach this conclusion, however, he gives the plaintiff credit for all of the advancements which the defendant Whitmore says were made to him, and then gives the plaintiff additional credit for the $375 note, without any evidence to justify treating the note in any other way than as a part of the advancements. In fact, the uncontradicted evidence is that it was made as an advancement, and presumably it was included in the amount shown as having been advanced by the company to Whitmore.

Finding no merit in any of the plaintiff's contentions, we affirm the judgment.

JACKSON v. JACKSON et al. (No. 4166.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 22, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Infants \Leftrightarrow 39—Supreme Court of Appeals will protect interest of infant not complaining, though appeal was by another defendant.

If the circuit court, in a proceeding to sell or lease an infant's land, fails to properly protect his interest, this court will do so, though the decree or order is not complained of by such infant or his guardian, and the appeal was allowed on the petition of another defendant.

2. Guardian and ward \Leftrightarrow 86—Petition for sale of infant's land must show necessity or infant's advantage from sale.

To justify the sale or lease of an infant's land, under chapter 83 of the Code 1913 (secs. 3961-3978), the bill or petition must allege facts showing some necessity for so disposing of his land, or showing that it will really be to his advantage to do so.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Summary proceeding by Cora Jackson, guardian, against George Jackson, her infant son, and others for sale of infant's land. Decree for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with leave to petitioner to amend, if so advised; if not, to dismiss the petition.

Frank O. Haymond and Clay D. Amos, both of Fairmont, for appellants.

MILLER, J. The decrees complained of by the Salvatore Coal Company were pronounced in a summary proceeding, begun by Cora Jackson, guardian, against George Jackson, her infant son, Cora Jackson, widow of Charles E. Jackson, deceased, Bulah Lee and Pearl M. Jackson, her adult daughters, and the Salvatore Coal Company.

The object of the petition was to obtain a decree to sell or lease the undivided interest of the infant George Jackson in a body of coal containing 50 acres, underlying a tract of 132.55 acres of land, of which the father of the infant and adult heirs and husband of petitioner died seized and possessed. Section 12 of chapter 83 of the Code (sec. 3972) authorizes such summary proceedings, and provides that the petition shall show all the estate, real and personal, belonging to the minor and set forth plainly all the facts calculated to show the propriety of the sale or lease; that it shall be verified by the plaintiff; and that ten days' notice shall be given to defendants before such petition shall be heard.

The petition avers that the interests of the infant will be promoted by a sale or lease of his interest in said coal; but the only facts alleged by way of compliance with the provisions of the statute are: That prior to the filing of said petition the Salvatore Coal Company had offered for a lease of the coal and mining rights seven cents per ton, and that petitioner with one of her daughters had been induced to sign a lease to the said company, conveying the coal and mining rights to it at seven cents per ton royalty, but as the husband of said daughter had not signed said lease, the lease was as to her void; that prior to the filing of the petition, the petitioner in her individual capacity and the adult heirs had agreed to lease the coal with mining rights, at ten cents per ton; and that they had agreed to join in a lease to one George R. Roberts, trustee.

There is no allegation of any necessity to sell or lease the infant's interest in the coal, for his support or to provide for his education. It is alleged that his interest in the 132.55 acres of land under which the coal lay, is the only real estate owned by him, and that his personal property does not exceed in value $800.00, leaving it for inference only, that because of the small personal estate, the proceeds from the sale of the coal, or royalties that might be derived therefrom, might be necessary for his support or maintenance. But these facts are not specifically alleged. For aught that appears in the petition, the infant, then being sixteen years of age, might have been employed and making his own living, with no necessity for selling his interest in the coal.

Apparently some evidence was taken to support the petition and justify the sale or lease; but this evidence, if taken down, is not contained in the record.

The infant, then being over sixteen years of age, filed his answer to the petition, alleging that he believed his interest would be promoted by the sale or lease of the coal, but because of his youth he was not qualified to fully comprehend the allegations of the petition, and on account of his infancy commended his interests to the protection of the court.

The only appellant is the Salvatore Coal Company, made defendant in the petition, and which answered the bill, alleging that it had acquired the interest of the widow in the coal by virtue of the lease previously executed by her and her daughter, not joined in by the husband of the daughter. The answer of the appellant and the report of sale or lease made by the guardian to George R. Roberts, trustee, shows that before sale, appellant had offered for a lease of the infant's interest in the coal his proportionate share of fifteen cents per ton, and in all other respects upon the same terms and conditions as sold by the guardian to said Roberts.

The principal grounds relied upon by appellant for reversing the decrees below are: First, that the court had no jurisdiction to direct a sale or lease of the infant's interest, because such lease would operate against its interest acquired from the widow; and, second, because it was error to ignore the upset bid for the interest of the infant, and for other errors apparent.

The conclusion we have reached in regard to the case does not require us to consider the supposed interests of appellant. We do not think sufficient facts were alleged in the petition to justify the decree of sale of the infant's interest.

[1] While the guardian ad litem answered, by a formal answer, no special defenses were interposed by him; but infants are always the wards of a court of equity, and it is always the duty of the court where the interests of infants are involved, to protect those interests, and this duty extends to the court of appeals, as well as to the court of original jurisdiction. As we said in Glade Mining Co. v. Harris, 65 W. Va. 162, 63 S. E. 877:

"On appeal an infant will be given the benefit of every defense of which he could have availed himself, or which might have been interposed for him in the trial court; and * * * where the record shows error, as to a minor defendant, the judgment will be reversed, though there is no appeal on his part, it being the duty of the chancellor, as the guardian of infants, to protect their rights."

[2] Wherefore it becomes our duty to determine whether the petition in this case justified the decrees appealed from and whether a demurrer interposed thereto ought to have been sustained. In the recent case of Balles, Guardian, v. Alderson, 82 W. Va. 342, 95 S. E. 1039, a proceeding under section 12 of chapter 83 of the Code, the sufficiency of the petition was challenged. It undertook to set forth a number of reasons why the interests of the infants would be promoted by sale of the infants' lands: such as, that the lands of the infants were undeveloped, and were valuable largely for the minerals, and that it was uncertain when they would be developed; that the taxes on the lands amounted to a large sum, which had to be paid out of the personal estate of the infants; and that the price of thirty dollars per acre offered was a good price, and the proceeds of the sale might be invested, and the income therefrom would be of more benefit to the infants than any possible increase in the value of the lands. But as the petition in that case was lacking in any showing of necessity for the sale of the lands, it was regarded wanting in the necessary averments to justify the sale of the property. In this case as we have indicated, there is no showing of necessity for the sale of the infant's coal, and little alleged or proven to justify the sale of the property. On the contrary, we see from the answer of appellant and the report of sale and the decree confirming it, that a larger price was offered by way of an upset bid for the infant's interest.

Our conclusion is that the decrees of sale and confirmation should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to petitioner to amend if so advised, if not, to dismiss the petition.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF WEST UNION v. FREEMAN. (No. 4208.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Oct. 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 9, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Bills and notes ⚡465—Valuable consideration need not be averred or proved.

In a suit upon a promissory note it is unnecessary to aver or prove that a valuable consideration therefor passed to the maker. The note itself imports a valuable consideration.

2. Bills and notes ⚡95—Bank's assignment of past due notes to directors and stockholders responsible for their purchase or discount is sufficient consideration for their notes reimbursing the bank.

The assignment by a bank of past due notes to directors and stockholders thereof responsible for the purchase or discount thereof by the bank, constitutes a valuable and sufficient consideration for the individual notes of such directors and stockholders executed to the bank for their pro rata shares of the past due paper so assigned.

3. Banks and banking ⚡109(1)—Bank's transferring notes to directors and stockholders is valid and binding without minutes being kept.

The validity of such assignment by a bank to its directors and stockholders, made in good faith, does not depend upon whether or not any minute of the meeting of the directors at which such action or transaction took place was kept. If the directors were present and acted, their action was as valid and binding without a minute as if one was kept, for the fact of their action may be proved by any other competent evidence.

4. Banks and banking ⚡109(3)—Written assignment of paper by a bank's cashier to directors and stockholders pursuant to directors' order held assignment in due course.

Such an assignment in writing of a part of the paper of a bank by the cashier thereof pursuant to such action of the directors, should be regarded as an assignment in due course and binding on the corporation.

5. Banks and banking ⚡109(3)—Cashier has general authority to indorse negotiable paper.

The cashier of a bank has general authority to transfer by endorsement negotiable paper, and no special authority for this purpose is necessary.

6. Appeal and error ⚡302(3)—Party challenging correctness of judgment on motion to set aside demurrer to evidence may avail himself of all adverse rulings.

Whether a party demurring to the evidence of the other waives his exception to the rulings of the court excluding some of his competent and legal evidence on an important issue, is mooted but not decided. If, however, he challenges the correctness of the judgment by a motion to set aside the demurrer and the verdict thereon as contrary to the law and the evidence, he may in this court avail himself of any errors in the adverse rulings of the court on the trial of the action.

Error to Circuit Court, Doddridge County.

Action by the First National Bank of West Union against William W. Freeman, and from a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff brings error. Reversed, demurrers to evidence set aside, and plaintiff awarded a new trial on all issues.

Showalter & Frame, of Fairmont, and J. Ramsey, of West Union, for plaintiff in error.

Law & McCue, of Clarksburg, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. Freeman's defense to his note sued on, as shown by his special plea in writing, was that it was made without consideration and solely for the accommodation of plaintiff under the facts and circumstances set out in the plea. The sufficiency of this plea as a defense to the action was before trial certified to us and here held to be good in law, though the facts pleaded were provable under the general issue. First National Bank of West Union v. Freeman, 83 W. Va. 477, 98 S. E. 558. On the former hearing we reversed the judgment below striking out the special plea, and remanded the case to the circuit court for trial on the issues joined thereon.

On the trial of this issue in the circuit court, after the evidence on both sides was concluded, each of the parties interposed a motion to the court to strike out the other's evidence and direct a verdict for the mover, both of which motions were overruled. After this action of the court the defendant then moved the court to exclude all the evidence of J. E. Trainer, W. J. McElhiney, W. G. Hammond, U. G. Summers, W. M. Stout, A. C. Bland, and J. Ramsey, in so far as the same, or any part thereof, tended to show an assignment by plaintiff to defendant of certain notes aggregating $23,068.74, and which purported to be represented by certain obligations of the directors to the bank, on the ground of want of record evidence thereof, and for the further reason that no such assignment of the assets of the bank could be made without official action of the board of directors legally assembled as directors and by resolution to that effect, which motion was sustained and the plaintiff excepted. And without waiving any exceptions theretofore interposed, the plaintiff by counsel then demurred to the evidence offered by defendant in support of his plea of want of consideration, which demurrer was joined in by defendant; and the defendant also demurred to plaintiff's evidence conflicting with his evidence as to his set-off filed, in which plaintiff joined; and the judgment of the court thereon, and on the special verdicts of the jury, was that the law thereon was for the defendant, and that plaintiff's demurrer be overruled, and that his demurrer to plaintiff's evidence be sustained, and that he recover of the plaintiff the sum of $95.79, the damages assessed by the jury in his favor, with interest thereon and costs, from which judgment the plaintiff obtained the present writ of error.

[1] In order to test the correctness or incorrectness of the rulings of the court on the several demurrers to the evidence, we must determine the burden of proof on the issues joined, and the status of the evidence of the respective parties at the time these demurrers were interposed. Of course the plaintiff had the burden of proving the note sued on, and that it was the note of defendant. This it sustained by the evidence of the cashier of the bank and the production in evidence of the note. It was neither necessary to aver or prove that a valuable consideration had been received by the defendant therefor. The note prima facie imported a valuable consideration. 2 Enc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 415, and the Virginia and West Virginia cases there digested.

[2] After the case of the plaintiff had been thus established by its evidence, the defendant to sustain his plea of want of consideration undertook to prove by his own testimony the circumstances of his execution of the original note, of which the one sued on was a remote renewal, and particularly that the original note had been executed by him for the accommodation of the bank with the distinct understanding with the cashier and the attorney for the bank that it along with like notes executed at or about the same time by other directors of the bank to take the place of certain past due notes of its customers then aggregating the sum of $23,068.74, until those notes when collected and applied, as he was assured by those officers they would be, should pay off and discharge his note and the substituted notes of the other directors, and that he nor any of the makers of the substituted notes would ever have anything to pay thereon. He also introduced numerous duplicate deposit slips sent him by the bank from time to time showing credits to his account and applied from time to time to the reduction of his note, and reducing it at the time of the renewal sued on to the sum of $1,061.16.

To rebut defendant's evidence the plaintiff then introduced as witnesses its cashier and all of the directors and its attorney in office at the time, who proved that defendant's note was executed along with like notes of the other directors for his pro rata share of the past due notes held by the bank, and pursuant to an agreement between them, either in directors' meeting or immediately thereafter, and at the place of meeting of the directors, to the effect that each of the directors who were responsible for the discount of the past due notes should execute his note for his pro rata share thereof, and that the bank should assign to them the past due notes as collateral, and as collected, the sums collected should be applied pro rata on these notes, including that of plaintiff, and which had been done in accordance with such agreement; that some of the directors in place of executing notes had paid their shares in cash, and thus gave the bank the benefit of the cash in place of notes therefor as the defendant had done. Plaintiff in connection with the oral testimony of these witnesses introduced as evidence a written assignment executed by the cashier of the bank. The defendant objected to the testimony of these witnesses and also to the introduction of the assignment, on the ground mainly that the transaction was not done in directors' meeting; that what the other directors did in the way of executing their notes or paying their shares in cash was not binding on him and constituted no consideration for the note executed by him; that he was not a party to the assignment and was not bound thereby. After the introduction of this assignment, to which the defendant by counsel had no objection, the court on his motion struck it out and refused to allow it to be considered by the jury. And at the conclusion of the evidence, as already noted, the court, on defendant's motion, also excluded all of the testimony of the witnesses Trainer, McElhiney, Hammond, Summers, Stout, Bland and Ramsey, in so far as the same, or any part thereof, tended to show an assignment by plaintiff of the said past due notes, for the reasons already stated; and the case went to the jury and to the court on the several demurrers to the evidence, with that evidence excluded, resulting in the judgment of the court thereon in favor of the defendant.

In order to dispose of the several points of error relied on, it becomes necessary to determine the correctness of the rulings of the court on the exclusion of plaintiff's evidence. The defendant had the affirmative of the issue on his plea of want of consideration and the character of his note sued on. The court permitted him to testify as to the facts and circumstances of its execution. And contrary to defendant's contention Ramsey, attorney, testified that the written assignment was prepared by him on the night of the meeting of the directors, at which defendant was present, and at which meeting or at a meeting of the directors as individuals immediately afterwards, which we think unimportant, it was presented to and read by him in their presence and hearing, including Freeman, when it was agreed between the directors and the cashier that they should pay or execute their notes to the bank for their respective shares of the past due notes and take in lieu thereof the collateral assignment of the old notes. And the evidence of the other directors was that this agreement had been fully executed on their part and that defendant alone had been delinquent therein; that the bank and its stockholders, including Freeman, had had the benefit of this transaction and the payments on account of the old notes.

The benefits thus accruing to the bank, to Freeman and the other stockholders and directors, and certainly the assignment of the past due notes, we think, constituted sufficient consideration accruing to Freeman for the execution of his original note and the renewal thereof sued on. A valuable consideration is the relinquishment by the promisee of some right which he may lawfully exercise or enforce, or the incurring of some risk or trouble at the instance of the promisor. County Court v. Hall, 51 W. Va. 269, 41 S. E. 119; Hornbrooks v. Lucas, 24 W. Va. 493, 49 Am. Rep. 277; Jackson v. Hough, 38 W. Va. 236, 18 S. E. 575. Freeman had a large interest as a stockholder and director of the bank and in saving the bank financial embarrassment growing out of the past due notes accumulated while he was a director of the bank. This interest made the contract between the bank and the individual directors a sufficient consideration for his promise. Kittle's Modern Law of Assumpsit, 174; State Bank of Pittsburg v. Kirk, 216 Pa. 452, 65 Atl. 932. In the Pennsylvania case just cited the Supreme Court of that state held that a transaction between the directors and a bank, very similar to the one involved here, constituted a sufficient consideration to support the notes given by the directors of a bank. Here Freeman proved that he had so far assented to the agreement as to execute his note and take the payments thereon derived from collections made on the assigned notes. If he had not done so, undoubtedly the other directors would not have carried out the contract on their part. Ramsey, in charge of the collection of the assigned notes and judgments thereon, testified to Freeman's frequent visits to his office to inquire how he was getting along with the collections, and whether he or the other directors were liable to sustain any loss. The law is that where one with actual or constructive knowledge of the facts induces another by his words or conduct to believe that he acquiesces in or ratifies a transaction, or that he will offer no opposition thereto, and that other, in reliance on such belief, alters his position, such person is estopped from repudiating the transaction to the other's prejudice. 21 C. J. 1216; 16 Cyc. 787.

[3, 4] A further argument to support the ruling of the circuit court in rejecting the written assignment is that McElhiney, cashier, who signed it on behalf of the bank, was without authority in the premises. We think there is no merit in this proposition. Besides, the bank is not complaining of want of authority in the cashier. The directors were together when the agreement was made. It did not require a more formal meeting, or that some minute of the meeting should be kept, to bind the corporation and the directors. C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Deepwater Ry. Co., 57 W. Va. 641, 50 S. E. 890. When the directors were so assembled, they could transact any lawful business, and the validity of their action would not depend on the fact that no minute thereof was preserved.

But it is contended that the assignment, signed, not in the corporate name, but by the cashier, describing himself as such officer, was not the act of the corporation, and for this reason the paper was properly stricken out by the circuit court; this also upon the theory that the assignment of the bank's assets was not done in due course, and required the corporate action of the board of directors. But if there was a meeting of the board of directors, his action was authorized. But whether so or not, was not his assignment of the past due notes and the taking of the individual notes of the directors to cover the same done in due course? We think the transaction was within the scope of his authority as cashier. This case presents a different proposition from that presented in the Citizens' Bank v. Frederickson, 83 Neb. 755, 120 N. W. 462. In that case Frederickson, who executed the notes with automobiles assigned to him as security, was in no way previously obligated to the payee, nor otherwise interested except as accommodation maker of his notes. The transaction was purely one for the accommodation of the corporation. He had no duty to the corporation as Freeman had in this case, nor was his promise supported thereby or by the consideration of the mutual promises between the bank and the other directors.

[5] As to the authority of the cashier of a bank, he has general authority to transfer by indorsement negotiable paper, and no special authority for this purpose is necessary to be proved. 1 Michie on Banks and Banking, 719-721; Smith v. Lawson, 18 W. Va. 212, 41 Am. Rep. 688; Lamb, Trustee, v. Cecil, 28 W. Va. 653.

[6] With all of the evidence of defendant in and all, or practically all, of that of the plaintiff on the issue presented by defendant's plea out by action of the court prior to the several demurrers of the parties to the evidence, the plaintiff was prejudiced in the eyes of the court and jury. What course the demurrants might have taken with all the competent and legal evidence in, we cannot say.

nor do we know what the judgment of the court upon the demurrers to the evidence would have been, if all the evidence had been before it, as it should have been. A question suggested in this connection is whether the plaintiff waived its objection to the rejection of its evidence by demurring to the evidence. In Washburn v. Board of Commissioners of Shelby County, 104 Ind. 821, 3 N. E. 757, 54 Am. Rep. 332, that court held that a defendant, by demurring to plaintiff's evidence, does not deprive plaintiff of the right to make available questions upon the rulings excluding evidence. Here the defendant had the affirmative of the issue on his plea, and with his evidence in, and the most or part of that of the plaintiff on that question out of the case by the adverse rulings of the court thereon, did plaintiff waive those adverse rulings on its evidence? It may be that it did. This was a risk it was not bound to sustain, but it voluntarily did so. Whether it did or not, we need not say in this case, for we find by the record that on the adverse action of the court on its demurrer to the evidence, it moved the court to set aside the verdict because contrary to the law and the evidence. This motion, we think, saved to plaintiff the right to insist on its exceptions to the rulings of the trial court respecting its competent and legal evidence. Thereby it challenged the correctness of the rulings of the court on its evidence, which points it saved on the record. In Miller v. Holt, 47 W. Va. 7, 34 S. E. 956, there was a demurrer by plaintiff to defendant's evidence, overruled by the trial court. There was also a motion by defendant to set aside the verdict and award him a new trial. This court reversed the judgment for the error in the verdict in failing to locate the line in the controversy, and awarded defendant a new trial. It is well settled here and in Virginia, that if a proper showing be made therefor, the court has jurisdiction to set aside a demurrer to the evidence and award the demurrant a new trial, and the rules applicable to new trials generally are applicable in such cases, and that the rules applicable to new trials are pertinent where the case has not been properly developed and the court can see that other evidence exists, and that through the misconception of law applicable to the case or through some surprise, accident or oversight justice demands a new trial that the party injured may be permitted fully to present his case. Frymier v. Lorama Railroad Co., 76 W. Va. 96, 90, 85 S. E. 26, and decisions there cited.

Our conclusion in this case is that the judgment below should be reversed, the demurrers to the evidence set aside, and the plaintiff awarded a new trial on all the issues.

WALDRON v. GARLAND POCAHONTAS COAL CO. (No. 4331.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 8, 1921. Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1921.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Death — 103(3)—Contributory negligence of father consenting to deceased son's employment in mine held question for jury.

If a father consents to the employment of his son, under 16 years of age, in a coal mine, or, after the son is employed therein, he acquiesces in and agrees to the continued employment, and, afterwards the son while so employed is killed by an accident arising from one of the ordinary risks of the employment, the contributory negligence of the father in consenting to the employment, or in acquiescing therein after the employment, will prevent recovery of damages for his sole benefit against the coal-mining company; but if there is a serious and substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether the father did in fact agree to or acquiesce in the unlawful employment, it becomes a question for the jury.

2. Master and servant — 318(1)—Relation of independent contractor held not created.

Whether a person performing work for another is an independent contractor depends upon a consideration of the contract of employment, the nature of the business, the circumstances under which the contract was made and the work was done. And if it appears that the owner of the business retains general control of the premises where the work is being performed, and has power to direct when it shall be performed, furnishes part of the equipment, does a portion of the work himself necessary for the continuance of the work to be done under the contract, pays the contractee a stipulated price per square yard of the work performed, and that there is no fixed time for the termination of the contract, the relation of independent contractor is not established, although the contractee under such contract employs and discharges his employees on the work, and pays them out of the money he derives from the contract.

3. Master and servant — 330(1)—Relation of independent contractor must be proved by mine owner.

To avoid liability for personal injuries to an employee in a coal mine, on the ground that the work therein at which the employee was injured was being done under contract by an independent contractor, and that therefore the relation of master and servant did not exist between the injured person and the mine owner and operator, it is incumbent on the mine owner to prove all the facts and circumstances necessary to establish that the work was being done by an independent contractor.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by Guy F. Waldron, as administrator of his son, Philip Waldron, deceased, against the Garland Pocahontas Coal Company for damages for deceased's death. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Sanders, Crockett, Fox & Sanders, of Bluefield, and Strother, Taylor & Taylor, of Welch, for plaintiff in error.

John Kee and Russell S. Ritz, both of Bluefield, for defendant in error.

LIVELY, J. From a verdict and judgment for $10,000, rendered on the 17th day of February, 1921, defendant prosecutes this writ of error.

Plaintiff instituted this action for damages as administrator of Philip Waldron, alleging that the intestate, his son, a boy between the age of 13 and 14 years, was negligently killed while in the employ of defendant in its mine on September 11, 1919.

The defense relies on two grounds: (1) Contributory negligence on the part of the father and administrator, in that he consented to or acquiesced in the employment of the boy in the mines; and (2) that at the time the boy was killed he was not in the employ of defendant, but was working in the mine for an independent contractor, a Mr. Thompson, who was driving an entry for defendant.

[1] The boy had been in the habit of working away from home, and about three months before he was killed he, with his father's consent, went to the home of H. F. Short, his stepgrandfather, who lived about one mile from defendant's mines, and who promised to put the boy in school. In the early part of August, Short asked the manager of defendant coal company, if he could give the boy employment, and was answered in the affirmative, conditioned, however, on the boy's being 16 years of age or over, and Short replied that he would have the father to sign a statement about the boy's age. Such statement was afterwards brought to the manager and reads:

"Aug. 12, 1919. Garland Pocahontas Coal Co. Gentlemen Phil Waldron is my son. he is 16 years old. Guy Waldron."

The boy was employed as a trapper in the mine. About two weeks prior to the boy's death, Short was on a visit to the boy's father and mentioned to him that he had sent the boy to him prior to that time to have him sign a paper about his age, so that he could get employment from Mr. Baldwin, and the father replied that he had not seen the boy; that he had not come home; that he had not signed any such paper. Short then told the father that he would tell Baldwin not to work the boy and the father replied, "No, never mind, just leave the boy alone," and on being pressed he testified that the father might have added, "Maybe he will come home." The father's version of that conversation is that when Short told him that the boy was at the mine he told him that he would suffer his right hand to be cut off before he would sign a permit; that the child was too young to work in the mines and that he wanted him to go to school. Then Short told him he would tell Mr. Baldwin not to work him, to which he replied:

"Maybe we had better let him alone. Maybe he will come home in a few days."

The Sunday before the boy was killed the father was on a visit to Short, who then told him that the boy had left his house and was staying at a boarding house, was doing no good, getting a dollar a day, and for him to go up there and take the boy home, and the father then told him he would have the boy sent to the reform school. The father said he was looking for the boy to get him on the train to take him home, but after the train passed the station he saw the boy standing on the porch of the company's store. Both the father and mother say they had heard that the boy was working for defendant, but did not know it to be true, and did not know what work he was doing. There was one question propounded to the father which indicated that he had heard that the boy was working in the mine. He was asked:

"How long was it before he was killed that you heard he had been working in the mine? Answer: I couldn't say positive, it might have been a week or two weeks."

It will be observed that the question related particularly to the time when he had received information, and not specially to whether the employment was in or out of the mine. After the boy had gone to his grandmother's house, he made one or two visits to his father's home, five or six miles away, when his father purchased for him a pair of shoes, but did not ask the boy if he was working or for whom; and it does not satisfactorily appear whether these visits were before or after the boy had gone to work for defendant. It is on this evidence that the claim of defendant is based, that the father, and administrator, consented and acquiesced in the employment of his boy in the mine, at a dangerous occupation, and therefore was guilty of such contributory negligence as to preclude recovery. Under this evidence, can we say that it is proven with sufficient conclusiveness that the father acquiesced in or consented to the employment in the mine, to impel us to hold as a conclusion of law that the father was guilty of contributory negligence? It does not appear with any reasonable degree of certainty that the father knew the boy was trapping in the mine or hauling slate out of the mine. He never saw the boy at any kind of work there; and it is clear that he refused to give any permit, and wanted the boy to go to school. There is no variance between the evidence of the grandfather and the father on the refusal to give a permit, or to make the written statement that the boy was 16 years old. We pause here to say that much of the evidence relating to the permit or the apparent age of the boy is of no materiality. Under section 24, c. 15 H, Code, 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, § 495—32), making it unlawful to permit a boy under 14 years of age to work in a coal mine, an affidavit was required, before employment, from the parent or guardian that the boy's age is 14 years or more, and which affidavit as to the employer was conclusive as to the age of such boy. But by chapter 17, Acts 1919, passed February 11, 1919, and in effect 90 days from its passage (and in effect when this boy was employed) it is provided in section 2,

"No child under the age of sixteen years shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in any mine, quarry, tunnel or excavation" —and there is no provision for affidavit as to age. This act expressly repeals section 24, c. 15 H, of the Code. The fact that the child is under 16 years of age makes the employment unlawful; and, if injury results, there is prima facie negligence on the part of the employer. See Norman v. Coal Co., 68 W. Va. 406, 69 S. E. 857, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 504; Daniel v. Big Sandy C. & C. Co., 68 W. Va. 491, 69 S. E. 903; Blankenship v. Coal Co., 69 W. Va. 74, 70 S. E. 863; Dickinson v. Stuart Colliery Co., 71 W. Va. 325, 76 S. E. 654, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 335; Griffith v. American Coal Co., 75 W. Va. 686, 84 S. E. 621, L. R. A. 1915F, 803; Mangus v. Coal Co., 87 W. Va. 718, 105 S. E. 909. Many modern decisions are that the failure to perform a statutory duty in such cases is negligence per se. See L. R. A. 1915E, p. 506, note to the case of Conway v. Monidah Trust (Mont.). The prima facie presumption of negligence is not attempted to be overcome in this case. It is tacitly conceded that the employment was unlawful. Even under the old law an affidavit of the parent or guardian as to the child's age was required, and no affidavit was had, simply a written statement that the boy was the son of Guy Waldron and 16 years of age. The employment was unlawful even under chapter 15 H, Code of 1918, and the subsequent injury makes a prima facie case of negligence on the employer. But we recur to the question of contributory negligence of the father. Can we say that because the father permitted the child to work "here and there" at various occupations, not of a dangerous nature, that he permitted the boy to go to his grandparents three months before his death for the avowed object of giving him schooling, that, after he had heard that the boy was at work for defendant under an alleged permit from him (the father), he then neglected to go and take him home, and upon a suggestion that the employer would be asked not to give the boy further work, he replied, "No; maybe we had better let him alone. Maybe he will come home in a few days"—constitutes such contributory negligence as to defeat recovery? It is not clearly shown that he knew the dangerous character of the employment. Surely there is no suggestion in the evidence that he knew the boy was trapping in the mine, or was hauling out slate or rocks. May he not have presumed that the employer would not and had not placed the boy in the mine in direct violation of the statute prohibiting the employment of boys under 16 years in a mine? As a conclusion of law, can we hold, as we are asked to do, that contributory negligence has been conclusively established, and therefore the jury should have been instructed to find for the defendant? In the case of Daniels v. Fuel Co., 79 W. Va. 255, 90 S. E. 840, the evidence was conclusive that the father knew and consented to the employment of the boy, who lived with the father, worked with him outside of the mine, traveled to and from the mine with him, and knew that he went into the mine. In Swope v. Coal & Coke Co., 78 W. Va. 517, 89 S. E. 284, L. R. A. 1917A, 1128, recovery was precluded because the father abandoned the wife and children, was divorced, and the custody of the children awarded to the wife, who exposed the child to a dangerous employment resulting in its death. In these cases there was no controversy on this question. It is well settled that when contributory negligence depends upon questions of fact it is for the jury to decide. Foley v. Huntington, 51 W. Va. 396, 41 S. E. 113; McCreery v. Ohio R. R. Co., 48 W. Va. 110, 27 S. E. 327. Where there is evidence tending to prove contributory negligence, the jury should be left free to give such evidence the consideration to which it may appear to them to be entitled. Webb v. Big Kanawha Packet Co., 43 W. Va. 800, 29 S. E. 519. But where the facts are uncontroverted the court may determine the question. Phillips v. County Court, 31 W. Va. 477, 7 S. E. 427. And the question of the estoppel of the plaintiff on this ground was submitted to the jury in defendant's instructions Nos. 8, 9, 13. These instructions were to the effect that if the jury believed that the father gave his consent to the employment, either expressly or impliedly, or acquiesced therein, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and recovery would be barred. We are now asked to say that defendant made a mistake in asking for these instructions; that it was the duty of the court to have held that contributory negligence had been clearly shown, and the jury instructed to find for defendant. We think these instructions were proper. It was a jury question. On this conflicting evidence the jury found that the father did not do so. Can we disturb that finding? The evidence and circumstances point strongly to the father's knowledge of the employment, not necessarily employment in the mine; and it may be conceded that he should have exercised more strict parental care of his boy of so tender an age, and at all times should have known of his whereabouts and doings, but the jury has determined otherwise. Young v. W. Va. P. R. R. Co., 44 W. Va. 218, 28 S. E. 932; Poague v. Spriggs, 21 Grat. (Va.) 220.

We now come to the other defense interposed, that at the time the boy was killed he was not in defendant's employ, but was working for one Thompson, stated to be an independent contractor in defendant's mine.

[2, 3] Short came to the general manager, Baldwin, on the 11th of September, and informed him that he had talked with the boy's father, and had advised that the boy ought to be in school, and the general manager immediately went to see his assistant mine foreman Riffe, and directed him to discharge the boy, giving as the reason therefor that he was apprehensive of the boy's age. Riffe went into the mine and discharged the boy about noon, stating to him that he would discharge him rather than let him work on the rock (the work at which he was killed that night). Riffe was under the impression that Baldwin directed the discharge of the boy because he understood that he was going to work on the rock. At least, that was the reason he gave to the boy for the discharge. It appears that Will Thompson had a verbal contract with defendant to drive an entry by blasting away the rock and slate and hauling it out of the mine to the slate dump, at $4 per yard. Thompson furnished the explosives, hired and discharged the men engaged, defendant drilled the holes in the daytime, and Thompson shot them at night and hauled the rock out of the mine upon cars furnished by defendant and hauled by defendant's ponies. Thompson paid the men employed. It is not clear whether the men were paid by the company and the amount charged to Thompson and taken out of the $4 per yard paid him, or whether Thompson drew all the money and paid the men therefrom. The only evidence on that point is from Baldwin's testimony, where he was asked:

"Who paid the men that he [Thompson] engaged on the work? Answer: Mr. Thompson. It came out of his pay."

When Thompson took this contract he had some trouble with a pony, and was told by Baldwin that he would send up Blaine to show the road. The first night the boy came to him to drive, followed by Blaine about one hour afterwards, who made one trip and left, saying the boy knew the road and could get along all right. It does not appear what position or employment Blaine had with the defendant company. The following night the boy came back to drive, and drove the pony awhile, and at that time asked Thompson for employment as a driver, but Thompson did not hire him, and the next night, the 11th of September, the boy came back again, and said the boss had sent him up to drive, and was killed instantly about 11 o'clock that night by falling off of the loaded car, which ran over him. Thompson says the boy was not working for him, not in his employ. Defendant says the boy had been discharged and paid off that afternoon, and warned not to go about the mines. Thompson says that the first night the boy came up he brought the pony from the barn, hitched it to the car outside of the tippie, and drove into the mine. Several witnesses testify that in the afternoon of the 11th Riffe went out and brought the boy back to the mine to do trapping that afternoon in the place of Cyphers, whom he desired to do other work, and two or three witnesses saw the boy doing that work that afternoon. Riffe denies this. Baldwin paid the boy his wages about 5 o'clock that afternoon, and told him he was not to work for them any more; and later, near dark, saw the boy taking the pony to the mine, and again told him not to go into the mine, but was told by the boy that he would take the pony to Thompson and come right out again. He came out dead. Here we have both the company and Thompson denying the employment, and yet the boy was working. The original employment at the mine was unlawful. If the boy had not been employed, the unfortunate death would not have occurred. To avoid liability it is asserted that Thompson must have employed the boy to do the driving, and, Thompson being an independent contractor, defendant is absolved from any duty to his servants and employees.

Who is an independent contractor? This query raises many nice distinctions, and its answer depends upon a consideration of the contract, the nature of the business, and the circumstances. Generally where a defendant has contracted with a competent person, exercising an independent employment, to do work not in itself dangerous to others, according to the contractor's own method, and without his being subject to control in any important particular, except as to the result of his work, he will not be chargeable for the wrongs of such contractor committed in the prosecution of the work. Carrico v. Railway Co., 39 W. Va. 86, 19 S. E. 571, 24 L. R. A. 50. Here there are many factors which militate against the contention that

Thompson was an independent contractor. The heading was in the mine, and was being driven while the coal was taken out and the mining operations carried on. Defendant had general control of the mine and of all the work therein. An important part of the work on the heading was done by defendant. It drilled the holes in the daytime, and Thompson shot them by explosives at night. Its machinery and equipment were used in the work. Its cars and ponies were used to haul out the rock. It sent Blaine, its employee, into the mine to help with the pony; and the evidence points strongly to the fact that the boy was sent the first night by some one in authority for that purpose. No time was fixed for the termination of the contract, and the life of the contract evidently depended upon the co-operation of defendant. If the holes were not bored, the work would not proceed. The mining of coal was the controlling business; and the driving of the entry was subservient thereto, and subject to the convenience of the owner. It does not appear how many yards Thompson had contracted to remove, or when or for what cause his employment might have been dispensed with. It is conceded that the work was as dangerous as any other mining work. The stipulated price per yard contracted to be paid is of little significance. Thompson employed and discharged his help, a strong index of the relation of an independent contractor, but not conclusive. Thompson, when asked if he had absolute control over driving the entry, replied that he was under the mine foreman's instructions; but that he had absolute control of hauling the slate out of the mine, employing and discharging the men, buying the explosives, and everything of that kind, until "they" gave him further orders and "they didn't give me no further contrary orders about that." If a right of control is in the employer, it is immaterial whether he actually exercises it. 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, p. 188. Why did Thompson permit the boy to work if he did not employ him? In response to his request of Baldwin for some one to drive the refractory pony, the boy came from the stables with the pony and hitched it to the car. The night he was killed, he appeared by order of the "boss." Thompson knew the boy was employed as a trapper. This indicates that Thompson recognized some authority in defendant in the selection of workmen. It has some probative value, and is one of the indices of the relation of the parties.

"The vital test in determining whether a person employed to do certain work is an independent contractor or a mere servant is the control over the work which is reserved by the employer. Stated as a general proposition, if the contractor is under the control of the employer, he is a servant; if not under such control he is an independent contractor." 14 R. C. L. p. 67, and numerous authorities there cited.

As hereinbefore stated, it does not appear whether defendant paid the men and charged the sums against Thompson's $4 per yard, or whether the contract price was paid in full to him, out of which he then paid them. When asked who paid the men, Baldwin answered:

"Mr. Thompson. It came out of his pay."
